

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE

Textbooks on contracts are many and voluminous and cover a wide field, while casebooks are relatively few and in scope must be kept well within old and rather narrow lines. In this casebook the general topics treated are shown by the chapter headings, which are of the simplest kind, and, as far as is possible, intentionally avoid controversial problems of terminology and classification. In one section heading, however, the traditional but inaccurate phrase "Impossibility of Performance" is used as still preferable to "Frustration" or "Hardship" or some other new word or phrase. The topics treated are those which American teachers of the subject have been accustomed to consider essential to the course on contracts.

It will be noted that in this casebook sealed contracts are dealt with first. That is historically the proper procedure and it is believed that it is so pedagogically. The material is relatively small and there seems to be no reason why the curiosity of students about sealed contracts should not be satisfied at the start. On the other hand, the statute of frauds cases are much better dealt with after the subject of conditions has been covered, and preferably after illegal contracts have been discussed, so in this collection they appear just before the cases on the discharge of contracts. For convenience in teaching, the statute of frauds cases could just as well have been placed after those on the discharge of contracts, but as they could also come just as well before the latter, the logical arrangement of the book prevailed. The material is believed, however, to be so arranged that teachers who prefer a different order of topics may readily change the order in the assignment of lessons.

An effort has been made to supply in each chapter an orderly development of topics. Except in Chapter VII, section headings have been omitted both because they aid the student undesirably and narrow too much his interest in a given case and because they tend to compel the placing of some cases at points inimical to the natural development of topics. At the end of the volume, however, an index is furnished to enable ready reference to particular contents.

Emphasis is laid in this casebook on the historical side of the subject, even though more than two-thirds of the principal cases are American. As an aid in the development of the history of contracts, a few important quoted passages on historical points are furnished from the writings of leading legal scholars. The quotations do not appear in an appendix, but are in the text at logically appropriate places. They are put there with no expectation that they will be assigned for class discussion and, occasionally, with no expectation that the student, when he first comes across them in their logically proper places, will be able to understand them, but in the hope that the student will get enough out of them on his first encounter to arouse his interest and curiosity to a point which will lead to his ultimate mastery of them and to his further acquaintance with the works of the writers quoted. Buried in an appendix, the passages quoted would be more likely to be slighted.

Throughout the preparation of this casebook the fact that it is primarily an aid to the acquisition by students of a reasonable amount of knowledge about the law of contracts and of power in dealing with its problems has been kept in mind. It is a teaching medium, and not a textbook disguised as a casebook. The footnotes were planned, therefore, to furnish supplementary source material and problems for class discussion, as well as to give information to students as to the state of the authorities, and supply them with references to law magazine articles and monographic notes. It is assumed that Williston on Contracts and the new edition of Page on Contracts will be consulted for the detailed authorities on any point. A table of magazine articles referred to by the editor is supplied just following the table of cases.

In conclusion the editor wishes to acknowledge the courtesy of the West Publishing Co. in placing at his service its Reporter System cases, and to thank all others who have facilitated the accomplishment of his plans for the book.

CASES ON THE LAW OF CONTRACTS

HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION.

THE HISTORY OF CONTRACTS IN ENGLISH LAW.

Edward Jenks, A Short History of English Law, pp. 132-140.¹ It has previously been pointed out in this book, in more than one passage, that one of the most striking lessons to be learned from a study of legal history is, that ideas which to us now seem absolutely distinct, and even opposed, are found originally to have been blended in a common stock, from which they have subsequently split off by a process of specialization. No better example of this truth could be found than in the history of Contract and Tort. To us, these two institutions seem wholly distinct; separate books are written about them, and Acts of Parliament treat them as mutually exclusive. We regard an action of Contract as an action to prevent or compensate for a breach of a promise; an action of Tort as an action to punish or compensate for a wrong, such as assault or defamation, which has not any necessary connection with a promise. An ordinary defense to an action of Contract is, in effect: "I did not promise." What should we think if a defendant in an action for libel defended himself on the ground that he had not promised not to libel the plaintiff? It is true that, occasionally, a case arises which causes some difficulty;² and it would hardly be possible to throw a more effective apple of discord into a company of lawyers, than by starting a discussion on the question whether Detinue was an action of Contract or of Tort. But we are apt to regard these difficulties as inseparable from any legal classification; whereas a little knowledge of history would enable us to trace them to their true source. As a matter of historical fact, the simple contract and the ordinary tort spring from the same stock; and the wonder would be if they did not, in some points, betray signs of their common origin.

We have seen that, in the previous period, [1066-1272], the only remedy of a general nature for anything like what we understand by a contract, was the Action of Debt.³ This action was, at first, in truth, an action to recover a specific object; usually a movable, because actions to recover land were conducted by other and more elaborate machinery. By Bracton's time, as we have seen, it had specialized into two forms, the Writ of Debt, strictly, in which a fixed sum of money was sought to be recovered, and the Writ of Detinue, in which a specific chattel was the object pursued.

In the period we are now discussing, [1272-1660], the Writ of Debt speedily lost its original character as an action to recover money lent or bailed, and was applicable to any case in which the plaintiff sought to recover a fixed sum of money, due to him on grounds which the law considered to be adequate. Thus, for example, if a tenant failed to pay his rent (though he had not expressly covenanted to do so),⁴ if a sheriff⁵ or the Warden of the Fleet,⁶ allowed a debtor to escape, if a sum was found due from a debtor on account stated,⁷ all these were liable to an Action of Debt. In some cases, e. g. the case of rent, there had, no doubt, been something very like a contract; where the action of Debt was brought on a bond, we should consider it strictly contractual. Still, the old rule of Glanville, that in an Action for Debt the King's Courts would not enforce a mere "private agreement," held good throughout the whole history of the Action of Debt; and so that action can only be held to have contributed in a very minor degree to the development of the law of Contract. Moreover, it rapidly became unpopular in this period, owing to the fact that unless the plaintiff could show exceptionally good proof of his claim, e. g., a sealed charter, the defendant could get off by "waging his law." It was, therefore, in spite of the provisions of the Statute of Westminster the Second,⁸ very unsuitable for use against executors; and in fact, it could not be brought against them in cases in which their testator, had he lived, would have been entitled to "wage his law."

The Action of Detinue, as we have said,⁹ lay where a specific chattel belonging to the plaintiff was in the hands of the defendant, who refused to give it up. But it behooved the plaintiff to be cautious in stating in what manner he alleged the chattel to have come into the defendant's hands. He had to be careful to avoid "words of felony," i. e., anything that might sound like a charge of theft or robbery; for, if he did not, he laid himself open to being met by the argument that his proper procedure was an "appeal of larceny," upon which he was obliged to offer battle. So it appears to have been the practice in the early Writs of Detinue for the plaintiff to allege (what was, no doubt, in many cases, the strict truth), that he had himself "bailed" or delivered the chattel to the defendant in the first instance. Thus the form of action known as "Detinue sur bailment" became the orthodox form; and thus Detinue appeared to be an action founded on contract.¹⁰ For a voluntary delivery or bailment of a chattel, accepted by the defendant, is something very like an agreement, from which a promise to return the chattel can well be implied. Nevertheless, the promise is only implied; and it is very doubtful whether, to the mind of Glanville or Bracton, Detinue was really regarded as a contractual action. In the middle of the fourteenth century,¹¹ the plaintiff was allowed to substitute for the allegation of bailment the wider allegation that the goods "came to the hands" (devenerunt ad manus) of the defendant, without saying how; and thus the Action of Detinue lost whatever contractual character it may once have had. How it acquired its tortious character, we shall see later on. At any rate, there was no possibility of a general theory of contract developing out of the Action of Detinue.

A third possible source of contract at the beginning of the period was the Action of Covenant, about which, unfortunately, we know very little. We have seen¹² that Glanville treats a deed or charter as one of the causae or grounds of Debt; and it is very significant that Debt and not Covenant remained the proper form of action on a common money bond until quite late in this period.¹³ This curious fact may be accounted for by assuming (as we are warranted in doing) that in early times the sealed bond was looked upon rather as the symbol than as the ground of the debtor's liability; in other words that the debtor was regarded as the object pledged, or bound,¹⁴ the document being given as a security for his return to captivity if he failed to pay the debt. Nevertheless, the language of Glanville, that, if the defendant acknowledges the genuineness of the charter, he is bound to warrant its terms, and to observe the compact expressed in it, points to the fact that, even in the twelfth century, the sealed charter was assuming a wider form than the mere acknowledgment of a debt. Indeed, we know independently that at least two very important transactions, viz. a lease for years and an agreement to levy a Fine, were being made by deed before the end of the thirteenth century. But both these were rather in the nature of "covenants real" than personal contracts; and the remedy for breach of them seems to have been more in the nature of specific performance than a money compensation.¹⁵

Nevertheless, it is clear that, before the end of the fourteenth century, the writ of Covenant enabled an action to be brought for "unliquidated damages" on breach of any of the terms of a sealed instrument. And this rule has prevailed to the present day; giving us our "specialty" or "formal" contract, which includes any lawful promise made under seal.

By far the greater number of contracts entered into in ordinary life are,

¹⁴ The word points to the original physical bondage of the debtor. Early legal history is full of such cases.

however, not embodied in sealed documents. They are either contained in ordinary correspondence or mere written memoranda, or they are made solely by word of mouth or conduct. These are all now, by English Law, termed "simple" or "parol" contracts; and our problem is, to discover how they obtained a foot-hold in the common law, despite the attitude of the King's Courts so clearly stated by Glanville. To do this, we must turn aside entirely from the realm of Debt and Covenant, and enter what seems, at first sight, a very unlikely quarter.

Apparently, the inventiveness of the Chancellor and judges in the matter of making new writs had come to an end in the latter half of the thirteenth century. At any rate, there were complaints in Parliament of suitors being turned away empty-handed because there was no writ to suit their cases. Accordingly, the great Statute of Westminster the Second¹⁶ sought to provide a remedy by enacting that "whensoever from henceforth it shall fortune in the Chancery, that in one case a writ is found, and in like case falling under like law, and requiring like remedy, is found none, the Clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making a writ" (and if they don't there is to be an appeal to Parliament).

This enactment, though it appears only at the end of a chapter on special cases, seems to have been taken as a general authority for the expansion of legal remedies; and under it were formed many new writs on the analogy of the older writs found in the Register. These new writs were all grouped together under the name of "Case"; apparently from the words used in the Statute of Westminster the Second—in consimili casu. Another feature common to them all was, that each was framed on the model of a specific older writ; enlarging its scope by omitting one or more of the technical requirements of the older document.

One of the first, if not the very first model made use of for this purpose was the famous Writ of Trespass, which, as we have seen¹⁷ had been introduced into the Register at the end of the preceding period, and which speedily became very popular. The gist of the Writ of Trespass was an allegation that the defendant had, "with force and arms," (vi et armis) and "against the peace of our Lord the King," (contra pacem domini regis) interfered with the plaintiff's possession of his body, land, or goods. No doubt at first the "force and arms" were taken seriously; but the writ speedily came to cover every interference with possession, however trifling and accidental. Nevertheless, the Courts held fast to the technical point, that, to amount to a trespass, there must have been interference with the plaintiff's possession by some voluntary act of the defendant, his servants or his cattle.

It speedily came to be perceived, however, that there were many circumstances in which the plaintiff had suffered serious loss by the defendant's action, though the latter had not, technically, been guilty of trespass. Thus, in the middle of the fourteenth century, a Humber ferryman so overloaded his boat, that the plaintiff's horse, which was on board, was drowned.¹⁸ There was no trespass; because the plaintiff had voluntarily parted with the possession of his horse when he put him on the defendant's boat. Similarly, when a smith lamed a horse entrusted to him to be shod,¹⁹ or a leech so negligently did his cure, that the horse died,³⁰ or a surgeon mismanaged the plaintiff's hand which he undertook to cure.³¹ In all these cases, though there was no trespass, there was actual malfeasance or wrongdoing in respect of a physical object by the defendant, from which the plaintiff suffered loss; and so the analogous action of "Case," or "Trespass on the Case,"³² was allowed. For some time, the action was restricted to cases in which the defendant pursued a "common calling"—i. e. that of a smith, or ferryman, or surgeon, in which he was bound to attend all comers. But, by the middle of the fifteenth century, for the general "holding out" implied in the assumption of a common calling, the alternative of a "special assumption," or undertaking might be pleaded. One or the other was necessary.³³ And so we find the allegations: assumpsit super se, emprius sur lui, manucepit, and other forms, appearing in the Writs of Case. Now these allegations do not, perhaps, necessarily imply promises; but they are very near it. Perhaps if we say that a man "takes upon himself" to do a thing, we do not necessarily allege that he promises to do it. But what if we say "he undertakes" to do it? The difference is not great. Still, in Trespass on the Case, the stress was laid on the physical damage, rather than on the breach of undertaking.

Half a century after the full recognition of the Trespass class of cases, we find another model followed, viz., the Writ of Deceit. The old Writ of Deceit was very technical; it could, practically, only be used where the defendant had been guilty of trickery in legal proceedings in the King's Courts.³⁴ But, before the end of the first half of the fifteenth century, we get two cases, at least, in which the plaintiff was allowed to recover, because, although there had been no physical damage to the plaintiff or his goods, he had suffered loss by the deliberate fraud of the defendant in breaking his undertaking. In Somerton's case, three times reported,³⁵ and so, presumably, regarded as of great interest, the defendant had been employed by the plaintiff to buy a manor, and had persuaded some one else to buy it over the plaintiff's head. In a slightly later case,³⁶ the defendant had agreed to sell the plaintiff a manor, and subsequently enfeoffed a third person. In each case the plaintiff suffered damage, though not of a physical kind. The second case is called a "Bill of Deceit"; but, as it was brought in the King's Bench, this probably only meant that the fiction of the marshal's custody was employed.³⁷ Any way, these two cases bring us a step nearer to a law of contract. We may call them the Deceit or misfeasance cases.

Lastly, we come to the non-feasance group. Here the sole ground of alleged liability is the failure to fulfil a promise; and, when this group is established, we have clearly a law of simple contract. Unfortunately at this stage, another and more obscure question arises.

So early as the year 1424, we find a case which looks very much like one of mere non-feasance. It was an action against a mill-maker for failing to build a mill according to his promise.²⁸ The action seems to have been allowed, with some hesitation. Professor Ames strongly urges that this and a slightly later case to the same effect²⁹ were premature freaks, due to the idiosyncrasy of a particular judge, and that it is not till the very end of the sixteenth century, that we get a definite legal recognition of the truth that a man may be just as much harmed by his neighbor's mere non-fulfillment of his promise, as by his active fraud or deceit.³⁰ But by this time it had been perceived, that to allow an action to be brought for the non-fulfillment of any promise would be to open the door too wide; and accordingly we find, that only those promises were actionable which had been given in return for some recompense received by the promisor, or some detriment suffered by the promisee.

This is the famous doctrine of "consideration," without which no simple contract is valid. How it exactly arose, we do not know. The writer suggests that it is a compound doctrine, of which the positive side (recompense or benefit to the promisor) is a reflection from the original character of the older action of Debt, while the negative side (detriment to the promisee) is merely a slight antedating of the damage which was necessary to support an action of "Case." The action of Debt, as we have seen, was, originally, an action to recover something of the plaintiffs which had been bailed to the defendant (quid pro quo). Strictly speaking, the damage to the plaintiff should have been that which he suffered by breach of the defendant's promise; but it is not difficult to see how this requirement could be changed into damage suffered in exchange for the promise. Whatever be the explanation, the doctrine itself was clearly known by the beginning of the sixteenth century; for it was made the basis of an elaborate discussion in the Dialogues between a Doctor of Divinity and a Student of the Laws of England, published in 1523, and attributed to St. Germain. The parties are debating the respective merits of the Canon and English Laws; and they come into sharp conflict over the theory of the simple contract. The Doctor wishes to make the enforceability of a contract depend on the occasion on which it was made, and the intention of the promisor.³¹ This is the old doctrine of causae, with a new touch of casuistry added. The Student maintains the doctrine of English Law; though, oddly enough, he does not, in that place, employ the word "consideration." Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio, he alleges, with a triumphant quotation from the Institutes; but then he goes on to explain, that a "nude contract" is one made without any "recompense" appointed for it—an explanation which would have sounded strange to a Roman lawyer. It is the Doctor who uses the word "consideration" in the chapter; and, with him, it obviously means merely "motive" or "object" in which sense it is also adopted by the Student in another passage,³² when he says that the "consideration" of the Statute of Fines was to ensure the certainty of titles. But the word had become appropriate to the new doctrine by the middle of the sixteenth century, and appears in the Reports shortly afterwards.³³ By that time, it was admitted that the consideration to support a simple promise might itself be a promise;³⁴ and so the purely executory contract became a recognized institution. After that, it was not difficult to clear away the surviving vestiges of its origin, and allow it to appear as a substantive and distinct institution. In 1520,³⁵ the Court had allowed Assumpsit to be brought against executors, in spite of the fact that it was then, in form, clearly an action of Tort; but this decision had been scoffed at by Fitzherbert.³⁶ In 1557,³⁷ however, and again in 1611,³⁸ the Court allowed Assumpsit against executors, and thus removed a substantial grievance; for, as has been pointed out, Debt could not be maintained against them where the deceased could have "waged his law." Finally, it was resolved in Slade's Case,³⁹ that "every contract executory imports in itself an assumpsit"; and thus the necessity of suing in Debt⁴⁰ which let in the "wager of law," was abolished, practically in all cases. This case gave rise to the well-known sub-division of contractual actions into indebitatus assumpsit (where the defendant was really liable apart from express promise, e. g. for rent), and special assumpsit, where the promise was the true cause of action. Thus freed entirely from its early restrictions, the Action of Assumpsit took its place in the legal armoury as the typical action of contract; though, as we have seen, it was, historically, an action founded on a tort. Thus it became possible, also, to classify personal actions into actions of Contract and actions of Tort.

CHAPTER I.

SEALED CONTRACTS.¹

James Barr Ames, Lectures on Legal History, pp. 98-99.² When the Germans became familiar with Roman civilization it was natural to put the terms of the agreement into a written document, which was passed to the creditor along with the wadia [pledge]; and in time the wadia itself was omitted. This document, adding the requirement of a seal to make it formal, is the English covenant.

The earliest covenants we find in the books seem to touch the land.³ The earliest instance of a covenant not relating to land is of the time of Edward III.⁴ The earliest covenants were regarded as grants, and suit could not be brought on the covenant itself. So a covenant to stand seised was a grant, and executed itself. The same is true of a covenant for the payment of money; it was a grant of the money and executed itself. For failure to pay the money, debt would lie.⁵ Afterwards an action of covenant was allowed, so that today there is an option.

A seal was always essential. It was considered, formerly, of much greater importance than now. Glanville says that if the defendant admits that a seal upon the instrument is his seal, but denies the execution of the instrument, he is, nevertheless, bound, for he must set it down to his own carelessness that he could not keep his seal. The case supposed would arise where the seal had been lost or stolen. There is a case to this effect in the time of John.⁶ The doctrine was somewhat qualified by the time of Bracton.⁷ He seems to think that a covenantor would not be liable unless it was by his negligence that the matter occurred, as by leaving the seal in the possession of his bailiff or his wife.⁸ In the time of Edward I⁹ is a case on the same principle, being a petition to the King that a certain seal that had been lost should no longer have validity. In Riley's Memorial of London¹⁰ it is said that public cry was made that A. had lost his seal and that he would no longer be bound by the same. Riley¹¹ also gives an account of making a new seal for the city of London, and it is stated, as if it was important, that the old seal was broken with due formality. Of course this doctrine has left no trace in modern times.

John H. Wigmore, A Treatise on the System of Evidence in Trials at Common Law, Vol. IV, § 2426, p. 3414. The rise of the seal brings a new era for written documents, not merely by furnishing them with a means of authenticating genuineness, but also by rendering them indisputable as to the terms of the transaction and thus dispensing with the summoning of witnesses. The vogue of the seal and of the transaction-witness wax and wane, the one relatively to the other. This legal value of the seal was the result of a practice working from above downwards, from the King to the people at large. It is involved, in the beginning, with the Germanic principle that the King's word is undisputable. Who gives him the lie, forfeits life. The King's seal to a document makes the truth of the document uncontestable. This leads, along another line, to the modern doctrine of the verity of judicial records. * * * For private men's documents, its significance is that the indisputability of a document sealed by the King marked it with an extraordinary quality, much to be sought after. As the habitual use of the seal extends downwards, its valuable attributes go with it. First, a few counts and bishops acquire seals; and then their courtesies are sought in lending the impress and guarantee of their seal to some document of an inferior person, as serving him in future instead of witnesses. Finally the ordinary freeman comes usually to have a seal; and his seal too makes a document indisputable—at least, by himself. This extension of the seal begins in the 1000s, and is completed by the 1200s.

John Cordy Jeaffreson, A Book About Lawyers, (1867 ed.) Vol. I, pp. 21, 23-24. In days when writing was an art almost entirely confined to religious persons, sealing was a far more important and efficacious means of testifying the genuineness of documents than it is at present. * * *

In estimating the security given by seals, the reader must bear in mind that the forger of deeds in older time had not overcome all difficulties, when he had surreptitiously obtained a seal. The mere act of sealing was by no means the simple matter that it is now-a-days. To place the seal on fit labels rightly placed; and in all respects to make the fictitious deed an accurate imitation of the intended deeds to which the particular seal of a particular great man was applied, were no trifling feats of dexterity, ere scribes had congregated into fraternities, and law-stationers had been called into existence. To get a supply of suitable wax was an undertaking by no means easy in accomplishment. Sealing wax was not to be bought by the pound or stick in every street of feudal London. Cire d'Espagne—sealing wax akin to the bright, vermillion compound now in use—was not invented till the middle of the sixteenth century. William Howe assures his readers that "the earliest letter known to have been sealed with it was written from London, August 3, 1554, to Heingrave Philip Francis von Daun, by his agent in England, Gerrard Herman," and long after that date the manufacture of sealing wax was a secret known to comparatively few persons. In feudal England there were divers adhesive compounds used for sealing. Every keeper of an official seal had his own recipe for wax. Sometimes the wax was white; sometimes it was yellow; occasionally it was tinged with vegetable dyes; most frequently it was a mess bearing much resemblance to the dirt pies of little children. But its combination was a mystery to the vulgar; and no man could safely counterfeit a seal impression who had not at command a stock of particular sealing earth or paste, or wax. Eyes powerless to detect the falsity of a forger's handwriting, could see at a glance whether his wax was of the right colour. Moreover, the practice of attesting private deeds by public or well-known seals gave to transactions a publicity which was the most valuable sort of attestation. A simple knight could not obtain the impression of his feudal chieftain's seal without a formal request, and a full statement of the business in hand. The wealthy burgher, who obtained permission to affix a municipal seal to a private parchment, proclaimed the transaction which occasioned the request. The thriving freeholder who was allowed the use of his lord's graven device, had first sought for the privilege openly. "Quia sigillum meum plurimis est incognitum" were the words introduced into the clause of attestation; and the words show that publicity was his object. And to attain that object the seal was pressed in open court, in the presence of many witnesses.

Indeed the process of sealing was so much more respected than the act of signing, that in some countries the practice of sealing was alone employed; and in England the seal was long regarded as that which imparted validity to a deed, whilst signature was held to be a needless ceremony.

PILLOW, PLAINTIFF IN ERROR, v. ROBERTS.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1851. 13 How. 472, 14 L. Ed. 228.)

GRIER, J.¹² Roberts, the defendant in error, was plaintiff below, in an action of ejectment for 160 acres of land. * * * On the trial the plaintiff below gave in evidence a patent for the land in dispute, from the United States to Zimri V. Henry, dated May 7th, 1835; and then offered a deed from said Henry to himself dated November 10th, 1849. This deed purported to be acknowledged before the clerk of the Circuit Court of Walworth County, in the State of Wisconsin, and was objected to, * * * 3dly. Because the seal of the Circuit Court authenticating the acknowledgment was an impression stamped on paper, and not "on wax, wafer, or any other adhesive or tenacious substance." * * * [The objections were overruled.]

Formerly wax was the most convenient, and the only material used to receive and retain the impression of a seal. Hence it was said: "Sigillum est cera impressa; quia cera, sine impressione, non est sigillum." But this is not an allegation, that an impression without wax is not a seal. And for this reason courts have held that an impression made on wafers or other adhesive substance capable of receiving an impression, will come within the definition of cera impressa. If, then, wax be construed to be merely a general term including within it any substance capable of receiving and retaining the impression of a seal, we cannot perceive why paper, if it have that capacity, should not as well be included in the category. The simple and powerful machine, now used to impress public seals, does not require any soft or adhesive substance to receive or retain their impression. The impression made by such a power on paper is as well defined, as durable, and less likely to be destroyed or defaced by vermin, accident, or intention, than that made on wax. It is the seal which authenticates, and not the substance on which it is impressed; and where the court can recognize its identity, they should not be called upon to analyze the material which exhibits it. In Arkansas, the presence of wax is not necessary to give validity to a seal; and the fact that the public officer in Wisconsin had not thought proper to use it, was sufficient to raise the presumption that such was the law or custom in Wisconsin till the contrary was proved. It is time that such objections to the validity of seals should cease. The court did not err, therefore, in overruling the objections to the deed offered by the plaintiff.

* * *

[But, for other reasons,]

*Judgment reversed.*¹³

¹³ "Though wax and wafer are most frequently spoken of as the material of seals, yet other things were used. The bulls of the Pope were sealed with lead or gold. Jac. Law Dict., Seals. And in our state, as well as elsewhere, seals were very commonly impressions made upon pieces of paper annexed by a wafer, gum or paste, to the instrument sealed, or two such pieces of paper were secured to each other, and to tapes passing through the paper, or parchment of the instrument by wafer or other adhesive substance, and the impression made upon one of these pieces of paper.

"It seems to us, then, that there is nothing necessary to constitute a seal but some material of a suitable character to receive an impression, and an impression bearing the character of a seal upon it. Where wax or a paper annexed by wafer, were fixed to an instrument in the place of a seal, and with the apparent intention that they should be seals, the court would not look curiously to discover the impression made upon it; but where there was nothing but the impression made upon the paper to indicate that there was a seal, the court would not regard anything as a seal but such a clear and manifest impression as left no doubt as to its purpose.

"The cases of Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns. 239; Bank v. Gray, 2 Hill 227, and Bank v. Haight, 3 Hill 493, are inconsistent with these views: the two latter holding directly that a mere impression on the paper is not a seal." Bell, J., in Allen v. Sullivan R. R. Co., 32 N. H. 446, 450-451 (1855).

In Hendee v. Pinkerton, 14 Allen (Mass.) 381, 388 (1867), in speaking of the mortgage before him which bore an impression of the seal of the corporation mortgagor stamped upon and into the substance of the paper itself, Foster, J., said: "In the present instance we have a durable impression upon a tenacious substance made for the express purpose of solemn authentication. And after our own courts have allowed wafers instead of wax, and paper with gum or mucilage instead of wafers, there seems little reason why we should

JONES & TEMPLE v. LOGWOOD.

(Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1791. 1 Wash. 42.)

This was an action of debt upon a bond—plea payment. At the trial the plaintiff offered a writing to the jury as evidence in support of the declaration, to which there was no seal but a scroll; and the court permitting this writing to go to the jury, the defendants excepted.

The President [Pendleton].¹⁴ It is important that the court should settle a question so interesting to the community as the following: whether a scroll used as a seal, constituted a good bond before the act of 1788 or whether to make it a seal, wax or something capable of impression, and impressed, was necessary. Acts of Parliament in England, and acts of Assembly in this country, frequently speak of seals; but none of them define what shall constitute a seal. Nor is there an adjudged case recollected, which determines that a seal must be necessarily something impressed on wax. To consider it upon the reason of the thing; a seal is required to give solemnity to the act; and I cannot perceive a difference, hesitate also to allow the sufficiency of an impression of a corporate seal on the paper itself."

In Pease v. Lawson, 33 Mo. 35 (1862), one question was whether a letter of attorney which recited that it was sealed, really was sealed. It appeared on inspection that there was no scrawl by way of seal made with pen or pencil, but there was a small round piece of paper, cut into scallops on the edges, attached to the end of the name, the usual place for a seal, with a wafer, but no impression made thereon. Dryden, J., for the court said:

"In this case it is not pretended the statutory mode [of a 'scrawl by way of seal'] was adopted; so, that, unless what was done comes up to the common law standard, the letter of attorney is not a sealed instrument in the sense of the law. Does it, then, reach this standard? The point of the objection is that no impression was made on the wafer, and so, although everything else had happened necessary to a valid sealing, yet the want of this crowning requisite was fatal. Now, as in the days of the greatest strictness, the common law prescribed no particular instrument with which to make the impression, nor fixed the breadth or length or depth it should be made, and as the execution of the paper was attended with the usual circumstances of deliberation, and as it was manifestly intended as a sealed instrument, and as the scalloped paper, when applied to the wafer and caused to adhere, must from a physical necessity have made an impression, we feel warranted, for the effectuation of the clear intention of the parties, in regarding the scalloped paper a sufficient instrument, and the impression made by it to cause cohesion, a sufficient impression to comply with the requirement of the law."

In Bowen v. Lazalere, 44 Mo. 382 (1869), where "the only sealing" of a power of attorney was that "opposite the signature in the usual place of a seal, a small piece of colored paper in the form of a seal was attached and made to adhere by the application and use of mucilage," the fact that mucilage was used instead of a wafer was held not to differentiate the case from Pease v. Lawson, supra, and accordingly the power of attorney was held to be under seal.

in point of solemnity, between the act of impressing wax and that of making a scroll.

Public corporate bodies have a known and fixed seal; and it is necessary that their acts should be under that common seal. In that instance an impression may be necessary, to shew that the act has been done in their corporate capacity.

But what is the private seal of an individual? Does an impression furnish any criterion by which to decide whether it be his seal or not? It is true that some few gentlemen have seals which impress their family coats of arms; some have such as impress the initials of their names; but these are rare indeed when compared with the great body of the community who have no seals, and who use such as are placed on the writing for them, and make them their own by acknowledging them to be such. In truth and reality then, it is unimportant whether this adoption be of wax or a scroll. Lord Coke in his 2nd Institute, in a commentary upon a statute which speaks of a seal, says "a seal is wax with an impression." But there is neither an act of Parliament nor an adjudged case to bind the court.¹⁵ It was his opinion only, founded probably on the practice of the day, and if that gives a binding rule, we may, by going further back, discover a period of 15 "President Pendleton, in the case of Jones and Temple v. Logwood, 1 Wash. Rep. 42, which was cited upon the argument, said that he did not know of any adjudged case that determines that a seal must necessarily be something impressed on wax; and he seemed to think that there was nothing but Lord Coke's opinion to govern the question. He certainly could not have examined this point with his usual diligence. The ancient authorities are explicit, that a seal does, in legal contemplation, mean an impression upon wax. 'It is not requisite,' according to Perkins (§ 134), 'that there be for every grantor who is named in the deed a several piece of wax, for one piece of wax may serve for all the grantors if every one put his seal upon the same piece of wax.' And Brooke (tit. Faits, 30 and 17) uses the same language. In Lightfoot and Butler's Case, which was in the Exchequer, 29 Eliz. (2 Leon. 21) the Barons were equally explicit as to the essence of a seal, though they did not all concur upon the point, as stated in Perkins. One of them said that twenty men may seal with one seal upon one piece of wax only, and that should serve for them all, if they all laid their hands upon the seal; but the other two Barons held that though they might all seal a deed with one seal, yet it must be upon several pieces of wax. Indeed this point, that the seal was an impression upon wax, seems to be necessarily assumed and taken for granted in several other passages which might be cited from Perkins and Brooke, and also in Selden's Notes to Fortescue (De Laud. p. 72); and the nature of a seal is no more a matter of doubt in the old English law than it is that a deed must be written upon paper or parchment, and not upon wood or stone. Nor has the common law ever been altered in Westminster Hall upon this subject, for in the late case of Adam v. Keer, 1 Bos. & Puller, 360, it was made a question whether a bond executed in Jamaica, with a scrawl of the pen, according to the custom of that island, should operate as such in England, even upon the strength of that usage." Kent, C. J., in Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns. 239, 246, 247 (1810).

time when the impression was made with the eye tooth. There was some utility in that custom, since the tooth impressed was the man's own, and furnished a test in case of forgery.¹⁶ But both are founded on the usage of the times. Scrolls have been long substituted for seals in this country. The party acknowledges the scroll to be his seal, and as such this court will consider it. If there had been a positive law to bind the court, we must have obeyed it, however inconvenient; but since none is shewn or recollected, we will not make a precedent which would not only let loose great numbers of individuals from their engagements, but all or most of the executors, administrators, guardians and perhaps public collectors, from the force of their bonds; a decision which would dishonor government; relax public and private security, and convulse the state.

The late act, if it operates, is conclusive; if it does not, it is at least a legislative construction of the law in general; agreeable to, and adding strength to, that of the court. On this point there is no error. * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*¹⁷

¹⁷ "He was a bold fellow who first in these colonies, and particularly in Pennsylvania, in time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, substituted the appearance of a seal by the circumflex of a pen, which has been sanctioned by usage and the adjudication of the courts, as equipollent with a stamp containing some effigies or inscriptions on stone or metal." Brackenridge, J., in Alexander v. Jameson, 5 Bin. (Pa.) 238, 244-245 (1812).

In Hendee v. Pinkerton, 14 Allen 381, 388 (1867) Foster, J., said: "If we should pronounce every scroll a seal, we should speedily be called upon to take the next step of pronouncing every flourish to be a scroll, and nothing would remain of the ancient formality of sealing."

"Is there any more solemnity in a bit of wafer than in a scroll made with a pen? The feeling of solemnity, if any, attending the execution of a sealed instrument, arises from a sense of the effect of the instrument, and not from the symbol used to characterize it as a sealed instrument; and as to the remark of the Court [Kent, C. J., in Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 239], that to adopt a scroll for a seal would be to abolish all distinction between writings sealed and writings not sealed, I apprehend, with great respect, it was not well considered." Halsted, C., in Corrigan v. Trenton Delaware Falls Co., 1 Halst. Ch. 52 (1845).

In Appeal of William Hacker, Trustee, 121 Pa. St. 192, (1888) the question was whether a power required to be exercised by the donee of the power "by writing under hand and seal in nature of a last will and testament" was exercised by a will which ended: "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal. Ellen Wain —", Clark, J., said:

"Was the will of Ellen Wain under seal? * * * A seal is not necessarily of any particular form or figure; when not of wax it is usually made in the form of a scroll, but the letters 'L. S.' or the word 'Seal,' inclosed in brackets, or in some other design, are in frequent use. It may, however, consist of the outline without any enclosure; it may have a dark ground or a light one; it

LANGLEY v. OWENS.

(Supreme Court of Florida, Division A, 1906. 52 Fla. 302, 42 So. 457, 11 Ann. Cas. 247.)

WHITFIELD, J.¹⁸ The declaration, filed January 20, 1905, in the Circuit Court for Escambia county in this cause, is as follows: "The plaintiff, T. E. Owens, by his attorney, sues the defendant, Frank Langley, for that prior to the institution of this suit, on the 11th day of May, A. D. 1893, the defendant by his three promissory notes under seal, which notes are attached hereto and are hereby made a part hereof, promised to pay to the firm of Weinberg & Hays the sum of $97.37 thirty days after date, and the sum of $100 sixty days after date, and the sum of $100 ninety days after date; that the said payees thereafter for a valuable consideration indorsed the said notes and delivered them to the plaintiff; that the defendant has not paid said notes, or any part thereof, though often requested so to do. Wherefore plaintiff sues and claims damages in the sum of six hundred dollars."

Attached to the declaration are three notes, similarly executed, one of which is as follows:

may be in the form of a circle, an ellipse, or a scroll, or it may be irregular in form; it may be a simple dash or flourish of the pen: Long v. Ramsey, 1 S. & R. 72. Its precise form cannot be defined; that, in each case, will depend wholly upon the taste or fancy of the person who makes it.

"The mere fact that in the testimonium clause the testatrix states that she has affixed her hand and seal, is insufficient to constitute the instrument a writing under seal, if in fact there be no seal; but if there be any mark or impression which might reasonably be taken for a seal, this statement of the testatrix will certainly afford the strongest evidence that the mark was so intended. * * *

"Whether or not any mark or impression shall be held to be a seal, depends wholly upon the intention of the party executing the instrument, as exhibited on the face of the paper itself. The dash which follows the signature in this case, it must be conceded, is not in the usual or ordinary form of a seal, but as no particular form is prescribed by law, we think that upon a consideration of the plain requirements of the writing creating the power, and of the manifest purpose and effort of the testatrix to execute that power, in the manner designated, and her avowed purpose to affix a seal, together with the presence of a mark or flourish of the pen, which may be taken as such, we are justified in assuming that the mark was made and intended for a seal, and that the writing is in this respect in compliance with the donor's directions. It is said that the same or a similar mark is found in other parts of the will, used for punctuation, and that this is a circumstance evidencing a different intention of the testatrix. But if the testatrix did use a mark in this form indifferently for a comma, a colon, or a period, what good reason is there for supposing she did not also use it for a seal?"

"Frank Langley. (L. S.)"

The defendant presented a plea that "the said promissory notes the declaration described were not under seal, and that the above cause of action thereon did not accrue within five years before this suit." The plaintiff demurred to this plea on the grounds (1) that it appears from the record that the instrument sued on is a specialty and is not barred in five years; (2) that the said plea does not set forth any defense to the cause of action herein." This demurrer being sustained, the defendant by leave of court filed [second, third and fourth pleas to which plaintiff also demurred]

The demurrers to the second, third, and fourth pleas were sustained, and, the defendant failing to plead further, final judgment for the plaintiff was entered, and the defendant on writ of error here assigns as error the orders sustaining the demurrers to the several pleas. * * *

In support of the assignments of error it is urged here that the notes as executed should not be regarded as being under seal, and that, if it be presumed that the maker adopted as his seal the letters inclosed in brackets, as shown in the notes, such presumption can be rebutted. The argument is that the device used is not in fact either a scroll or a scrawl, but it only indicates the place where the seal should be put, if used; that the device is ambiguous, is not plainly designated as a seal, and it does not appear that the maker had the particular device in mind when signing the notes: and that since promissory notes do not require a seal, and as there is no reference to the seal in the body of the notes, it should not be conclusively presumed that the maker of the notes intended to adopt and use the device as his seal, so as to make the notes in law sealed instruments.

It is not contended that the defendant did not in fact adopt and use the character or device, "(L. S.)," as it appears to the right of his signature in the notes, but that he did not adopt and intend it as a seal.

Where there is no dispute as to the character or device used in the execution of a written instrument, it is for the court to determine whether the device as used constitutes a seal. See Beardsley v. Knight, 4 Vt. 471; Jacksonville, M. P. Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Hooper, 160 U. S. 514, 16 Sup. Ct. 379, 40 L. Ed. 515.

Chapter 4148, p. 72, Acts of 1893, which took effect April 28, 1903, provides: "That a scrawl or scroll, printed or written, affixed as a seal to any written instrument shall be as effectual as a seal. That all written instruments heretofore or hereafter made with a scrawl or scroll, printed or written, affixed as a seal are declared to be sealed instruments, and shall be construed and received in evidence as such in all the courts of this state."¹⁹ Under this statute a scrawl or scroll, affixed as a seal to the signature of the maker of a promissory note, is as effectual as a seal, and when such scrawl or scroll, printed or written, appears affixed to the maker's signature in the place usually occupied by the seal, it is, in the absence of anything in the note to the contrary, and in the absence of fraud, sufficient to give it effect as a seal. See Hudson v. Poindexter, 42 Miss. 304; Barnard v. Gantz, 140 N. Y. 249, 35 N. E. 430; Hacker's Appeal, 121 Pa. 192, 15 Atl. 500, 1 L. R. A. 861.

In 1841, under the statute then in force here, which provides that "a scrawl affixed as a seal to any instrument shall be as effectual as a seal," this court, in the case of Comerford v. Cobb, 2 Fla. 418, text 423, held that a promise in writing to pay money in which the device or character, "[]," with the word "Seal" included therein, appears opposite the signature of the maker, in the usual place for the seal, but with no reference to it in the body of the writing, was in law "a sealed instrument, and was so intended by the parties at the time of its execution." In that case the word "Seal" was in the brackets, and it is urged that such word, so used, indicated an intention to make the note a sealed instrument, and that in this case the letters "L. S.," appearing in the marks "[]," do not indicate an intention to use the device as a seal.

If the device or character, "[]," is of itself a scrawl, as it was called in Comerford v. Cobb, 2 Fla. 418, text 420, and in Bacon v. Green, 36 Fla. 325, text 336, 18 South. 870, then the device or character, "()," must also be a scrawl; and if the latter device or character is of itself a scrawl, certainly it is none the less so when the letters "L. S." are contained within it. If the word "Seal" contained within the scrawl, "[]" or "()," is evidence that the scrawl was affixed as a seal, the letters "L. S.," which are in common use in the making of sealed instruments, when they appear within a scrawl opposite the signature of the maker of the notes, are certainly evidence of the purpose for which the scrawl was used; and, as nothing to the contrary appears by the notes, it must be presumed that the maker of the notes so used the device as his seal. While a seal was not necessary in making a promissory note, the party had a right to make the promise by a sealed instrument, and by the manner of its use the device or character, "(L. S.)," was really and in effect affixed as a seal to the notes, and they were thereby in law made sealed instruments.

The act of 1893 does not require that the use of the seal, or of a scrawl or scroll as a seal, shall be referred to in the instrument,²⁰ nor that any particular scrawl or scroll shall be used. The only requirement is that a scrawl or scroll, printed or written, be affixed as a seal, to make the writing a sealed instrument. The character or device, "(L. S.)," printed or written, as it appears in the usual place for the seal, opposite the signature of the maker of the notes, is not ambiguous, since it has a definite legal meaning and effect when so used. It does not merely indicate the place where the seal should be put, because, when it is so used, the statute makes it as effectual as a seal; but it is a plainly designated scrawl or scroll affixed as a seal, within the meaning of the act of 1893 above quoted. See Comerford v. Cobb, 2 Fla. 418; Giles v. Mauldin, 7 Rich. Law (S. C.) 11; Williams v. Starr, 5 Wis. 534; Hudson v. Poindexter, 42 Miss. 304; Lorah v. Nissley, 156 Pa. 239, 27 Atl. 242; Muckleroy v. Bethany, 23 Tex. 163; Osborn v. Kistler, 35 Ohio St. 99. See, also, Sanders v. Ransom, 37 Fla. 457, 20 South. 530.

The demurrer to the first plea was properly sustained. * * *

The notes are in law sealed instruments, and pleas which in effect admit the execution of the notes as alleged in the declaration, but aver that it was not intended that they should be executed as sealed instruments are demurrable. * * *

Re SMITH.

OSWELL v. SHEPHERD.

(Court of Appeal, 1892. 67 L. T. Rep. (N. S.) 64.)

LINDLEY, L. J.²² In this case we are asked to say that the document in question was sealed at the time of its execution. It is a bond, and it was

Since a corporate seal does not necessarily show that the instrument is sealed, it has been held that if the instrument bearing the corporate seal does not purport to be sealed it is a simple contract. Smith v. Woman's Medical College, 110 Md. 441 (1909). But see Grand Lodge, etc., v. State Bank of Florida, (Fla.), 84 So. 528 (1920), where the contrary position is taken on the ground that since the corporation need not affix its seal to any instrument not required to be under seal its use of a seal, nothing to the contrary appearing, evidences a purpose to have a sealed instrument.

²¹ In Jackson v. Security Mut. Life Ins. Co., 233 Ill. 161 (1908) the word "Seal", which was on a release when the signature was placed before it, was held to be a seal under a statute authorizing a scrawl to be affixed by way of seal. In that case there was a bracket about the word seal and it was disputed whether the bracket was there at the time of signature or was placed there later, but the court disregarded the bracket.

On "Seal" as a sufficient seal, see 11 Ann. Cas. 1110, note. On "L. S." as a sufficient seal, see 11 Ann. Cas. 250, note. On the definition and requisites of a seal, see 1 A. R. C. 181, note. See also 1 Am. L. Rev. 638.

prepared by a solicitor, and was copied by his clerk, or by a law stationer. It is stamped as a bond and intended to be executed as a bond, but it does not bear on the face of it any trace of a seal. The lady who executed it has signed it, and it bears the words "sealed with my seal," and the attestation clause states that the bond was "signed, sealed and delivered" by the obligor. But those words are not in the handwriting of the person who signed, but in the handwriting of the law stationer. It is quite obvious that the bond, when copied was sent to Mrs. Smith, who signed it. Now, the attesting witness has not been called to give evidence as to whether the bond was sealed or not, and there is absolutely nothing to show that it was actually sealed. It seems to me perfectly impossible for us to say that the document was sealed. We have been pressed with authorities, but authorities are not of use on a question such as this. We think therefore that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BOWEN, L. J. I am of the same opinion. A seal need not consist of wax nor of wafer. It may be a mark affixed to the document. As was said by Byles, J. in the case which has been referred to of Re Sandilands, (24 L. T. Rep. n. s. 273; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 411, 413) the sealing of a deed may be done by the end of a ruler or anything else. So long as it takes the place of a seal, that will do. But the difficulty of this case is that there is not a scintilla of evidence that the bond was in fact sealed. It is true that there is a signature to the bond by the obligor, and there are the words "sealed with my seal." But that is perfectly consistent with this, that the person, though about to affix the seal, omitted actually to do so. The attesting witness has not been called to give evidence as to whether the bond was sealed or not. In this case the document ought to have been sealed and has not been sealed. We have been pressed with the authority of Re Sandilands, ubi supra, but it seems to me that that case is distinguishable from the present. And, as Lindley, L. J. said in the later case of The National Provincial Bank of England v. Jackson (55 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458; 33 Ch. Div. 1, 14), Re Sandilands, ubi supra, was a "good-natured decision, in which I am not sure that I could have concurred." In Re Sandilands, a deed was sent out to Melbourne under a special commission for execution and acknowledgment by certain married women. When sent out the deed had pieces of green ribbon attached to the places where the seals should be, but no wax or other material to receive the impression, and it was returned to this country in the same state, but in all other respects duly executed. The attestation clause states that the deed was "sealed, signed and delivered," one of the attesting witnesses being the Mayor of Melbourne, and two of the commissioners certified that the married women had produced the deed before them and "acknowledged the same to be their respective acts and deeds." In these circumstances the court held that there was sufficient prima facie evidence that the deed was sealed to warrant the court in allowing it to be received and filed with the other documents by the proper officer, under 3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 74. It seemed to me that Re Sandilands was an exceptional case, and that the decision there depended upon the particular facts of that case. It does not justify the court, whenever a document is produced before it, which, though bearing no seal, purports to have been sealed, in assuming that it has actually been sealed. I cannot see my way to assuming that fact in the present case, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

KAY, L. J. * * * It is said that it is possible that any impression that may have been made may have disappeared in the lapse of time which has occurred since the bond was executed. But I do not think that such was the case. Authorities have been cited which show that the courts have gone very far in treating documents as having been duly sealed which should be executed as deeds, and have inferred that there was due fulfillment of that requirement. Under certain circumstances, and in very old documents, it might be said that the seal may have disappeared. The older the document becomes, the more likely it is that that which was a seal has in the lapse of time disappeared. But here there is no trace of anything like a seal. Indeed, there is no space opposite the name of the obligor where a seal might have been put. I confess that, in furtherance of the intention of the obligor, I should be glad to say that the document was duly sealed. But, before one can say that, one must exhaust all the evidence on the point which could be adduced. The witness who attested the signature of the obligor has not been called, so that we are unable to learn what she has to say on the subject. Counsel says that it is admitted that the signature of the obligor is genuine, and therefore that it is unnecessary to prove the signature. But has the person who claims under the bond exhausted all the evidence? At least the witness who attested the bond ought to have been called. As that has not been done it seems to me against all reason to ask the court to give this document the effect it would have had if it had been properly sealed. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

*Appeal dismissed.

 In National Provincial Bank v. Jackson, 33 Ch. D. 1, (1886), cited in the principal case, Cotton, L. J. said: "Although these instruments are expressed to be signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of the attesting witness * * * there is no trace of any seal, but merely the piece of ribbon for the usual purpose of keeping the wax on the parchment. * * * It is true that if the finger be pressed upon the ribbon that may amount to sealing, but no such inference can be drawn here where the attesting witness who has given evidence recollects nothing of the sort and when Jackson, [the solicitor grantor, a brother of the grantees,] had already committed one fraud in the matter and perhaps then intended another. The question is merely one of fact, and * * * the conclusion I come to is that the instruments never were sealed."

EAMES v. PRESTON.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1858. 20 Ill. 389.)

CATON, C. J.²⁴ This was an action of assumpsit brought against Eames, Burlingame and Gray, upon a note thus executed, "Eames, Gray & Co. []," and the only question is, whether assumpsit can be maintained on this note. If this be a sealed instrument, then assumpsit cannot be maintained upon it (1 Chit. Pl., title Assumpsit, p. 99), and this would seem to settle the question, for this is certainly an instrument under seal. If the member of the firm who executed the note had authority under seal to add the seals of all, then the seal attached is the seal of all; if he had not, then it is his seal only. In any event it is, as to him, a sealed instrument. If, as to the others, it is a simple instrument, that would not remove his seal. If one party executes an instrument and attaches his seal, and others afterwards sign it silently without attaching seals, they are presumed to adopt the seal of the first, and as to all, it is a sealed instrument.²⁵ If, however, the first sign without a seal, and the others add seals to their names, without the direction or consent of the first, then he cannot be presumed to adopt their seals as his, and it continues, as to him, a simple instrument, as it was when he first executed it.²⁶ Nor would this prevent ²⁵ "In Davis v. Burton, 3 Scam. 41, 36 Am. Dec. 511, it was held that where a bond or sealed instrument purports, on its face, to be sealed by all the signers, and there are several seals attached, but not so many as there are names, the court will presume that each signer has adopted some one of the seals already attached. To the same effect is Ryan v. Cooke, 172 Ill. 302, 50 N. E. 213. See, also, Eames v. Preston, 20 Ill. 389. The recital of the seal is not essential. If the instrument be actually sealed, it will operate as such without the recital, and the general rule is that, if there is no seal at the end, the instrument will not be held to be a specialty, although the parties in the body of the writing make mention of a seal. 2 Bouvier's Law Dic. (Rawle's Rev.) p. 1020; 9 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 147, and cases cited." Carter, J., in Jackson v. Security Mut. Life Ins. Co., 233 Ill. 161, 166-167 (1908).

"In Stabler v. Cowman, 7 G. & J. 284, where a contract in writing was entered into between two parties intended to be signed and sealed by both, but which was signed and sealed by one only, and signed by the other but not sealed, it was held that both were bound, but in different forms; that while it was the covenant of the former, it was merely the parol contract of the latter, and an action of assumpsit against him was sustained." Bartol, C. J., in Western Md. R. Co. v. Overendorff, 37 Md. 328, 334-335 (1872). See also Pearl Hominy Co. v. Lanthicum, 112 Md. 27 (1910).

"It is true that one piece of wax may serve as a seal for several persons, if each of them impresses it himself, or one for all, by proper authority, or in the presence of all, as was held in Ball v. Dunsterville, 4 T. R. 313, following Lord Lovelace's Case, W Jones, 268, but then it must appear by the deed and profess to be the seal of each, whereas here the seal appears by the deed, and professes to be, the seal not of individuals, but of a corporation." Lord Denman, C. J., in Coch v. Goodman, 2 Q. B. 580, 598 (1842).

it from being a sealed instrument as to those who deliberately attached their seals. As to one of the makers of this note, it was a sealed instrument, and assumpsit could not be maintained upon it.⁸⁷

Judgment reversed.

PARKS v. HAZLERIGG.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1845. 7 Blackford, 536, 43 Am. Dec. 106.)

SULLIVAN, J. This was an action of debt on an appeal-bond. The plaintiff declared against Hazlerigg, Kizer, Russell, and Dugan; for that the defendants, on, etc., at, etc., by their certain writing obligatory sealed with their seals, etc. acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound, etc. On oyer it appeared that the above defendants were named in the bond as obligors. There were four seals affixed to the bond, but it was signed only by Hazlerigg, Russell, and Dugan. Opposite to the fourth seal there was no signature. Demurrer to the declaration and judgment for the defendants.

This case presents the simple question, whether it is necessary to the validity of a bond, which has been sealed by the obligor, that it be signed by him also.

At common law, signing was not necessary to the validity of a deed. 2 was sealed when it was delivered. If the first signer, therefore, delivered the instrument, or authorized its delivery, after a seal had to his knowledge been attached by subsequent parties, there seems as much reason to infer an adoption of the seal from recitals in the instrument as if the unsealed signature were the last on the instrument." 1 Williston on Contracts, pp. 417-418 § 208.

On adoption of seal of another, see 1 A. R. C. 189, note.

⁸⁷ If the obligation was joint and some obligors sealed and others did not, debt was the appropriate common law action against all, if the amount recoverable was liquidated. Oldman v. Hunt, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 332, (1843); Rankin v. Roler, 8 Gratt. (Va.) 63 (1851).

In Oldham v. Hunt, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 331, 332 (1843) Reese, J. said that an instrument worded as a promissory note, sealed by one defendant but not sealed by the other, could be recovered upon in debt. He said: "The contract and liability of the defendants was joint and they can be sued jointly thereon, although one of them creates against himself evidence of a higher and more enduring character than does the other. The simple contract of the one does not merge, in such case, in the obligation of the other. Each continues liable to the plaintiff, and the paper writing is the common vinculum which makes that liability a joint one." See also Rankin v. Roller, 8 Gratt. (Va.) 63 (1851), where the court said that in the one action of debt each defendant would be entitled to make any defense which he might make in a separate action. The court in Rankin v. Roller refused to decide whether several actions could be brought, one on a simple contract and one on a sealed contract.

On the nature and effect of an instrument sealed by some but not by all of parties executing it, see 20 Ann. Cas. 1327, note.

Blacks. Comm. 305-306. Cromwell v. Grunsden, 2 Salk. 462. To this point it is not necessary to multiply authorities. It has been intimated that since the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, signing, as well as sealing, is necessary, 2 Blacks. Comm., supra; but the better opinion seems to be, that the statute has made no alteration in this respect, since it applies only to mere agreements and not to deeds. 1 Shepp. Touch., by Preston, 56, note 24; Hurlstone on Bonds, 8. "Signing," says Gresley, in his Equity Evidence, p. 121, in speaking of the execution of a deed, "is not ordinarily essential, but it is always as well to prove it as a regular part of the transaction. Besides, it assists the other parts of the proof of execution, for the circumstance that the party has written his name opposite to the seal, on an instrument bearing on its face a declaration that it was sealed by him, is prima facie evidence of sealing and delivery." The common law, therefore, remains unchanged, and signing was not essential to the validity of the bond declared on in this case. If the plaintiff can prove that Kizer, with the other defendants, sealed the bond, the proof will support the declaration, which is in the usual form. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

Per Curiam. The judgment is reversed with costs. Cause remanded, etc.²⁸

²⁸ See Jeffery v. Underwood, 1 Ark. 108, 112-113 (1838).

But as to conveyances of real estate, it is sometimes said, as by Carter, J., in Osby v. Reynolds, 260 Ill. 576, 581 (1913): "Under the common law a deed, to be binding, must be signed, sealed and delivered by the parties." And a statute may make it so. Local statutes should be consulted.

Signing is of course of practical importance.

"The signing of a deed is now the material part of the execution; the seal has become a mere form, and a written or ink seal, as it is called, is good." By the court in McDill's Lessee v. McDill, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 63 (1782).

If the clear intention of the parties is that a release shall not be effective until signed, such intention will prevail. Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 546 (1874).

If there is a signature, there is authority to the effect that the sealing has to be a separate act.

"It was the fact that the obligor did two independent acts, first that of signing, and secondly, that of sealing, that in theory of the law gave so much more solemnity to the contract, and imparted so much greater deliberation, and therefore entitled it to be enforced without any proof of a particular consideration or recital that it was for value received * * *." Dewey, J., in Bates v. Boston & N. Y. C. R. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 251, 254 (1865). Yet the first act, as affixing the seal, might be done by the printer even under that doctrine. Royal Bank of Liverpool v. Grand Junction R. R. & Depot Co., 100 Mass. 444 (1868).

TUPPER and others v. FOULKES.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1861. 9 C. B. (N. S.) 797.)

This was an action brought to recover from the defendant his proportion of certain expenses which had been incurred by the plaintiffs as trustees under a deed of arrangement entered into between one Richard Clements and his creditors, of whom the defendant was one.

The defendant pleaded, amongs other pleas, non est factum. Verdict for the plaintiff. Rule nisi for new trial.

WILLIAMS, J.† * * * The deed having been executed by the son in his own name, thus,—“John William Foulkes for Thomas Foulkes,”—it was brought into a room in which the defendant was, and, the deed being shewn to him, he was asked whether his son had authority to execute it for him and whether he adopted the signature, and the defendant answered that his son had authority and that he adopted the deed as his; and there was proof that he subsequently acted as if the deed was a valid deed. This clearly amounted to a second delivery. It has long been established that to constitute a delivery, it is not necessary that the party should take the document in his hand and say, “I deliver this as my act and deed.” Anything to shew that he treated the deed as his deed is enough. Several cases are put in Sheppard’s Touchstone, 8th Ed. p. 58, mostly taken from Lord Coke; amongst others,—“If the deed be sealed and lying in a window or on a table, and I use these or the like words, ‘there it is; take it as my deed,’ this is a good delivery, and doth perfect the deed; for, as the deed may be delivered by words, without deeds, so may it also be delivered by deeds, without words.” Here it is plain upon the evidence that the deed being in the room and already sealed, and his name being affixed to it, the defendant in effect says “I recognize that as my deed.” The case of Hudson v. Revet, 5 Bingh. 368, 2 M. & P. 663, as recognized by Lord Wensleydale in Hibblewhite v. M’Morine, 6 M. & W. 200, shews that there was abundant evidence to prove the affirmative of the issue.

*Rule discharged.*²⁹

† The statement of facts is abbreviated. The opinions of Erle C. J., and of Willes and Keating, JJ., are omitted, as is part of the opinion of Williams, J.

²⁹ “In Bryan v. Wash, 2 Gilm. 557, it was held that no particular form is necessary to constitute a delivery. It may be by acts without words, or by words without acts, or by both [acts and words. Byars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429, 423]. Anything which clearly manifests the intention of the grantor and the person to whom it is delivered, that the deed shall presently become operative and effectual, that the grantor loses all control over it, and that by it the grantee is to become possessed of the estate constitutes a sufficient delivery.” Craig, C. J., in Benneson v. Aiken, 102 Ill. 284, 287 (1882).

In Storey v. Storey, 214 Fed. 973, 976 (1914), Baker, Circuit Judge, said of the delivery of promissory notes:

“Delivery is a composite act. There must be both a manual transfer, actual or constructive, and an operation of minds intending to enter into the contract. In the ages-old strife for predominance between objective or external and subjective or internal measurements of conduct, evolution has been away from

And in the law of commercial paper, between the original parties, the animus contrahendi has become the predominant element."

In Bogle v. Bogle, 35 Wis. 659, 667 (1874) Ryan, C. J., in speaking of delivery of a deed of conveyance said that the authorities "establish that there is no set ritual of delivery; that when a deed is executed, and the minds of the parties to it meet, expressly or tacitly, in the purpose to give it present effect, the deed is validly delivered; and that such meeting of minds may be gathered from acts or signs, words or silence, in multitudinous variety of circumstances."

Here may appropriately be noted Professor Williston's statement that "One may guess that study of the civil law was responsible for the substitution of the subjective test of that law for the objective standard of the common law." 1 Williston on Contracts, p. 423, n.

Co.*, 198 Fed. 475 (1912), one who purported to act as agent for the owner, but who was in fact without authority, took out a fire insurance policy on the owner's property, and it was held that the owner could ratify the insurance contract and hold the company, though the ratification came after the property was destroyed and after the owner knew of such destruction, the insurance company not having cancelled the insurance.

In Adams v. Adams, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 185 (1874), Hunt, J., for the court said: "Although a trustee may never have heard of the deed [to him as trustee], the title vests in him, subject to a disclaimer on his part. Such disclaimer will not, however, defeat the conveyance as a transfer of the equitable interest to a third person," (p. 192), i. e., will not defeat it as to the equitable interest created by the conveyance in the cestui que trust. See Mallott v. Wilson, [1903] 2 Ch. 494.

"The mere affixing the seal does not render it a deed; but as soon as there are acts or words sufficient to show that it is intended by the party to be executed as his deed presently binding on him, it is sufficient. The most apt and expressive mode of indicating such an intention is to hand it over, saying: 'I deliver this as my deed;' but any other words or acts that sufficiently show that it was intended to be finally executed will do as well. And it is clear on the authorities, as well as the reason of the thing, that the deed is binding on the obligor before it comes into the custody of the obligee, may, before he even knows of it; though, of course, if he has not previously assented to the making of the deed the obligee may refuse it." Blackburn, J., in Xenos v. Wickham, L. R. 2 H. L. Cas. 296, 312 (1866), citing Butler and Baker's Case, reported supra.

"It is true that judges have said with more solemnity than I think the occasion warranted, that no one can have an estate thrust upon him against his will, and that consequently a delivery of a deed to a stranger, for the use of the grantee, is of no effect until assented to by the latter. How much weight this argument is entitled to may be judged of by the fact that estates are every day thrust upon people by last will and testament; and it would certainly sound somewhat novel to say that the devisees were of no effect until assented to by the devisees. If a father should die testate, devising an estate to his daughter, and the latter should afterwards die without a knowledge of the will, it would hardly be contended that the devise became void for want of acceptance, and that the heirs of the devisee must lose the estate. Neither will it be denied that equitable estates are every day thrust upon people by deeds or assignments, made in trust for their benefit, nor will it be said that such beneficiaries take nothing until they assent. Add to these the estates that are thrust upon people by the statute of descent, and we begin to estimate the value of the argument that a man shall not be made a property holder against his will, and that courts should be astute to shield him from such a wrong.

"It is certainly true, as a general rule, that acceptance, by the grantee, is necessary to constitute a good delivery, for a man may refuse even a gift. * * * But where the grant is a pure, unqualified gift, I think the true rule is that the presumption of acceptance can be rebutted only by proof of dissent; and it matters not that the grantee never knew of the conveyance, for as his assent is presumed from its beneficial character, the presumption can be overthrown only by proof that he did know of and rejected it. If this is not so, how can a deed be made to an infant of such tender years as to be incapable of assent? Is it the law that if a father make a deed or gift to his infant child, and deliver it to the recorder to be recorded for the use of the child, and to vest the estate in it, the deed is of no effect until the child grow to years of intelligence and give its consent? May the estate, in the meantime, be taken for the subsequently contracted debts of the father, or will the statute of limitations begin to run in favor of a trespasser upon the idea that the title remains in the adult? Or will the conveyance entirely fail, if either grantor or grantee die before the latter assent I do not so understand the law. In such a case, the acceptance of the grantee is a presumption of law arising from the beneficial nature of the grant, and not a mere presumption of an actual acceptance. And for the same reason that the law makes the presumption, it does not allow it to be disproved by anything short of actual dissent." Thurman, C. J., in Lessee of John Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Oh. St. 377, 386-388 (1854).

"The importance of a deed was due originally to the rule of evidence that a party was bound by all statements and promises therein contained. The theory that mutual assent had any connection with the making of a deed was unknown to the common law. The requirement of delivery, originally unnecessary, was added in order to make the deed what it purported to be, the act and deed of the party bound by it. The theory that acceptance is necessary ignores the historical development of the contract under seal as a formal contract dependent solely upon its execution for its validity." Harriman on Contracts, 2 ed. § 83.

In Baxter v. Baxter, 44 N. C. 341, 342 (1853) Battle, J., said: "A deed may be delivered to a stranger for the use of the grantee, or bargainee, and as it may be to his advantage his acceptance of it will be presumed until the contrary appears; but as it may also be to his prejudice, or whether to his prejudice or not, he is not bound to accept it; he may disagree to it, and then it will become inoperative. * * * The principle is the same where a deed is

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1871. 58 Ill. 310, 11 Am. Rep. 67.)

MCALLISTER, J.³¹ The first point which claims the consideration of the court is, whether the deed from Buckner and wife to Henry W. Kingsbury was ever so far legally executed as to become operative. It was signed, sealed and acknowledged at Louisville, Ky., May 15th, 1861, in the absence, and without the knowledge or assent of Kingsbury; then sent to Chicago, by Buckner to Mitchell, a stranger to the transaction, not authorized by the grantee to receive it, but with the simple direction from Buckner to have it recorded. It was placed on file on the 17th of May, and there remained until after the death of Kingsbury, occurring in Sept., 1862. There is no evidence that Kingsbury ever had it in his possession, or even saw it, but it is quite conclusive the other way.

"It is necessary to the validity of a deed that there be a grantee willing to accept it. It is a contract, a parting with property by the grantor, and an acceptance thereof by the grantee." Jackson v. Bodle, 20 Johns. R. 184.

In Jackson v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Cases, 114, the court said: "It is also essential to the legal operation of a deed that the grantee assents to receive it. It can not be imposed on him and there can be no delivery without acceptance."

This rule is expressly recognized in Herbert v. Herbert, Breese, 278, where the court * * * [however, makes a statement which, taken literally] imports that when a deed is made to one without authority, and is delivered to a stranger for the use of him for whom it is so made, with a declaration by the grantor to that effect, then there is a delivery which makes the deed operative, whether the grantee assent or accept it or not. If this be so, it therefore follows, that although a deed be a contract, as was said by Spencer, Chief Justice, in Jackson v. Bodle, supra, that is, a parting with property by the grantor and an acceptance thereof by the grantee, yet such contract may be completed by the acts and words of the grantor alone, without the assent of the grantee. Suppose it to be one from which the grantee derives no benefit, but it subjects him to a duty, the performance of a trust, can he be obligated to the performance of such trust by the mere act of delivery and declaration of purpose by the grantor to an unauthorized stranger?³² If it be said that such act and words may bind made to two persons, and delivered to one without the knowledge of the other. The latter may, upon being informed of it, disagree to it, and the deed as to him will be void. Whether his share will, upon such a disagreement, accrue to the other grantee, or will return to the grantor it is not necessary for us to decide."

³¹ The statement of facts and portions of the opinions are omitted.

the grantor, though perhaps not the grantee, then we have an instance of a contract where only one of the parties to it is bound, without any condition to that effect contained in it—where the grantor is estopped by deed and the grantee not estopped. * * *

Suppose the stranger to whom the delivery is made, offer the deed to the grantee, and this is his first knowledge of it, has he no option? May he not refuse to accept it? Would tender to the grantee and refusal, be equivalent to acceptance? * * *

That a deed takes effect only from the time of delivery, with a few exceptions, where the necessities of the case require the application of the doctrine of relation, there can be no doubt. Was the act of sending it to Mitchell a delivery? He was a stranger and had no authority from the grantee to receive it. There was no declaration that it was delivered to him for the grantee's use; nor was it delivered as an escrow. But it was sent merely to have it filed for record. He was, therefore, a mere medium through which it was to pass to the hands of the recorder. The act was no more of a delivery, in the legal sense, than placing it in the possession of the carrier, to be conveyed from Louisville to Chicago—than if Buckner had taken it himself to the recorder to be recorded. In Herbert v. Herbert, supra, it was expressly held, under the circumstances of that case, that "the act of recording a deed cannot amount to a delivery, when there does not appear an assent or knowledge by the grantee, of the act."²³ There not only does not appear any assent, or knowledge on the part of Henry W. Kingsbury, of the act of recording the deed, but the want of both as clearly appears as any fact in the case. On the 17th of May, therefore, when the deed was recorded, it was not so far legally executed as to become operative. * * *

There can be no doubt, that up to the time of Buckner and the grantee meeting in July, the deed had not become operative. Although the grantors had parted with the personal possession of it, by leaving it with the recorder, still they could, at any time, have reclaimed and cancelled it, with no other effect than that, perhaps, of casting a cloud upon their title, by its being recorded. The question to which we are directly brought is, therefore, whether, while the deed was so in the hands of the recorder, it was competent for the parties to effectuate a delivery and make the deed operative, by mere words alone, without any manual or personal possession of the deed by the grantee, or a previously authorized agent? * * * If a grantor, with or without any previous arrangement with the grantee, sign, seal and acknowledge a deed, place it in the hands of the register to be recorded, notify the grantee of the act, and he assent to receive it, by words, only, this would be a good delivery, though the grantee die before taking it into his actual possession; because the assent is the principal element, ²³ There are cases contra. See Cloud v. Calhoun, 10 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 353 (1858); Adams v. Adams, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 185 (1874).

and taking the deed into possession is not indispensable, but only evidence of assent and acceptance. We think, therefore, that when Buckner notified Kingsbury, in July, of the making of the deed, the latter by his reply, assented to receive it, and that this view is confirmed by his subsequent acts and declarations. The deed, then, for the first time became operative.²⁴

But by the very words which made it operative was created a trust by

"It is well settled in this commonwealth that the delivery of a deed is not complete and effectual without an acceptance by the grantee, or by some one authorized to represent him, or who assumes to represent him, and whose act of acceptance is afterwards ratified." Knowlton, J., in Meigs v. Dexter, 172 Mass. 217, 218 (1898).

"All agree that neither the grantor nor the stranger who consents to receive and hold the deed can, by their acts, bind the grantee, and that the latter may, on receiving notice of it, repudiate it altogether. If the title vests in the grantee at once, it must, of course, vest according to the terms of the conveyance and in the case of an absolute conveyance, he would have an absolute title. If after delivery to the stranger, and before notice to the grantee a creditor of the latter should fasten upon the property by execution or attachment, no reason can be given why he could not hold it. If it is the property of the grantee, it follows, as of course, that the creditor would have this right, and that he would at once acquire a lien to the extent of his demand. Suppose after this is done, that the grantee, on receiving notice, refuses to accept the conveyance, what becomes of the property? Does the refusal unbind and set the property free from the seizure of the creditors and remit the title at once back to the grantor? Or does the interment of Justice Ventris [in Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198 (1691)] step in, in behalf of the creditor as well, and say, because the grant is presumed beneficial to the grantee, and he might, at some future period, accept it, that therefore he shall be deemed to have accepted it before the seizure, and at a time when he was utterly ignorant of it, and thus enable the creditor to withhold the property from the grantor? * * * I leave them [these questions] to be replied to by those who maintain that the title to property, real or personal, may, without words written or spoken, or other act of transfer, be thus mysteriously passed and repassed between parties by contract. I deny that it may be. It seems to me very plain that it does not pass in fact until the grantee has actually consented to receive it; and, as of course, that it remains with the grantor who is unable, without such consent, to vest it in the grantee. No other conclusion is consistent with the doctrine that a grant is a contract, and that the assent of the grantee is necessary to give it validity." Dixon, C. J., in Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, 289-290 (1860). But deeds of conveyance as such are not contracts, though in warranties, assumptions of indebtedness, etc., they may contain contracts. The problem of what constitutes delivery seems to be the same for sealed contracts as for deeds of conveyance, not because deeds are contracts but probably because for a long time they were regarded as being contracts.

contract, which, if manifested and proved by some writing signed by the grantee, as required by the statute of frauds, is valid. * * * The late Henry W. Kingsbury was, as this case shows, not only a trustee of the property, for his sister, but he was an honest trustee. By the last act of his life, in this respect, he designed to, and did, admit the existence of the trust and endeavored to execute it. Immediately after his death his widow, one of the defendants, in a letter to the mother of her deceased husband, recognized and admitted the trust, so far as she was concerned, in the most express terms, and seemed distressed at the suggestion of any obstacle to its immediate execution. * * * The trust being sufficiently manifested and proved by writings, signed by the party who was, by law, enabled to declare it, must be executed.

Action by Joshua G. Hubbard against Everard H. Greeley and others. Judgment for plaintiff.

WALTON, J.⁸⁵ Whether the grantee named in a deed delivered as an escrow, who has wrongfully obtained it, and put it on record, can convey a good title to a bona fide purchaser, is a question in relation to which the authorities are in conflict. * * *

But * * * the authorities all agree that a deed cannot be delivered directly to the grantee himself, or to his agent or attorney, to be held as an escrow; that, if such a delivery is made, the law will give effect to the deed immediately, and according to its terms, divested of all oral conditions. The reason is obvious. An escrow is a deed delivered to a stranger, to be delivered by him to the grantee upon the performance of some condition, or the happening of some contingency, and the deed takes effect only upon the second delivery. Till then, the title remains in the grantor. And if the delivery is in the first instance directly to the grantee, and he retains the possession of it, there can be no second delivery, and the deed must take effect on account of the first delivery, or it can never take effect at all. And if it takes effect at all, it must be according to its written terms. Oral conditions cannot be annexed to it. It will therefore be seen that a delivery to the grantee himself is utterly inconsistent with the idea of an escrow. And it is perfectly well settled, by all the authorities, ancient and modern, that an attempt to thus deliver a deed as an escrow cannot be successful; that in all cases where such deliveries are made the deeds take effect immediately and according to their terms, divested of all oral conditions.

⁸⁵ Portions of the opinion are omitted.

And it is equally well settled that, if the delivery is to one who is acting at the time as an agent or attorney of the grantee, the effect is the same. In Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, the delivery was to an agent of the grantee; and in Duncan v. Pope, 47 Ga. 445, the delivery was to the attorneys of the grantee; and it was held in both cases that the deeds took effect immediately, divested of all oral conditions.

And the same principle has been extended to official bonds. Ordinary of New Jersey v. Thatcher, 41 N. J. Law, 403; State v. Peck, 53 Me. 284.

It is easy to see, said the court in Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Grat. 403, that the most solemn obligations given for the payment of money would be of little value as securities, if they might, at a future day, be defeated by parol proof of conditions annexed to their delivery, and not performed; and that a doctrine of this kind would, perhaps, be still more mischievous, if applied to deeds of real estate; that, if such a doctrine should prevail, the title of the grantee would be liable to be defeated at any time by evidence of nonperformed parol conditions annexed to the delivery of the deed; and that in such cases there would be no safeguards against perjury or the mistakes of "slippery memory," and all titles would be as unstable as sand upon the seashore.³⁶

The principal contention in the present case is whether one of the deeds through which the defendants have derived their title was legally delivered. The deed is from George E. Seavey and Nathaniel H. Clark to Thomas Boyd and Robert W. Boyd. It is dated January 26, 1878, was acknowledged the same day, and recorded July 15, 1878.

The plaintiff claims that this deed was delivered as an escrow, and, although acknowledged and recorded, never became operative. Upon the proofs in the case, we do not think such an attack upon the defendants' title is permissible. The proof is that the deed was made and accepted in part payment of a debt owing from the grantors to the grantees, and that it was in fact delivered to one G. C. Bartlette, an attorney at law, who had been employed by the grantees to collect the debt; that Bartlette afterwards sent the deed by mail to the grantees, and that they caused it to be recorded; and that, at the time of the defendant's purchase, the deed had been on record for more than eight years, its validity apparently uncontested and unchallenged. And it is admitted that the defendants are innocent purchasers for value, and, at the time of their purchase, had no notice of the condition of the title other than that disclosed by the record. Under these circumstances, and for the reasons already given, we think the plaintiff is estopped to deny that the deed was legally delivered. We rest our decision upon the ground that the deed was, in fact, delivered to the grantees' attorney as such, and that such a delivery is equivalent to a delivery to the grantee himself; and that, when such a delivery is made, it is not competent for the grantor, or those claiming under him by a subsequent conveyance, to show by oral evidence that a condition was annexed to the delivery, for the nonperformance of which the deed never became operative. It seems to us that to hold otherwise would render all deeds of little value as evidence of title. * * *

Escrows are deceptive instruments. They are not what they purport to be. They purport to be instruments which have been delivered, when in fact they have not been delivered. They clothe the grantees with apparent titles which are not real titles. Such deeds are capable of being used to enable the grantees to obtain credit which otherwise they could not obtain. They are capable of being used to deceive innocent purchasers. And the makers of such instruments cannot fail to foresee that they are liable to be so used. And when the maker of such an instrument has voluntarily parted with the possession of it, and delivered it into the care and keeping of a person of his own selection, it seems to us that he ought to be responsible for the use that may in fact be made of it; and that in no other way can the public be protected against the intolerable evil of having our public records incumbered with such false and deceptive instruments.

Another question is whether the deed conveys the whole, or only an undivided half, of the grantor's interest in the demanded premises. We think it conveys only an undivided half. The original deed is not before us. It is said to be lost. We have only an office copy. This copy contains these words: "Undivided half of one and also one other parcel of land, situated in said Eden," etc. This is a bad sentence; but there is evidence tending to show that in the original deed the words "undivided half of" were interlined, and it is not improbable that in recording the deed they were misplaced. It seems to us that such must have been the fact. But whether so or not, we have the words "undivided half" in the deed, and we cannot doubt that they were put there for a purpose, and that that purpose was to describe the interest conveyed. This construction of the deed entitles the plaintiff to judgment for one undivided sixth part of the demanded premises.

*Judgment for plaintiff for one undivided sixth part of the demanded premises, and no more.*³⁷

³⁷ In Whittaker & Fowle v. Lane, (Va.) 104 S. E. 252 (1920), contra, Burke, J., for the court, pointed out that the doctrine that a deed cannot be delivered to the grantee to be held as an escrow, resting upon the statements in Coke on Littleton, and in Sheppard's Touchstone, had been abandoned in England, had been modified in Virginia by permitting incomplete sealed instruments to be delivered on condition, had been made difficult of application by letting the grantor or obligor hand the sealed instrument to the grantee or obligee without making a delivery but only giving the instrument to him as custodian, and had been deprived of justification in reason, policy or expediency by the practical similarity in informality of execution of scroll-sealed and unsealed writ-

GODDARD'S CASE.

GODDARD v. DENTON.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1584. 2 Co. Rep. 5a.)

Goddard, administrator of James Newton, brought an action of debt against John Denton, upon a bond made to the intestate, bearing date 4 April, 24 Eliz. The defendant pleaded, that the intestate died before the date of the bond, and so concluded that the said writing was not his deed, upon which they were at issue; the jury found, that the defendant did deliver it as his deed, 30 July, anno. 23 Eliz. and found the tenor of the deed in hæc verba, Noverint universi, &c., dat. 4 Aprillis, anno. 24 Eliz.; and that the intestate was living 30 July, 23 Eliz. and that he died before the said date of the bond; and prayed the advice of the court, whether this was the defendant's deed. And it was adjudged by Anderson, Chief Justice, Windham, Periam, and Walmesly, that it was his deed; and the reason of their judgment was,^{} that * * * there are but three things of the essence and substance of a deed, that is to say, writing in paper or parchment, sealing and delivery * * * And when a deed is delivered it takes effect by the delivery, and not from the day of the date. And therefore be the deed without date, or of a false or ings. On the last point, the opinion concedes that "there may exist good reasons for retaining a scroll to certain instruments in order to dispense with consideration, or to extend the period of limitation" (104 S. E. at p. 263), but insists that the parol evidence rule alone should be applied to sealed and unsealed instruments alike. The opinion pointed out other departures in Virginia from the original common law rule, as follows:

"Of course, it is admitted everywhere that it can be shown that there never was any delivery at all. In addition, we have held that a deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol to be a mortgage, which is nothing more than a condition for the payment of money (Holladay v. Willis, 101 Va. 274, 43 S. E. 619; Motley v. Carstairs, 114 Va. 429, 76 S. E. 948); that parol evidence will be received to show that a consideration expressed in a conveyance of land as paid by one was in fact paid by another, the effect of which is to create a resulting trust in favor of the party paying the money (Bank of U. S. v. Carrington, 7 Leigh (34 Va.) 566; Jesser v. Armentrout, 100 Va. 666, 42 S. E. 681); that a deed absolute on its face may be shown to be subject to an expressed parol trust (Young v. Holland, 117 Va. 616, 84 S. E. 637); and that in suits for the specific performance of contracts for the sale of land it may be shown that the plaintiff is not entitled to have performance. This is placed on the ground that specific performance is not a matter of right, but of grace, and that the object of the evidence is to rebut an equity. This last proposition, though not expressly decided, appears to be a concession in Towner v. Lucas, 13 Grat. (54 Va.) 713." (104 S. E. at p. 262.)

impossible date, yet the deed is good. * * * And many times bonds are delivered at other days than they bear date. So it appeareth by this judgment that the mistaking of the date of the bond shall not hurt, upon non est factum pleaded.³⁹

THOROUGHGOOD'S CASE.

THOROUGHGOOD v. COLE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1582. 2 Co. Rep. 9a.)

Thoroughgood brought an action of trespass for breaking of his close against Cole, defendant, who pleaded, that long time before the trespass, the plaintiff released to one William Chicken all demands whatsoever, &c., whose estate in the land the defendant hath, and justified the trespass, &c. The plaintiff said, that he was a layman, not lettered, and that at the time of the said release made, divers arrearages of an annuity were due to him by the said William Chicken, and that the said writing of release was read and declared to him as writing or acquittance for those arrearages only; and that he (giving credit thereunto) did seal and deliver the same to the said William Chicken, and so, not his deed; upon which issue was joined; and the jury found a special verdict to this effect; that is to say, that the plaintiff was a layman and not lettered, and that divers arrearages of the said annuity were behind, and that the writing was never read to him; but after that one Thomas Ward, had begun to read it to the plaintiff, and before he had read a line of the writing, one John Ward took the writing out of his hands, saying to the plaintiff, "Goodman Thoroughgood, you are a man unlearned, and I will declare it unto you, and make you understand it better than you can by hearing it read;" and then said further to him, "Goodman Thoroughgood, the effect of it is this, that you do release to William Chicken all the arrearages of rent that he doth owe you, and no otherwise, and then you shall have your land again;" To which the plaintiff said, "If it be no otherwise, I am content;" and thereupon the plaintiff, giving credit to the said John Ward, delivered the said release to the said William Chicken; and whether this, upon the whole matter, be the plaintiff's deed, the jury refer to the court, &c. And it was adjudged, that it was not the plaintiff's deed;

³⁹ "The time of delivery is the important time when it takes effect as a deed; and the case of Stone v. Bale, 3 Lev. 348, is in point to show that the delivery may be averred to be after the date." Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Hall v. Cazenove, 4 East 477, 481-482 (1804).

Where a deed is acknowledged before an officer, there is a division of authority as to whether delivery should be presumed at the date of the deed or the date of the acknowledgment.

and in this case three points were resolved:⁴⁰ first, that although the party to whom the writing is made, or other by his procurement, doth not read the writing, but a stranger of his own head read it in other words than in truth it is, yet it shall not bind the party who delivereth it; for it is not material who readeth the writing, so as he who maketh it be a layman, and being not lettered, be (without any covin in himself) deceived;⁴¹ * * *

Thirdly, although the writing be not read to the party, yet if the effect be declared to him in other form than is contained in the writing and upon that he deliver it, he shall avoid the deed; for it is all one in law to read it in other words, and to declare the effect thereof in other manner than is contained in the writing. * * *

J. M. WALKER, Administrator, v. ROBERT WALKER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1852. 13 Ired. L. [35 N. C.] 335.)

This is an action of debt on a [sealed] single bill for forty dollars, and was tried on non est factum, payment at and after the day. On the trial it appeared that it had been executed in 1830 to the intestate of the plaintiff, payable one day after date; that the defendant had always been able to pay the amount; and that it was presented to him in 1846, and payment demanded; that he denied its execution several times, but at last said to the holder, "If you will prove that it is my handwriting, and is a just note, I will pay it." Two witnesses deposed that the signature and the body of it was in the defendant's proper handwriting.

The defendant's counsel moved the court to charge the jury that the plaintiff ought to prove that the said note had not been paid. The court declined so to charge, and told the jury, if the defendant promised to pay the note in question, if it were proved to be in his handwriting and a just note, and they were satisfied from the testimony that it was in the handwriting of the defendant, it was sufficient to remove the presumption of payment; that where the execution of a sealed instrument was proved, the law inferred that it was just and founded upon a just ⁴⁰ Portions of the resolutions are omitted.

⁴¹ In Shulter's Case, 12 Co. Rep. 90, John Shulter, 115 years old, who "could read and write very well, but by reason of his great age was blind," sealed and delivered two leases on the false statement of the scrivener that they were in all points according to his directions. "And it was resolved by the Lord Ellesmere Chancellor, and the two Chief Justices, that the said indentures could not bind the said John Shulter for this, that he was blind and like to one who could not read at all." In Hunter v. Walters, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 75, 81, Lord Hatherly, L. C., said: "In the early books we find Lord Coke saying that if a man is blind or illiterate, and an instrument is read over to him falsely, then the instrument is void. 2 Rep. 2b, 9a. This is a proposition which one would not be inclined to dispute when broadly laid down."

consideration. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Rule for a venire de novo, because of misdirection. Rule discharged. Judgment; and the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court.

PEARSON, J. His honor charged, "That where the execution of a sealed instrument was proved, the law inferred that it was just, and founded upon a just consideration." In this there is error.

We are not aware of any rule of law by which a consideration is inferred from the fact of execution of a sealed instrument. No consideration is necessary in order to give validity to a deed. It derives its efficacy from the solemnity of its execution—the acts of sealing and delivery—not upon the idea that the seal imports a consideration, but because it is his solemn act and deed, and is therefore obligatory. No consideration being necessary to give validity to a deed, it follows that the law does not, from the fact of execution, make any inference one way or the other in reference to a consideration. A misapprehension of this subject may have arisen from the fact that in deeds of conveyance, operating under the statute of uses, either a valuable or a good consideration is necessary in order to raise the use. But the general rule is, a deed is valid without a consideration. A voluntary bond for money, executed to a stranger, and professing on its face to be without consideration, and for mere friendship, is binding.⁴⁸

"To say that the 'want of consideration' is a defence against a bond is to express, in language not remarkable for precision, nothing more than the familiar principle that where the obligor fails to receive the consideration contracted for, and on the faith of which he entered into the contract, he is not bound to pay his bond. This principle has no application whatever to the case before us, because no consideration was contracted for or expected. A voluntary bond, it is true, must be postponed until creditors are paid; but it is always good against the party himself, and against heirs, legatees, and others who stand in no higher equity. 2 Williams on Executors, 871; 3 P. Wms. 223; 2 Mylne & K. 769. In this respect a simple contract differs from a specialty. In the one case the party is not bound without a consideration. 5 T. R. 8. In the other no consideration is necessary if none was contracted for. 17 Johns. Rep. 301." Lewis, C. J., in Candor and Henderson's Appeal, 27 Pa. St. 119, 120-121 (1856).

"It was once gravely considered whether if a man accepted a dinner invitation on a paper indented and sealed with his seal, and failed to turn up, he could be sued for breach of contract; but as his legal position was in no wise altered, it was equally gravely asserted that he could not." J. W. Brodie-Innes, Some Outstanding Differences Between English and Scots Law, 28 Jurid. Rev. at p. 74.

Another view may be taken of the case. The defendant annexed to the promise, which is relied on to rebut the presumption of payment, two conditions precedent: First, proof of his handwriting; secondly, proof of its being a just note. But his Honor put the case to the jury in such a way as entirely to exclude the second condition and deprive the defendant of all benefit from it. He had as much right to the benefit of the second condition as of the first, and might well insist upon proof of the justness of the note; as, for instance, that it should be proven what it was given for, the circumstances under which it was given, etc., so as to show that it was not obtained by fraud or surprise, and was in fact a "just note." The promise is expressed in these words, "I will pay it, if you will prove that it is in my handwriting, and is a just note." By a proper construction, the latter condition may have reference to the present as well as the past. If so, the defendant had a right to insist, not only upon proof that the note was just in its inception, but continued to be just; that is, had not been paid. The matter will then stand thus: Although the note was duly executed, the law presumes that it has been paid, and at the same time, according to the charge, the law, from proof of its execution, infers that it is just; that is, has not been paid—which inference is inconsistent and repugnant. This question of construction is not adverted to by his Honor, although it is presented by the exceptions. But it is said, according to this construction, the promise amounts to nothing. That may be so, and if so, it only shows that the defendant was cautious, and was careful to require proof sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment which the law made in his favor.

A venire de novo awarded.

TOWNSHIP OF DANBY v. BEEBE, ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1907. 147 Mich. 312, 110 N. W. 1066.)

Action by the township of Danby against Henry O. Beebe and others on a bond whereby the defendants, farmers, living along a road which led to a stream flowing between two different townships, agreed to pay a certain sum into the bridge fund of the township in which they resided, if the construction of a bridge across the stream should be ordered by the supervisors on a petition by the township board of the other township. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

obligee to the obligors, and no burden has been assumed, or undertaking begun, by the obligee in reliance upon the bond. * * * There is judicial precedent for the proposition that the statute (Comp. Laws, § 10,185), which provides that in any action upon a sealed instrument the seal thereof shall only be presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration, which may be rebutted in the same manner and to the same effect as if such instrument were not sealed,⁴⁴ has no application in a case where a consideration, passing between the parties thereto, was never contemplated. Aller v. Aller, 40 N. J. Law, 446. The reasoning employed is that, no consideration for the promise having been contemplated, in the absence of fraud, illegality, or mistake, the rights of creditors not being involved, the law should, notwithstanding the statute, execute a promise made in a writing, sealed and delivered with the most solemn sanction known to the law; that, if such an instrument contained the recital that it was given upon no consideration, it would not for that reason be refused enforcement.⁴⁵ See, also, Harris v. Harris' Exr, 23

⁴⁴ Some statutes abolish the common law effect of a seal. Local statutes should be consulted.

"But it is said that the act of April 6th, 1875 (Rev., p. 387, § 52), opens it to the defence of want of sufficient consideration, as if it were a simple contract, and, that being shown, the contract becomes inoperative. The statute reads: 'That in every action upon a sealed instrument or where a set-off is founded on a sealed instrument, the seal thereof shall be only presumptive evidence of a sufficient consideration, which may be rebutted, as if such instrument was not sealed,' etc.

"Suppose the presumption that the seal carries with it, that there is a sufficient consideration, is rebutted, and overcome by evidence showing there was no such consideration, the question still remains, whether an instrument under seal, without sufficient consideration, is not a good promise and enforceable at law. It is manifest that here the parties intended and understood that there should be no consideration. The old man said, 'Now here, girls, is a nice present for each of you,' and so it was received by them. The mischief which the above quoted law was designed to remedy, was that where the parties intended there should be a consideration, they were prevented by the common law from showing none, if the contract was under seal. But it would be going too far to say that the statute was intended to abrogate all voluntary contracts, and to abolish all distinction between specialties and simple contracts.

"It will not do to hold that every conveyance of land, or of chattels, is void by showing that no sufficient consideration passed when creditors are not affected. Nor can it be shown by authority that an executory contract, entered into intentionally and deliberately, and attested in solemn form by a seal, cannot be enforced. * * * If a party has fully and absolutely expressed his intention in a writing sealed and delivered, with the most solemn sanction known to our law, what should prevent its execution where there is no fraud or illegality? But because deeds have been used to cover fraud and illegality in the consideration, and just defences have been often shut out by the conclusive

Grat. (Va.) 737. But the effect given to our statute has been stated to be one which with respect to the consideration places simple executory, and sealed executory, contracts upon the same footing. Green v. Langdon, 28 Mich. 221, 226; Hobbs v. Electric Light Co., 75 Mich. 550, 42 N. W. 965. It must be held, in the light of the evidence, that the bond is a mere voluntary, gratuitous promise by the obligors to the obligee to pay a sum of money. Being so, it cannot be sustained as a gift in jurisdictions in which a seal may be impeached. 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 665; Matter of James, 146 N. Y. 78, 40 N. E. 876, 48 Am. St. Rep. 774. * * *

The judgment is reversed, and, as it appears that upon no theory can plaintiff recover, no new trial is awarded.⁴⁶

NURSE v. FRAMPTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1695. 1 Ld. Raym. 28.)

Nurse brought debt against Frampton for a certain sum of £25 due to Nurse by agreement by deed between the plaintiff and the defendant. Upon oyer of the deed it appeared to be thus, viz. 'tis agreed, that a grey character of the formality of sealing, we have enacted in our state the two recent statutes above quoted. The one allows fraud in the consideration of instruments under seal to be set up as defence, the other takes away the conclusive evidence of a sufficient consideration heretofore accorded to a sealed writing, and makes it only presumptive evidence. This does not reach the case of a voluntary agreement, where there was no consideration, and none intended by the parties. The statute establishes a new rule of evidence, by which the consideration of sealed instruments may be shown, but does not take from them the effect of establishing a contract expressing the intention of the parties, made with the most solemn authentication, which is not shown to be fraudulent or illegal. It could not have been in the mind of the legislature to make it impossible for parties to enter into such promises; and without a clear expression of the legislative will, not only as to the admissibility, but the effect of such evidence, such construction should not be given to this law. Even if it should be held that a consideration is required to uphold a deed, yet it might still be implied where its purpose is not within the mischief which the statute was intended to remedy. It was certainly not the intention of the legislature to abolish all distinction between simple contracts and specialties, for in the last clause of the section they say that all instruments executed with a scroll, or other device by way of scroll, shall be deemed sealed instruments. It is evident that they were to be continued with their former legal effect, except so far as they might be controlled by evidence affecting their intended consideration." Scudder, J., in Aller v. Aller, 40 N. J. L. 446, 449-452 (1878). See also, 95 Am. Dec. 287, note.

And after demurrer the court was of opinion that inasmuch as the plaintiff and defendant had signed this, although it was not mentioned in the body of the deed, by whom or to whom it was made; yet it will warrant the declaration's reciting, that it was made by the plaintiff and defendant. And judgment was given for the plaintiff.⁴⁷

GREEN v. HORNE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1695. 1 Salk. 197.)

In covenant the plaintiff declared, that A. being indebted to him, and arrested at his suit, the defendant, in consideration that he would order the bailiff to let A. go at large, undertook and covenanted with the plaintiff to bring in the body of the said A. and deliver him into the custody of the said bailiff, such a day, &c. The defendant prayed oyer of the deed, which was, I (the defendant) do promise and engage myself to bring in the body of A. to the custody of B. bailiff, such a day; and thereupon it was demurred. Et per Cur. first, the plaintiff cannot set forth matter of fact in his declaration not contained in the deed, so as to alter the case; therefore, all such matter of fact so alleged or averred is immaterial. 8 Rep. 151.

2dly, the plaintiff is no party to the deed, nor so much as named in it, and though covenant may be brought on a deed-poll, yet the party must be named in the deed. 1 Rol. Ab. 517.⁴⁸

⁴⁷ "If one party only be named as obligor in the body of a bond, and others sign it also, all are bound. In no other way can any effect be given to the signatures of those not so named. The intent is clear, and that is sufficient. Parks v. Brinkerhoff, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 663; Perkins v. Goodman, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 218." Swayne, J., in George v. Tate, 102 U. S. 564, 569 (1881).

⁴⁸ "But it cannot be meant that his name of baptism and his surname must necessarily be set out. If he be sufficiently designated in the deed, this must be enough to entitle him to sue for breach of a covenant to pay money to the person so designated." Lord Campbell, C. J., in Sunderland Marine Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 16 Q. B. 925, 938 (1851).

If a party is named as grantee in a deed poll which contains covenants which purport to bind him, the nature of his obligation is in dispute.

"How it came to be thought by the profession at an early day and to be handed down to the present, that an action of covenant might be maintained against the grantee in a deed poll under any circumstances, or against anyone else who had not sealed it, I cannot imagine. * * * This supposition had its root in the case obscurely stated in Co. Litt. 331a; but it is clearly shown by Mr. Platt, the only lawyer who has searched the original roll, that there has

SCUDAMORE v. VANDENSTENE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1587. 2 Co. Inst. 673.)

In an action of debt between Scudamore and others plaintifes and Vandenstene defendant, upon an indenture of charterparty the case was this: the indenture of charterparty was made between Scudamore and others owners of the good ship, called B., whereof Robert Pitman was master, on the one partie, and Vandenstene on the other party. In which indenture the plaintife did covenant with the said Vandenstene and Robert Pitman, and also Vandenstene covenanted with the Plaintife and Robert Pitman, and bound themselves to the plaintife and Robert Pitman for performance of covenants in 600 pounds. And the conclusion of the said indenture was, "In wittenesse whereof the parties abovesaid to these present indentures have put to their seals" And the said Robert Pitman to the said indenture put his hand and seal, and delivered the same. The defendant in barre of the said action pleaded the release of Pitman, &c. whereupon the plaintife demurred. And it was adjudged, that the release of Pitman did not barre the plaintife, because hee was no party to the indenture. And the diversity was taken and agreed betweene an indenture reciprocally betweene parties on the one side, and parties on the other side, as this was; for there no bond, covenant, or grant can be made to or with any that is not party to the deed.⁴⁹ But where the deed indented been a prodigious misconception of the language of Lord Coke, which was predicated, not of an action of covenant, but of an action of debt. * * * It ought to have occurred to them [the profession] that forms of pleading are touchstones of the law, and that the most dexterous pleader would find himself unable to make a successful profert of a deed poll as the act of one who had not sealed it. Mutual covenants may be contained in the same instrument; but each party must seal and deliver his own exactly as if they were contained in several parts of it." Gibson, C. J., in Maule v. Weaver, 7 Pa. St. 329, 331-332 (1847).

See Taylor v. Forbes, 101 Va. 658 (1903), holding that the grantee's obligation is subject to the statute of limitations applicable to sealed contracts instead of that which applies to specialties. Cf. Lock v. Wright, post, p. 694. But see Midland Railway Co. v. Fisher, 125 Ind. 19 (1890). See note on liability of grantee upon a condition of a deed poll in 23 L. R. A. 396.

⁴⁹ "The rule and distinction as to deeds inter partes and deeds not of that character is very old, and to be found in the ancient legal authorities, but it is impossible to state or illustrate it more clearly than is done by Lord Tenterden in his Book on Shipping, p. 170. * * * He states the rule to be a technical one, and thus illustrates it: 'If a charter-party under seal is expressed to be made between certain parties, as between A and B, owners of a ship whereof C is master of the one part, and D and E of the other part, and purports to contain covenants with C, nevertheless C cannot bring an action in his own name upon the covenant, and this even although he sealed and delivered the instrument; but if the charter-party is not expressed to be made between parties, but is written thus "This charter-party indented witnesseth" it is otherwise.' He adds, 'this latter then is the most proper form.' In the case of Berkeley v. Hardy, 5 B. & C. 355, the same rule is laid down, and in the judgment it is is not reciprocal, but is without a between, &c. as, omnibus Christi fidelibus, &c. there a bond, covenant, or grant may be made to divers severall persons.

stated to be a long established technical rule and one believed to be peculiar to the law of England." Martin, B., in Chesterfield & Midland Silkstone Colliery Co. v. Hawkins, 3 H. & C. 677, 692 (1865).

"At common law a person though not a party to a deed poll, could sue upon it, if the instrument showed upon its face that it was made for his benefit, but this was not so as to a deed inter partes. The latter was only available between the parties to it and their privies, and a third person could not maintain an action of covenant upon it. Jones v. Thomas, 21 Gratt. 96; Stuart v. James River & K. Co., 24 Gratt. 274; Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh 204; and Fellows v. Gilman, 4 Wend. 414." Riley, J., in Newberry Land Co. v. Newberry, 95 Va. 119, 120 (1897).

In Saunders v. Saunders, 154 Mass. 337 (1891), where there was an inter partes sealed contract, recovery was denied to the widow of one of the covenantors who was suing the surviving covenantor on his covenant to pay to such person as might be the deceased covenantor's widow certain sums. The court said that only those who are parties to contracts under seal can sue upon them and that the instrument was objectionable as "An attempt to create a covenant to arise wholly in the future between the defendant and a party who at the time was unascertained, and from whom no consideration was to move and who was not in any way privy to the contract." In a jurisdiction which will permit the beneficiary of a contract under seal to sue upon the contract, however, the fact that the beneficiary will not be known, or even will not come into being, until some time after the contract, would not seem to be a sufficient ground for denying a recovery.

CHAPTER II.

THE OFFER AND THE ACCEPTANCE OF A SIMPLE CONTRACT.¹

HUDSON v. COLUMBIAN TRANSFER CO.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1904. 137 Mich. 255, 110 N. W. 402, 109 Am. St. Rep. 679.)

Action by Horace A. Hudson against the Columbian Transfer Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J.* This action is brought to recover the value of goods stored with the defendant as warehouseman, and destroyed by fire. * * * In March, 1901, plaintiff made a contract to store the goods in question with defendant for hire, on the fourth floor of the building known as 21 and 23 Campau street. This statement is denied, but the question was submitted to the jury, and found in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff thereupon took out insurance on his goods as located in the building known as 21 and 23 Campau street, but whether this fact was communicated to the defendant is a matter of dispute; and, as this question was not submitted to the jury, the plaintiff's rights are to be determined upon the assumption that notice of the insurance was not given. The goods were taken from plaintiff's house, and were stored by defendant not in the building known as 21 and 23 Campau street, but in the [adjoining] Hopson-Haftencamp building, where, without negligence on the part of the defendant, they were destroyed by fire. * * *

¹ "There are two modes of making simple contracts * * *. The one is, when one party promises to do a certain thing and in consideration of that promise the other party engages to do something on his part. Then as nothing is done but the making of the promises, it is absolutely necessary that mutual, valid promises, amounting to an express contract, should appear; otherwise one of the parties might claim the benefit of the promise of the other, without in return doing any act or being liable for any loss whatever. * * * The other mode is, when one party promises in consideration that the other will or will not do some act. Then no mutual promise need be set forth or exist; but it is necessary and sufficient to show the act done. It is not requisite that it should appear the plaintiff might have been sued for not doing the act; for he may recover after the thing done, though it was at his election whether he would do it or not up to the moment of its execution." Ruffin, C. J., in Gurvin v. Cromartie, 11 Ired. (N. C.) 174, 179 (1850).

In an acceptance of a bilateral contract "The term 'I accept' fully expressed would read 'I accept and promise.'" Ashley on Contracts, p. 86.

*Parts of the opinion are omitted.

Complaint is made of the failure to present certain special questions to the jury. * * *

The other questions asked for the defendant's understanding of the agreement, and were preferred upon the theory that, as the minds of the parties must have met, the defendant's failure of understanding would answer plaintiff's claim of a contract. This is a fallacy. What is meant by "meeting of minds" is the agreement reached by the parties and expressed. As is well said in Brewington v. Mesker, 51 Mo. App. 348, "The meeting of minds which is essential to the formation of a contract is not determined by the secret intentions of the parties, but by their expressed intention, which may be wholly at variance with the former." See, also, 9 Cyc. 244; 9 Cyc. 578; Brown v. Hare, 3 H. & N. 484.

The question then, is whether, under the facts as found by the jury, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. We think this question should be answered in the affirmative. The theory of the plaintiff's case is that the defendant broke its contract of bailment, and subjected the property to a risk never contemplated by plaintiff, nor assumed or assented to by him. In such a case the rule is general that the bailee assumes the risk of the destruction of the property. The defendant was guilty of a technical conversion of plaintiff's property. See Lawson on Bailments, § 20; Martin v. Cuthbertson, 64 N. C. 328; Lane v. Cameron, 38 Wis. 603. A case precisely in point is that of Lilly v. Doubleday, L. R. 7 Q. B. 310, which case is cited with approval in Bradley v. Cunningham, 61 Conn. 485, 23 Atl. 932, 15 L. R. A. 679, and followed in Line v. Mills, 12 Ind. App. 100, 39 N. E. 870. * * *

We discover no error in the case.

*Judgment affirmed.*³

* "I dare say few assured have any distinct view of their own on the point, and might not even see it, if it were explained to them, but what they intend contractually does not depend on what they understand individually." Lord Sumner in Becker v. London Assur. Corp., 117 L. T. 609 (1918).

"A contract has, strictly speaking, nothing to do with the personal, or individual intent of the parties. A contract is an obligation attached by the mere force of law to certain acts of the parties, usually words, which ordinarily accompany and represent a known intent. If, however, it were proved by twenty bishops that either party, when he used the words, intended something else than the usual meaning which the law imposes upon them, he would still be held, unless there were some mutual mistake, or something else of the sort. Of course, if it appear by other words or acts of the parties, that they attribute a peculiar meaning to such words as they use in the contract, that meaning will prevail, but only by virtue of the other words, and not because of their unexpressed intent." Learned Hand, J., in Hotchkiss v. National City Bank of N. Y., 200 Fed. 287, 293 (1911).

"To lead a person reasonably to suppose that you assent to an oral arrangement is to assent to it, wholly irrespective of fraud. Assent, in the sense of the law, is a matter of overt acts, not of inward unanimity in motives, design, or the interpretation of words." Holmes, J., in O'Donnell v. Inhabitants of Clinton, 145 Mass. 461, 463 (1888).

Action by Sarah Jane Spencer against John Spencer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Sustained.

HOLMES, C. J. This is an action for personal services brought against the defendant by his sister, an unmarried woman. For a time she lived with him as his housekeeper for pay. Then he fell ill and she kept on for two years, receiving no pay, or at most, five dollars, which was disputed, but on the contrary working out and using the money she earned for the support of the defendant and his children. The judge instructed the jury in substance that the plaintiff could not recover unless she had expected to be paid for her services and had believed that the defendant knew that Corbin, Offer and Acceptance and Some of the Resulting Legal Relations, 26 Yale L. J. 169.

A meeting of the minds of the parties, however, may be essential to a recovery in chancery even though the lack of a meeting of minds may not be so serious as to prevent a contract from arising.

"A court of equity will not enforce a contract which is uncertain and indefinite, or where, from all the evidence, there is grave doubt as to whether the minds of the parties really met. Even where there has been a mistake as to the terms of a contract, equity will not enforce it, if it is unreasonable, unconscientious, or a hard bargain that ought not to be enforced. In an early case this court decided that—

"Upon breach of a contract for the sale of real estate, it is not a matter of course for the court to enter a decree of specific performance. That will be done only when upon all the facts it is equitable it should be done." Fowler v. Marshall, 29 Kan. 665, Syl. par. 1.

"In another case it was held that, while in legal contemplation two persons may make a contract that would be enforced at law, yet, if it should seem probable from the facts of the case that the parties did not in fact and equity agree to the same thing, the supposed contract would not be decreed in equity to be enforced specifically. Burkhalter v. Jones, 32 Kan. 5, 3 Pac. 559. In that case there was an offer to purchase and an agreement to sell land for the sum of $2,000. The court said, however, that in all probability the vendor at the time did not believe he was making a contract to sell the land for that sum, but believed that he was making a contract to sell the land for $2,100. The court below refused to order specific performance and the judgment was affirmed. * * *

"The opinion recognized that on the facts the case was a close one:

"In strict law, and by the words of the letters of the parties, we think the parties made a contract; but we also think that in fact and in equity the minds of the parties never came together; that they really never agreed to the same thing; and therefore, in equity and good conscience, they did not make a contract, or at least they did not make such a contract as equity should adjudge to be specifically enforced." 32 Kan. 13, 3 Pac. 565.

"The case was followed and approved in Bird v. Logan, 35 Kan. 228, 10 Pac. 564." Porter, J., in Young v. Schwint (Kans.) 195 Pac. 614, 615, 616 (1921).

payment was expected for them, and unless the defendant had expected to pay for them and had believed that the plaintiff expected to have pay for them. The plaintiff excepted, and brings the case here after a verdict for the defendant.

We have felt some doubt whether these instructions should be construed to mean anything more than that the parties must have understood that they were dealing on a business footing, in which case we should hesitate to sustain the exceptions merely because of a theoretical leak to which no attention was called. Even so construed the proposition would be inaccurate since it would be enough to make a contract if the defendant as a reasonable man ought to have understood that the services were rendered for pay and not merely for love. But we are of opinion that the language of the judge went further than we have suggested, and too far for us to save it, however, proper the verdict may seem to have been. Of course it does not matter whether the defendant expected to pay for the services or not, the question is as to the natural import of his overt acts. Manufacturing Co. v. Sawyer, 169 Mass. 477, 48 N. E. 620; Hobbs v. Whip Co., 158 Mass. 194, 197, 33 N. E. 495. Again, it is not necessary that the defendant should have believed that the plaintiff expected pay. If as a reasonable man he should have understood from what he knew that such was the expectation, he would be bound by accepting the services. Day v. Caton, 119 Mass. 513, 20 Am. Rep. 347.³ It is unnecessary to criticise the ruling further.

³ In Day v. Caton, supra, Devens, J., said:

"If a person saw day after day a laborer at work in his field doing services, which must of necessity inure to his benefit, knowing that the laborer expected pay for his work, when it was perfectly easy to notify him if his services were not wanted, even if a request were not expressly proved, such a request, either previous to or contemporaneous with the performance of the services, might fairly be inferred. But if the fact was merely brought to his attention upon a single occasion and casually, if he has little opportunity to notify the other that he did not desire the work and should not pay for it, or could only do so at the expense of much time and trouble, the same inference might not be made. The circumstances of each case would necessarily determine whether silence with a knowledge that another was doing valuable work for his benefit, and with the expectation of payment, indicated that consent which would give rise to the inference of a contract. The question would be one for the jury."

"In Ramsden & Carr v. Chessum & Sons, 110 L. T. 274 (1913), Lord Chancellor Haldane said: 'If A. brings goods to B. to be used in work which B. is doing, and B. knows that A. has brought them, not as a gift but as expecting to be paid for them, and B. uses these goods in his work, then prima facie B. is liable to pay the price of the goods.'

HAIGHT, J.† This action was brought to recover damages for a breach of promise to marry. * * *

The rule governing contracts of this character has been fully discussed in the case of Homan v. Earle, 53 N. Y. 267. Formerly, contracts of this character were often inferred or implied from proof of such circumstances as usually attend an engagement; but, after the statute was changed so as to permit parties to testify in their own behalf, they were expected to state all that was said and done, so as to remove from the field of speculation facts that had theretofore been inferred, thus leaving the court to deter-

"In Wojahn v. National Union Bank, 144 Wis. 646, 667, 129 N. W. 1068 (1911), Marshall, J., said: 'The general rule is that if a person performs valuable services for another at that other's request, the law implies, as matter of fact, the making of a promise by the latter and acceptance thereof by the former to pay the one performing the service the reasonable value thereof [citations]. If one merely accepts services from another which are valuable to him, in general, the presumption of fact arises that a compensation equivalent is to pass between the parties, and the burden of proof is upon the recipient of the service to rebut such presumption if he would escape from rendering such equivalent. The burden may be much more easily lifted in such a case than in the case of there being a request for the performance. * * *'

"Professor Corbin has suggested that this true meeting-of-the-minds implied-in-fact contract is really one form of express contract. He says: 'A contract implied in fact is a true contract based upon a real agreement of the parties. It differs from an express contract only in the evidence necessary to establish its existence and its terms. In reality a contract implied in fact is an express contract, for intentions can be expressed as clearly by actions as by words.' Corbin, 'Quasi-Contractual Obligations,' 21 Yale L. J., 533, 546-547. No doubt that is a possible way of looking at them, but it is also possible to emphasize their inferred-as-a-fact nature, as the courts have done. The situation, therefore, is not like that which existed when the courts were pronouncing the non-contractual obligations now known as quasi-contracts to be contracts implied in law and when the courts were, accordingly, demonstrably in error. Instead of dealing with a truth having only one aspect, as was the case in that instance, we have here a double-aspect truth. In a sense the inferred as a fact or tacit contract is expressed by conduct, but in a sense also it is implied-in-fact. It would seem to be hopeless, therefore, to attempt to get rid of the term implied-in-fact as applied to these true contracts enforced because of conduct expressions." George P. Costigan, Jr., Implied in Fact Contracts and Mutual Assent, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 376, 382, n.

mine whether the facts sworn to constituted a contract. In determining this question, however, while we may not imply facts not sworn to, we may infer the meaning and intention of the parties. In the absence of fraud and deception, there must be a contract. There must be a meeting of the minds of the contracting parties, and the evidence must be of such a character as to justify a finding that such was the case. No form of words is required. A formal offer and acceptance is not necessary, but there must be an offer and an acceptance "sufficiently disclosed or expressed to fix the fact that they were to marry, as clearly as if put in formal words." The language used must be such as to show that the minds of the parties met. Contracts of marriage concern the highest interests of life, and should be sacredly guarded. If the conduct and declarations of the parties clearly indicate that they regard themselves as engaged, it is sufficient; otherwise, not. Mere courtship, or even an intention to marry, is not sufficient to constitute a contract. Thorough acquaintance with character, habits, and disposition is essential in order to make an intelligent contract. The parties, therefore, may form such an acquaintance without having the inferences of a contract attach. Applying these rules to the facts of this case, it is apparent that the evidence falls short of that which is necessary to establish a contract. * * *

(Appellate Court of Illinois, Second District, 1893. 49 Ill. App. 459.)

CARTWRIGHT, J.† Appellant was the owner of a set of old double harness, worth perhaps $15.00, which was taken from his premises without his knowledge, and he offered a reward of $100 for the recovery of the harness and the conviction of the thief. A few days afterward a boy named Wilt found part of the harness in appellee's berry patch, and appellant went with appellee to the place and brought that part of the harness into appellee's blacksmith shop. Appellant gave the boy who had found the harness a quarter of a dollar, and said that he would give him a dollar to find the rest of it. Appellee claims that appellant at that time offered a reward of $100 to the one who would find out who the thief was, and that he earned the reward. This suit was brought to recover the amount so claimed as a reward, and a trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for appellee for $100.

⁵ It has been held that if the defendant's acts induced the plaintiff to believe that they were engaged and the defendant knew that plaintiff was acting on that belief and yet continued to act so as to induce that belief, he cannot avoid liability by showing that he did not intend an engagement. Stamm v. Wood, 86 Ore. 174 (1917).

For a contract to exist it is not necessary to have "express words clearly expressed." Zilske v. Grohn, 128 Wis. 159 (1906).

The evidence showed that the defendant was much excited on the occasion, when it is claimed that the offer was made in the shop. Plaintiff's version of the language used was that the defendant said, "I will give $100 to any man who will find out who the thief is, and I will give a lawyer $100 for prosecuting him," using rough language and epithets concerning the thief. There was evidence of substantial repetition of the same statement, together with the assertion that he would not hire a cheap lawyer, but a good lawyer. The harness had been taken by a man called Red John Smith, who had been adjudged insane, and a Mrs. Phillips told the plaintiff that she saw Smith walking by with the harness on his back, on Sunday morning which was the time when it was taken. Plaintiff watched Smith that night and saw him hiding the collars, and the next day he waited for the return of the defendant from Galesburg, and told him that Red John Smith had the harness. A search warrant was procured, and the remainder of the harness was found.

We do not think that the language used was such as, under the circumstances, would show an intention to contract to pay the reward, and think plaintiff had no right to regard it as such. Defendant had previously offered a very liberal reward for the return of the old harness and the conviction of the thief. On this occasion he paid the boy only a trifling sum, and offered only $1 for finding the rest of the property. His further language was in the nature of an explosion of wrath against some supposed thief who had stolen the harness, and was coupled with boasting and bluster about the prosecution of the thief. It was indicative of a state of excitement so out of proportion to the supposed cause of it, that it should be regarded rather as the extravagant exclamations of an excited man than as manifesting an intention to contract.⁶

The joke contract cases are of a similar nature. In McClung v. Terry, 21 N. J. Eq. 225 (1870) a marriage was annulled where the parties went through the ceremony in joke, even though the justice who performed it was in doubt whether they were in earnest or in jest. But in Girvan v. Griffin, N. J. 108 Atl. 182 (1919), where the clergyman and the only witness who testified did not think that the parties were acting in jest, the court refused to annul the marriage.

"The transaction looks like * * * a bantering proposition by the plaintiff to the defendant, and wanting the intention to contract. * * * It is not every loose conversation that is to be turned into a contract although the parties may seem to agree. A man is not to be snapped up for an unintended proposition made when he has no reason to suppose anybody wants to accept what he proposes. When people meet to do business they are presumed to mean what they propose, and expect to be taken up; but a proposition made and accepted where no expectation of contracting exists should be carefully weighed with all the circumstances when the question of assent at the time comes to be questioned, as here." Thompson, J., in Brown v. Finney, 53 Pa. St. 373, 378 (1866).

But if we concede that defendant's language indicated an intention to contract to pay a reward, the plaintiff, although he obtained some definite knowledge by watching Smith, was neither the discoverer nor the first informer as to the identity of the thief. The evidence was that other persons learned of facts which showed that Red John Smith had taken the harness and told the defendant of such facts before the plaintiff did. * * *

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded.

"Jokes are sometimes taken seriously by the young and inexperienced in the deceptive ways of the business world, and if such is the case and thereby the person deceived is led to give valuable services in the full belief and expectation that the joker is in earnest, the law will also take the joker at his word and give him good reason to smile." Dent, J., in Plate v. Durst, 42 W. Va. 63, 66-67 (1896) and "A person is estopped to deny the sincerity of his conduct, to the injury of a person misled thereby," Id. p. 68. In Plate v. Durst a promise which the defendant declared made in jest was allowed to rebut the presumption of a gift of services rendered by plaintiff while a member of defendant's household, that is, was allowed to uphold plaintiff's recovery on an implied in fact contract.

In Thruston v. Thornton, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 89 (1848), Wilde, J., for the court, agreed with the trial judge that it was for the jury to decide whether "at the interview between the parties, their minds met, and they made a legal and binding contract; or whether the transaction, as was insisted by the defendant, was a loose conversation, not understood or intended by them as an agreement."

In Stollery v. Maskelyne, 15 T. L. R. 79 (1898), there was a dispute as to the meaning of an oral offer by a conjurer of £500 to any person who could discover the secret of his box trick or produce a correct imitation of it. The dispute was as to the second branch of the offer, for defendant contended that the plaintiffs did not profess to have discovered his secret, but merely to have made a box by which they could produce an illusion similar to that produced by him. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiffs for £500, the Court of Appeal dismissed an application for judgment or a new trial because the words were capable of bearing the meaning which the plaintiffs put upon them and therefore twelve reasonable men could properly come to the conclusion which the jury did.

In Balfour v. Balfour, [1919] 2 K. B. 571, the Court of Appeal held that a promise by a husband to his wife to pay her £30 a month to cover her estimated expenses was not contractual. Atkin, L. J., pointed out (pp. 578-579) that "it is necessary to remember that there are agreements between parties which do not result in contracts within the meaning of that term in our law. The ordinary example is where two parties agree to take a walk together, or where there is an offer and an acceptance of hospitality. Nobody would suggest in ordinary circumstances that those agreements result in what we know as a contract and one of the most usual forms of agreement which does not constitute a contract appears to me to be the arrangements [as to allowances] which are made between husband and wife * * * To my mind those agreements, or many of them, do not result in contracts at all and they do not result in contracts even though there may be what as between other parties would constitute consideration for the agreement. * * * They are not contracts because the parties did not intend that they should be attended by legal consequences. * * * They are not sued upon, not because the parties are reluctant to enforce their legal rights when the agreement is broken, but because the parties, in the inception of the arrangement, never intended that they should be sued upon. Agreements such as these are outside the realm of contracts altogether."

The second count of the declaration stated that the defendants by their agents issued to the plaintiffs and other persons engaged in the wholesale trade a circular in the words and figures following: that is to say, "28 King Street, Cheapside, May 17th, 1869. We are instructed to offer to the wholesale trade for sale by tender the stock in trade of Messrs. G. Eilbeck & Co., of No. 1 Milk Street, amounting as per stock-book to £2,503. 13s. 1d., and which will be sold at a discount in one lot. Payment to be made in cash. The stock may be viewed on the premises, No. 1, Milk Street, up to Thursday, the 20th instant, on which day, at 12 o'clock at noon precisely, the tenders will be received and opened at our offices. Should you tender and not attend the sale, please address to us, sealed and inclosed, 'Tender for Eilbeck's stock.' Stock-books may be had at our office on Tuesday morning. Honey, Humphreys & Co." And the defendants offered and undertook to sell the said stock to the highest bidder for cash, and to receive and open the tenders delivered to them or their agents in that behalf, according to the true intent and meaning of the said circular. And the plaintiffs thereupon sent to the said agents of the defendants a tender for the said goods, in accordance with the said circular, and also attended the said sale at the time and place named in the said circular. And the said tender of the plaintiff was the highest tender received by the defendants or their agents in that behalf. And the plaintiffs were ready and willing to pay for the said goods according to the true intent and meaning of the said circular. And all conditions were performed, &c., to entitle the plaintiffs to have their said tender accepted by the defendants, and to be declared the purchasers of the said goods according to the true intent and meaning of the said circular; yet the defendants refused to accept the said tender of the plaintiffs, and refused to sell the said goods to the plaintiffs, and refused to open the said tender or proceed with the sale of the said goods, in accordance with their said offer and undertaking in that behalf; whereby the plaintiffs had been deprived of profit, &c.

the plaintiffs' tender or sell them the goods. Joinder.

WILLES, J. I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment. The action is brought against persons who issued a circular offering a stock for sale by tender, to be sold at a discount in one lot. The plaintiffs sent in a tender which turned out to be the highest, but which was not accepted. They now insist that the circular amounts to a contract or promise to sell the goods to the highest bidder—that is, in this case, to the person who should tender for them at the smallest rate of discount; and reliance is placed on the cases as to rewards offered for the discovery of an offender. In those cases, however, there never was any doubt that the advertisement amounted to a promise to pay the money to the person who first gave the information. The difficulty suggested was that it was a contract with all the world. But that, of course, was soon overruled. It was an offer to become liable to any person who before the offer should be retracted should happen to be the person to fulfill the contract of which the advertisement was an offer or tender. That is not the sort of difficulty which presents itself here. If the circular had gone on, "and we undertake to sell to the highest bidder," the reward cases would have applied, and there would have been a good contract in respect of the persons. But the question is, whether there is here any offer to enter into a contract at all, or whether the circular amounts to anything more than a mere proclamation that the defendants are ready to chaffer for the sale of the goods, and to receive offers for the purchase of them. In advertisements for tenders for buildings it is not usual to say that the contract will be given to the lowest bidder, and it is not always that the contract is made with the lowest bidder. Here there is a total absence of any words to intimate that the highest bidder is to be the purchaser. It is a mere attempt to ascertain whether an offer can be obtained within such a margin as the sellers are willing to adopt.

KEATING and MONTAGUE SMITH, JJ., concurred.

*Judgment for the defendants.

* In Grainger & Son v. Gough, [1896] A. C. 325, 333, Lord Herschell discussed the argument of counsel as to the effect of orders given by buyers who received price lists from the London agents of M. Louis Roederer, a wine merchant of Reims, France, who, in his arrangements with his agents, reserved the right to reject any particular order. Lord Herschell said:

"He [counsel] called attention to certain price lists which were distributed by the appellants among persons likely to give orders, and contended that as soon as an order was given to them by a person receiving one of those lists a contract to supply the specified quantity at the price named in the list was complete, subject only to a right on the part of Roederer to disavow it. I think it impossible to accede to this contention. In my opinion, this would not be understood by any one in the trade to be the effect of giving an order for goods specified in such a price list. The transmission of such a price list does not amount to an offer to supply an unlimited quantity of the wine described at the price named, so that as soon as an order is given there is a binding contract to supply that quantity. If it were so, the merchant might find him-

DAVID SEARS, JR., v. EASTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1867. 14 Allen 433, 92 Am. Dec. 780.)

CHAPMAN, J. If this action can be maintained, it must be for the breach of the contract which the defendants made with the plaintiff. He had purchased a package of tickets entitling him to a passage in their cars for each ticket from Boston to Lynn. This constituted a contract between the parties. Cheney v. Boston & Fall River Railroad, 11 Met. 121; Boston & Lowell Railroad v. Proctor, 1 Allen 267; Najac v. Boston & Lowell Railroad, 7 Allen 329. The principal question in this case is, what are the terms of the contract? The ticket does not express all of them. A public advertisement of the times when their trains run enters into the contracts, and forms a part of it. Denton v. Great Northern Railway, 5 El. & Bl. 860. It is an offer which, when once publicly made, becomes binding, if accepted before it is retracted. Boston & Maine Railroad v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. 227. Advertisements offering rewards are illustrations of this method of making contracts. But it would be unreasonable to hold that advertisements as to the time of running trains, when once made, are irrevocable. Railroad corporations find it necessary to vary the time of running their trains, and they have a right, under reasonable limitations, to make this variation, even as against those who have purchased tickets. This reserved right enters into the contract, and forms a part of it. The defendants had such a right in this case.

But if the time is varied, and the train fails to go at the appointed time, for the mere convenience of the company or a portion of their self involved in any number of contractual obligations to supply wine of a particular description which he would be quite unable to carry out, his stock of wine of that description being necessarily limited."

"And an invitation to prospective buyers to negotiate for a license [to sell defendant's patented products] and to trade with the defendant, even when confined to a definite class, imposes no obligation on the sender of accepting any offer which thereafter might be received. The order of the prospective buyer does not ripen into a contract of sale until the defendant's acceptance, and then only as to goods specifically ordered." Braley, J., in Montgomery Ward & Co. v. Johnson, 209 Mass. 89, 91 (1911).

"There may be offers not resulting, when the offer is accepted, in a contract. An excellent illustration of that proposition is offered by Spencer v. Harding, L. R. 5 C. P. 561. * * * Applying the principles of that case to the present, is there a contract? In my opinion there is nothing more than a proclamation that an examination for a scholarship will be held, and there is no announcement that the scholarship will be awarded to the scholar who obtains the highest number of marks. Consequently by coming in and submitting to the examination [and getting the highest number of marks] the plaintiff did not do that which resulted in a contract." Chitty, J., in Rooke v. Dawson, [1895] 1 Ch. 480, 485-486.

On the distinction between offer or acceptance and a preliminary step in negotiation, see 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 177, note.

expected passengers, a person who presents himself at the advertised hour, and demands a passage, is not bound by the change unless he has had a reasonable notice of it. The defendants acted upon this view of their duty, and gave certain notices. Their trains had been advertised to go from Boston to Lynn at 9.30 P. M., and the plaintiff presented himself, with his ticket, at the station to take the train; but was there informed that it was postponed to 11.15. The postponement had been made for the accommodation of passengers who desired to remain in Boston to attend places of amusement. Certain notices of the change had been given; but none of them had reached the plaintiff. They were printed handbills posted up in the cars and stations on the day of the change, and also a day or two before. Though he rode in one of the morning cars from Lynn to Boston, he did not see the notice, and no legal presumption of notice to him arises from the fact of its being posted up. Brown v. Eastern Railroad, 11 Cush. 101; Malone v. Boston & Worcester Railroad, 12 Gray, 388. The defendants published daily advertisements of their regular trains in the "Boston Daily Advertiser," "Post," and "Courier," and the plaintiff had obtained his information as to the time of running from one of these papers. If they had published a notice of the change in these papers, we think he would have been bound by it. For as they had a right to make changes, he would be bound to take reasonable pains to inform himself whether or not a change was made. So if in their advertisement they had reserved the right to make occasional changes in the time of running a particular train, he would have been bound by the reservation. It would have bound all passengers who obtained their knowledge of the time-table from either of these sources. But it would be contrary to the elementary law of contracts to hold that persons who relied upon the advertisements in either of those papers should be bound by a reservation of the offer, which was, without their knowledge, posted up in the cars and stations. If the defendants wished to free themselves from their obligations to the whole public to run a train as advertised, they should publish notice of the change as extensively as they published notice of the regular trains. And as to the plaintiff, he was not bound by a notice published in the cars and stations which he did not see. If it had been published in the newspapers above mentioned, where his information had in fact been obtained, and he had neglected to look for it, the fault would have been his own.

The evidence as to the former usage of the defendants to make occasional changes was immaterial, because the advertisement was an express stipulation which superseded all customs that were inconsistent with it. An express contract cannot be controlled or varied by usage. Ware v. Hayward Rubber Co., 3 Allen 84.

The court are of opinion that the defendants, by failing to give such notice of the change made by them in the time of running their train on the evening referred to as the plaintiff was entitled to receive, violated their contract with him, and are liable in this action.

*Judgment for the plaintiff.

*It has been said that "The passing of a street railway car is the offer of a contract of transportation which is accepted by the passenger's boarding the car." Brantly on Contracts, 2 ed., 22-23.

"The printed schedule is an offer which was accepted by the plaintiff when he asked for a ticket, and he had a legal right to be transported by the first train stopping at Harrisburg. If the train arrives after schedule time or misses connection, or delivers a passenger at his destination after the schedule time, unless the delay is caused by no fault of the carrier, the passenger has a right to recover compensation for his loss of time and actual expenses." Clark, C. J., in Coleman v. R. R., 138 N. C. 351, 354, (1905). But Professor Williston has pointed out (1 Williston on Contracts, § 32a) that the exception of delay without the fault of the carrier shows that the doctrine is erroneous, and that accordingly, "the obligation of the railroad to conform to its time table seems rather due to its obligations as a public service corporation, irrespective of contract, than to an obligation voluntarily assumed."

The railroads have avoided the contract difficulty by printing on their time tables, "subject to change without notice."

In Mulligan v. Southern Rwy., 84 So. Car. 171, 175-6 (1909), Jones, C. J., said: "The carrier cannot by contract limit its common law liability for injury resulting from its negligence, but if the passenger has, or should have, knowledge that the schedules as published are not guaranteed by the carrier, he takes passage subject to such delays in making advertised schedules and connections as are not due to the negligence or wilful act of the carrier; but if the carrier negligently or wilfully fails to make the published schedules, the passenger injured thereby may recover damages."

It seems judicially assumed that by inserting "Subject to change without notice" and other conditions in time tables, the railroads have eliminated the contract question raised in Sears v. Eastern Railroad Co. This is well illustrated in several English cases. In Driver v. London & North-Western Rwy. Co., 16 T. L. R. 293 (1900) railway tickets referred passengers to the time tables which contained a condition which A. L. Smith, L. J., summarized as stating that the defendants "would not undertake that the trains would arrive at the times stated in their time tables, nor would they be accountable for any loss or inconvenience or injury arising from delays or detention." The validity of the condition was recognized by holding that in the absence of evidence of negligence on their part, the defendants were not liable. Similar conditions were held to form part of the contract of carriage in McCartan v. The North-Eastern Rwy. Co., 54 L. J. Q. B. 441 (1885); Prevost v. Great Eastern Rwy. Co., 13 L. T. R. 20 (1865); Thompson v. Midland Rwy. Co., 34 L. T. R. 34 (1875). But by such a contract the company cannot escape responsibility for its negligence. Buckmaster v. Great Eastern Rwy. Co., 23 L. T. R. 471 (1870). As was said in Prevost v. Great Eastern Rwy. Co., supra, by Crompton, J.: "The company expressly say, 'We will not contract, and it shall not be taken as part of our duty, to guarantee the arrival of trains,' but they go on to say, we will take the greatest care to insure punctuality. I think that the contract and duty is simply this, that they will use proper care and not be negligent" (p. 21).

CHEROKEE TANNING EXTRACT CO. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1906. 143 N. C. 376, 55 S. E. 777, 118 Am. St. Rep. 806.)

Action by the Cherokee Tanning Extract Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company, for damages alleged to have been sustained through the negligence of the defendant in failing to transmit and deliver promptly a certain telegram. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and partial new trial ordered.

BROWN, J. There is no dispute as to the material facts. The evidence shows: That on the 7th day of November, 1903, an agent of the Standard Oil Company at Wilmington, N. C., wrote to the plaintiff at Andrews, N. C., a letter containing among other things, this request: "Kindly advise us by wire Monday if you can use about 1,500 creosote barrels between now and January 1st at 95 cents each delivered in car load lots." That the plaintiff received this letter on Monday, November 9th, and at 7:30 P. M., of that day filed with the defendant, at its Andrews office, a message addressed to the Standard Oil Company, Wilmington, N. C., and reading as follows: "We accept your offer 1,500 barrels as per yours of the 7th." This message was delivered to the sendee at 10:36 A. M., November 10th. At the same time it wrote to plaintiff, the oil company addressed a similar letter to the Brevard Tanning Company and others. The latter company purchased the barrels by telegram received by the oil company shortly before plaintiff's message. The plaintiff claims substantial damage. Defendant requested the court to charge that plaintiff was entitled to recover nominal damages only, to wit, the price paid for the telegram. We think this instruction should have been given.

Damages are measured in matters of contract not only by the well-known rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, but they must not be the remote, but the proximate, consequence of a breach of contract, and must not be speculative or contingent. Unless the reply of plaintiff by wire to the letter of the oil company created a contract between the two for the sale and delivery of 1,500 barrels at 95 cents each, then plaintiff can recover only nominal damages for any other damages would necessarily be purely speculative or contingent. The language of Brannon, J., in a similar case in West Virginia is appropriate to this: "But the trouble facing the plaintiff in this case is that there was no final contract between the parties, but only a proposal for a contract, and there can be no contract without both a proposal and its acceptance. The failure of the telegram company did not cause the breach of a consummate contract; it only prevented one that might or might not have been made." Beatty v. Tel. Co. (W. Va.) 44 S. E. 309. See, also, Hosiery Co. v. Tel. Co. (Ga.) 51 S. E. 290 and Wilson v. Tel. Co. (N. C.) 52 S. E. 153. The offer must be distinct as such, and not merely an invitation to enter into negotiations upon a certain basis. Wire Works v. Sorrell, 142 Mass 442, 8 N. E. 332; Beaupre v. Tel. Co., 21 Minn. 155; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 1029, and cases cited.

Again, the offer must specify the specific quantity to be furnished, as a mere acceptance of an indefinite offer will not create a binding contract. McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 1030, note 1, and cases cited. "The offer must be one which is intended of itself to create legal relations on acceptance. It must not be an offer merely to open negotiations which will ultimately result in a contract." 1 Page on Cont. § 26, and cases cited; Clark on Contracts, § 29. In Moulton v. Kershaw, 59 Wis. 316, 18 N. W. 172, 48 Am. Rep. 516, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff as follows: "In consequence of a rupture in the salt trade, we are authorized to offer Michigan fine salt in full car load lots of 80 to 75 barrels, delivered at your city at 95 cents per barrel to be shipped per C. & N. W. R. R. Co. only. At this price it is a bargain as the price in general remains unchanged. Shall be pleased to receive your order." The plaintiff at once telegraphed the defendant: "Your letter of yesterday received and noted. You may ship me two thousand barrels Michigan fine salt as offered in your letter." The defendant declined to deliver the sale and plaintiff sued for damages. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, held that the communication between the parties did not show a contract; that the letter of the defendants was not such an offer as plaintiff could by an acceptance change into a binding agreement.* See, also, Smith v. Gowdy, 90 Mass. 566. The letter from the oil company to the plaintiff was a mere inquiry. Walser v. Tel. Co., 114 N. C. 440, 19 S. E. 366. It was evidently a "trade inquiry" sent out by the oil company to customers, and did not purport and was not intended to be a legal offer binding on acceptance. "Care should be taken always not to construe as an agreement letters which the parties intended only as preliminary negotiations." Lyman v. Robinson, 14 Allen (Mass.) 254.

Again, the acceptance by the plaintiff was not in terms of the offer. The acceptance was for 1,500 barrels. The oil company could not have compelled the plaintiff to take a less number. If the plaintiff regarded the oil company's letter as a valid offer, it should have replied that it would take what barrels the oil company had, not exceeding 1,500, as

* In Moulton v. Kershaw, cited supra, Taylor, J., for the court said: "They say, 'We are authorized to offer Michigan fine salt,' etc., and volunteer an opinion that at the terms stated it is a bargain. They do not say, 'We offer to sell to you.' They use general language proper to be addressed generally to those who were interested in the salt trade. It is clearly in the nature of an advertisement or business circular, to attract the attention of those interested in that business to the fact that good bargains in salt could be had by applying to them, and not as an offer by which they were to be bound, if accepted, for any amount the persons to whom it was addressed might see fit to order. We think the complaint fails to show any contract between the parties."

that company had offered no exact specific number. "An acceptance to bind the other party must be unconditional and unqualified and must correspond exactly to the terms of the offer." 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. 1031, 1032, and cases cited; 1 Parsons, Cont. 476, 477. As the plaintiff's message to the oil company seasonably delivered would not, of itself, have effected a legal contract between the plaintiff and the oil company for the delivery of 1,500 barrels at 95 cents each, it follows that any other than nominal damages would be purely speculative. The oil company might have delivered the barrels, and then, again, it might not have done so. It might have delivered 1,500, and again it might have delivered a much less number. Its letter specified no exact number and it was under no legal compulsion to deliver any.

As the defendant manifests its willingness to pay nominal damages, it is unnecessary to consider the exceptions to his honor's rulings on the issue of negligence.

We award a new trial upon the second issue relating to the damages.

*Partial new trial.*¹⁰

In Davis v. Brigham, 56 Ore. 41 (1910), one Mitchell wrote Brigham in Michigan that one Davis of a certain lumber company had been looking over timber in Lane County, Oregon, where Mitchell and Brigham had land, and that "they will buy in there if they can get thirty or more claims at about $1500 or $1600 per claim" etc. Mitchell's second letter was dated Aug. 19. On Aug. 25 Brigham wrote to Mitchell "Yours of the 19th relative to my quarter section near yours, I consider $1600 decidedly too small a price, but if mine is needed to develop the country I will let it go for that price provided it is taken within twenty days." On Sept. 13th Mitchell wired Brigham: "Send deed in name of W. G. Davis to Dexter Horton & Co., bankers, Seattle, Wash., per your letter August 25." Held, (1) Brigham's letter of Aug. 25 was not an offer but an authorization to bring a purchaser; (2) Mitchell's telegram was not an acceptance.

In Sellers v. Warren, 116 Me. 350 (1917) to an offer which seemingly was that offeree should receive one-fourth of the purchase money named, the offeree telegraphed "would not consider less than half." Bird, J., said (pp. 353-4): "It cannot be held that a refusal to consider less than half is an offer to accept one-half. It is tantamount to saying that a party will consider, think or reflect upon such an offer of one-half, if made. The words are appropriate to the invitation rather than to the proposal of an offer."

BOYERS & CO. v. D. & R. DUKE.

(High Court of Justice in Ireland, King's Bench Division. [1905] 2 Ir. Rep. 617, 3 B. R. C. 220.)

Motion on behalf of the plaintiffs to set aside the verdict [directed by Wright, J.], and judgment entered for the defendants, and enter verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs for £29 13s. 9d and costs.

LORD O'BRIEN, L. C. J.* The short question in this case is, whether these letters or documents which passed between the plaintiffs and the defendants constitute a completed contract—whether they amount to an offer and an acceptance of the offer, or to a quotation and an order? If they amount to the former, they constitute a contract; if to the latter, that is to say to a quotation and order, they do not constitute a contract. The action in which the question arises was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants for alleged breach of contract for the supply of canvass. * * * The controversy arises, as I have said, upon the construction of the documents. My brother Wright, who tried the case, held that they did not constitute a completed contract, and we are of the opinion that he was right in so holding.

What then, are these documents? The first is dated the 23rd February, 1904, from the plaintiffs to the defendants, and is in the following terms: "Please give us your lowest quotation for 3000 yards of canvass, 32½ inches wide, to the enclosed sample, or near, and your shortest time for delivery, and oblige, etc." Now, this is expressly a request for a quotation. The reply is dated the 24th February 1904, and is as follows: "We enclose sample, No. B3932, nearest we have to match yours, also enclosed. Lowest price, 32½ inches wide, is 4½d per yard, 36 inches measure. Delivery of 3000 yards in 5/6 weeks." This, in my opinion, amounts only to a quotation. Certainly, quantity, price and time of delivery are stated, but I think it is nothing more than a statement of their ability to turn out the subject-matter at a certain price at a certain time, and not an offer to sell it at the price and to deliver it within the time mentioned. It amounted to nothing more, in my opinion, than a quotation in reply to a request for one.

Now comes the third and last letter, which is said by the plaintiffs to be an acceptance of an offer to sell on certain terms. It is dated March the 3rd. I shall read it: "Messrs D. & R. Duke, Brechin, N. B. Gents, —Please get made for us 3000 yards of canvass, 32½ inches wide, as per your quotation, February 24th, at 4½d per yard; deliver same as quickly as possible. Also please quote us for same, 52 inches wide, for quantity of amount 20,000 yards annually. As we have not had the pleasure of doing business with you before, we give you as reference Messrs. Baxter Brothers, Dundee; Messrs. Richards, Ltd. Aberdeen. Canvass No. B. 3932.

*The statement of facts and portions of the opinions are omitted.

—(Signed) Boyers & Co. Also please quote us for canvas to sample enclosed, 52 inches wide, and oblige, B. & Co.”

Is this an acceptance of an offer or an order? In my opinion it is not the acceptance of an offer, because the letter to which it was a reply was a quotation and not an offer.

This letter is nothing more than it purports to be, namely, an order based on a quotation. The words are “Please get made for us 3000 yards of canvas, 32½ inches wide, as per your quotation, February 24th.” The first letter, that is to say, the letter of the 23rd February asked for a quotation; the letter of the 24th sent what was asked for; and the plaintiffs’ letter of the 3rd March expressly refers to the letter of the 24th, as “per your quotation February 24th.”

Light is also thrown upon the true character of the letter of the 3rd March by the giving of references as therein, which is certainly far more compatible with the giving of an order or offer to purchase, than with a completed contract. The words “as quickly as possible” in the letter of the 3rd March would perhaps point to an uncompleted contract, but I think this criticism is so minute that much weight is not to be attached to it.

We are of the opinion that my brother Wright’s view was correct and that judgment should be for the defendants.

GIBSON, J. * * * It is suggested for the plaintiffs that defendants’ only reason for denying the existence of a contract is that there was a mistake in the price quoted. Whatever was the reason—whether mistake, rise of price, or otherwise—what we have to determine is whether there was a proposal to sell followed by an acceptance. It is very much a question of mercantile fact.

* * * The case is a difficult one; but, taking all the circumstances together, * * * I am not satisfied that a concluded contract is made out. If the plaintiffs’ reference had proved unsatisfactory, could not the defendants have declined to execute the order? The letter of March 3rd following the letter of February 23rd is much more like an order, offered on the basis of a quotation, than the acceptance of a proposal to sell by which the plaintiffs understood the defendants to be bound.

MADDEN, J. The defendants in this case were asked for a “quotation”. Now the word “quotation” is capable of different meanings according to the connexion in which it is used, but there is a common idea underlying them all, that of notation and enumeration. The thing quoted may be passages in an author, the price of specific articles, or the terms upon which work is to be done. In the case before us both parties agree that the documents before us must be read and construed giving the words the ordinary meaning which they bear in the English language, having regard to the subject-matter to which they relate; for neither party has contended that evidence should have been taken as to the use of the word “quotation” in mercantile transactions.

A quotation might be so expressed as to amount to an offer to provide a definite article, or to do a certain work, at a defined price. But the ideas of a quotation, and of an offer to sell, are radically different. The difference is well illustrated by the case of Harvey v. Facey, [1893] A. C. 552. There, to a telegram in these terms, "Will you sell us B.H.P.? Telegraph lowest cash price," the answer was returned, "Lowest price for B.H.P., £900." The inquirer telegraphed, "We agree to buy B.H.P. for £900 asked by you." An exceptionally strong judicial committee of the Privy Council, in a judgment delivered by Lord Morris, held that the statement, or quotation, of the lowest price at which a definite thing will be sold, does not import an offer to sell.¹¹

The principle on which this case was decided applies with greater force to mercantile transactions than to an application for a statement of the price of a single parcel of land. It is a matter of common knowledge that quotations of prices are scattered broadcast among possible customers. Business could not be carried on if each such recipient of a priced catalogue offering a desirable article—say a rare book—at an attractive price, were in a position to create a contract of sale by writing that he would buy at the price mentioned. The catalogue had probably reached many collectors. The order of one only can be honoured. Has each of the others who write for the book a right of action? Wholesale dealers have

¹¹ In Harvey v. Facey, Lord Morris said: "The first telegram asks two questions. The first question is as to the willingness of L. M. Facey to sell to the appellants; the second question asks the lowest price, and the word 'Telegraph' is in its collocation addressed to that second question only. L. M. Facey replied to the second question only, and gives his lowest price. The third telegram from the appellants treats the answer of L. M. Facey stating his lowest price as an unconditional offer to sell to them at the price named. Their Lordships cannot treat the telegram from L. M. Facey as binding him in any respect, except to the extent it does by its terms—viz., the lowest price. Everything else is left open, and the reply telegram from the appellants cannot be treated as an acceptance of an offer to sell to them; it is an offer that required to be accepted by L. M. Facey. The contract could only be completed if L. M. Facey had accepted the appellant's last telegram. It has been contended for the appellants that L. M. Facey's telegram should be read as saying 'yes' to the first question put in the appellant's telegram, but there is nothing to support that contention. L. M. Facey's telegram gives a precise answer to a precise question—viz., the price. The contract must appear by the telegrams, whereas the appellants are obliged to contend that an acceptance of the first question is to be implied. Their Lordships are of opinion that the mere statement of the lowest price at which the vendor would sell contains no implied contract to sell at that price to the persons making the inquiry."

In Knight v. Cooley, 34 Ia. 218 (1872) Beck, C. J. said: "The mere statement of the price at which property is held cannot be understood as an offer to sell. The seller may desire to choose the purchaser and may not be willing to part with his property to any one who offers his price." See Smith v. Gowdy, 8 Allen (Mass.) 566 (1864).

On naming price as an offer to sell or a quotation, see L. R. A. 1915 F, 824, note; 3 B. R. C. 229, note.

not in stock an unlimited supply of the articles the prices of which they quote to the public at large. This stock usually bears some proportion to the orders which they may reasonably expect to receive. Transactions of the kind under consideration are intelligible and business-like, if we bear in mind the distinction between a quotation, submitted as a basis of a possible order, and an offer to sell which, if accepted, creates a contract, for the breach of which damages may be recovered.

These observations seem to apply with special force to a quotation furnished by a manufacturer, in the position of the defendants, stating the terms on which he is prepared to work, as to price and time for completion. He may receive and comply with many applications for quotations on the same day. If his reply in each case can be turned into a contract by acceptance, his looms might be burdened with an amount of work which would render it impossible for him to meet his engagements. In my opinion, a merchant, dealer, or manufacturer, by furnishing a quotation invites an offer which will be honored or not according to the exigencies of the business. A quotation based on current prices usually holds good for a limited time. But it remains a quotation on the basis of which an offer will not be entertained after a certain date.¹⁸ I have arrived at this conclusion irrespective of the terms of the letter of the 3rd March, as to which I will only say that it suggests to my mind that the writer knew well that he was giving an order, not accepting an offer for sale.

FAIRMOUNT GLASS WORKS v. GRUNDEN-MARTIN WOODEN-WARE CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1899. 106 Ky. 659, 51 S. W. 196.)

Action by the Grunden-Martin Woodenware Company against the Fairmount Glass Works to recover damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

¹⁸ In Johnston Bros. v. Rogers Bros., 30 Ontario, 150 (1899), defendants wrote to plaintiffs who were bakers, about flour, saying, "We quote you, R. O. B. or F. O. B. your station, Hungarian $5.40 and strong Bakers $5.00, car lots only, and subject to sight draft with bill of lading." Plaintiffs immediately telegraphed, "We will take two cars Hungarian at your offer of yesterday." Defendants telegraphed back the same day, "Will accept advance of thirty on yesterday's quotations." It was held that there was no contract. After giving dictionary definitions of "quotation" and "quote" as "to give" or "to name" or "to state" "the current or market price of," Falconbridge, J., said: "Now if we write the equivalent phrase into the letter—'We give you the current or market price, F. O. B. your station of Hungarian Patent $5.40—' can it be for a moment contended that it is an offer which needs only an acceptance in terms to constitute a contract?"

HOBSON, J. On April 20, 1895, appellee wrote appellant the following letter:

"St. Louis, Mo., April 20, 1895. Gentlemen: Please advise us the lowest price you can make us on our order for ten car loads of Mason green jars, complete, with caps, packed one dozen in a case, either delivered here, or f. o. b. cars your place, as you prefer. State terms and cash discount. Very truly, Grunden-Martin W. W. Co."

To this letter appellant answered as follows:

"Fairmount, Ind., April 23, 1895. Grunden-Martin Wooden Ware Co., St. Louis, Mo.—Gentlemen: Replying to your favor of April 20, we quote you Mason fruit jars, complete, in one-dozen boxes, delivered in East St. Louis, Ill.: Pints $4.50, quarts $5.00, half gallons $6.50 per gross, for immediate acceptance, and shipment not later than May 15, 1895; sixty days' acceptance, or 2 off, cash in ten days. Yours, truly, Fairmount Glass Works.

"Please note that we make all quotations and contracts subject to the contingencies of agencies or transportation, delays or accidents beyond our control."

For reply thereto, appellee sent the following telegram on April 24, 1895:

"Fairmount Glass Works, Fairmount, Ind.: Your letter twenty-third received. Enter order ten car loads as per your quotation. Specifications mailed. Grunden-Martin W. W. Co."

In response to this telegram, appellant sent the following:

"Fairmount, Ind., April 24, 1895. Grunden-Martin W. W. Co., St. Louis, Mo.: Impossible to book your order. Output all sold. See letter. Fairmount Glass Works."

Appellee insists that, by its telegram sent in answer to the letter of April 23d, the contract was closed for the purchase of 10 car loads of Mason fruit jars. Appellant insists that the contract was not closed by this telegram, and that it had the right to decline to fill the order at the time it sent its telegram of April 24. This is the chief question in the case. The court below gave judgment in favor of appellee, and appellant has appealed, earnestly insisting that the judgment is erroneous.

We are referred to a number of authorities holding that a quotation of prices is not an offer to sell, in the sense that a completed contract will arise out of the giving of an order for merchandise in accordance with the proposed terms. There are a number of cases holding that the transaction is not completed until the order so made is accepted. 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 138; Smith v. Gowdy, 8 Allen 566; Beaupre v. Telegraph Co., 21 Minn. 155. But each case must turn largely upon the language there used. In this case we think there was more than a quotation of prices, although appellant's letter uses the word "quote" in stating the prices given. The true meaning of the correspondence must be determined by reading it as a whole. Appellee's letter of April 20th, which began the transaction, did not ask for a quotation of prices. It reads: "Please advise us the lowest price you can make us on our order for ten carloads of Mason green jars. * * * State terms and cash discount." From this appellant could not fail to understand that appellee wanted to know at what price it would sell it ten car loads of these jars; so when, in answer, it wrote: "We quote you Mason fruit jars * * * pints $4.50, quarts $5.00, half gallons $6.50, per gross, for immediate acceptance; * * * 2 off, cash in ten days,"—it must be deemed as intending to give appellee the information it had asked for. We can hardly understand what was meant by the words "for immediate acceptance," unless the latter was intended as a proposition to sell at these prices if accepted immediately. In construing every contract, the aim of the court is to arrive at the intention of the parties. In none of the cases to which we have been referred on behalf of appellant was there on the face of the correspondence any such expression of intention to make an offer to sell on the terms indicated. In Fitzhugh v. Jones, 6 Munf. 83, the use of the expression that the buyer should reply as soon as possible, in case he was disposed to accede to the terms offered, was held sufficient to show that there was a definite proposition, which was closed by the buyer's acceptance. The expression in appellant's letter, "for immediate acceptance," taken in connection with appellee's letter, in effect, at what price it would sell it the goods, is it seems to us, much stronger evidence of a present offer, which, when accepted immediately, closed the contract. Appellee's letter was plainly an inquiry for the price and terms on which appellant would sell it the goods, and appellant's answer to it was not a quotation of prices, but a definite offer to sell on the terms indicated, and could not be withdrawn after the terms had been accepted.

It will be observed that the telegram of acceptance refers to the specifications mailed. These specifications were contained in the following letter: "St. Louis, Mo., April 24, 1895. Fairmount Glass-Works Co., Fairmount, Ind.—Gentlemen: We received your letter of 23rd this morning, and telegraphed you in reply as follows: 'Your letter 23rd received. Enter order ten car loads as per your quotation. Specifications mailed,'—which we now confirm. We have accordingly entered this contract on our books for the ten cars Mason green jars, complete, with caps and rubbers, one dozen in case, delivered to us in East St. Louis at $4.50 per gross for pint, $5.00 for quart, $6.50 for one-half gallon. Terms, 60 days' acceptance, or 2 per cent. for cash in ten days, to be shipped not later than May 15, 1895. The jars and caps to be strictly first-quality goods. You may ship the first car to us here assorted: Five gross pint, fifty-five gross quart, forty gross one-half gallon. Specifications for the remaining 9 cars we will send later. Grunden-Martin W. W. Co." It is insisted for appellant that this was not an acceptance of the offer as made; that the stipulation, "The jars and caps to be strictly first-quality goods," was not in their offer; and that, it not having been accepted as made, appellant is not bound. But it will be observed that appellant declined to furnish the goods before it got this letter, and in the correspondence with appellee it nowhere complained of these words as an addition to the contract. Quite a number of other letters passed, in which the refusal to deliver the goods was placed on other grounds, none of which have been sustained by the evidence. Appellee offers proof tending to show that these words, in the trade in which parties were engaged, conveyed the same meaning as the words used in appellant's letter, and were only a different form of expressing the same idea. Appellant's conduct would seem to confirm this evidence.

Appellant also insists that the contract was indefinite, because the quantity of each size of the jars was not fixed, that 10 car loads is too indefinite a specification of the quantity sold, and that appellee had no right to accept the goods to be delivered on different days. The proof shows that "10 car loads" is an expression used in the trade as equivalent to 1,000 gross, 100 gross being regarded a car load. The offer to sell the different sizes at different prices gave the purchaser the right to name the quantity of each size, and, the offer being to ship not later than May 15th, the buyer had the right to fix the time of delivery at any time before that. Sousely v. Burns, Adm'r, 10 Bush, 87; Williamson's Heirs v. Johnston's Heirs, 4 T. B. Mon. 253; Wheeler v. Railroad Co., 115 U. S. 34, 5 Sup. Ct. 1061, 1160. The petition, if defective, was cured by the judgment, which is fully sustained by the evidence.

¹² In Phillip & Co. v. Knoblauch, [1907] Session Cases 994, a merchant wrote to a firm of oil-millers, "I am offering today Plate linseed for January-February shipment, and have pleasure in quoting you 100 tons at 4½, usual Plate terms. I shall be glad to hear if you are buyers and await your esteemed reply." On the following day the oil-millers telegraphed: "Accept hundred January-February Plate" and confirmed this by a letter of the same date, in which, referring to their telegram, they wrote: "Thus buying from you 100 tons Plate linseed January-February shipment usual contract." It was held that the merchant's letter was an offer to sell and not merely a quotation of price and that this offer was accepted so as to constitute a concluded contract by the oil-millers' telegram, although it did not expressly refer to the condition of "usual Plate terms" mentioned in the offer. In that case the judges emphasized the words "await your esteemed reply." As Lord Ardwell put it: "The tender [in his letter] says, 'I shall be glad to hear that you are buyers.' This does not mean buyers in general, but buyers of the quantity specified at the price quoted, otherwise there would be no meaning in the phrase which follows, 'and await your esteemed reply'" (p. 998).

BENTON v. SPRINGFIELD YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASS'N.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1898. 170 Mass. 534, 49 N. E. 928, 64 Am. St. Rep. 320.)

Action by Edward R. Benton against the Springfield Young Men's Christian Association for breach of contract. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff excepts. Exceptions overruled.

ALLEN, J.¹⁴ The "notice to architects" issued by the defendant invited the plaintiff and other architects "to participate in the competition for plans, on the conditions" therein stated. One of these conditions was that "the committee reserve the right to reject any and all of the designs submitted." According to the plaintiff's offer of proof, he presented to the committee a full set of drawings of the proposed building. Other architects did the same. The committee thereupon, on May 19, 1893, passed a vote "that we proceed to examine drawings and specifications presented to us on basis of compliance with each and every requirement in our letter of invitation; and, after considering and discussing each requirement separately, a vote of the committee be taken as to which plan best meets the letter of requirements and the needs of the association, and that, on completion of this examination, we select the architect who has the largest number of votes." The offer of proof also states that the committee "agreed that the person who should receive the greatest number of votes should superintend the construction of the same." This can mean only that they so agreed among themselves. The next day, another meeting of the committee was held, and the plaintiff was found to have received the greatest number of first marks in the competition. Afterwards, at this meeting, the committee voted to reject all the plans submitted, and to return them to their owners, and all the plans were rejected. Immediately after this vote had been passed, another vote was passed, that the plaintiff "be chosen architect in accordance with the vote of last night"; the words "vote of last night" having reference to the receipt of the greatest number of first marks. This vote remained upon the books of the defendant for 40 days without being changed, at the end of which time it was rescinded. The committee did not, as a committee, communicate this vote to the plaintiff, or ask him to act under it; but two members of the committee notified him that he had been appointed as architect of the building, and this fact was known to the secretary of the committee, and also to other members of the committee, who made no objections to the notification, and did nothing in regard to the matter until the time of passing the vote of rescission. On July 3, 1893, the plaintiff wrote a letter to the committee claiming to act as architect, and saying that he had just heard that the committee had lately taken action which appeared to show their intention to deprive him of the position. The committee answered that no contract with him had been made. * * *

It is apparent, in the first place, that no contract arose out of the "notice to architects" and the presentation of plans by the plaintiff, because the right to reject any and all of the designs submitted was expressly reserved, and this right was exercised by a formal vote. The plaintiff, however, contends that his presentation of plans was an offer of his services as architect of the building, and that this offer was accepted by the vote of May 20th. There is nothing in the offer of proof to support this position. The notice to architects called simply for the submission of plans, with a description and explanation of them. Rejected designs were to be returned to their authors without any compensation. The plaintiff submitted drawings "in the manner specified." There is nothing to show that either by express words or by implication, he offered or was understood to offer his services as architect, unless his plans should be accepted. The vote rejecting his plans rejected all that he had offered. The new vote that he be chosen architect was not an offer to him. It was not communicated to him by the committee, nor voted to be so communicated. Those members who gave notice of the vote to the plaintiff did not act for or by authority of the committee. Their notification was not official, and did not purport to be so. The vote did not specify any terms or duties in detail, and it was not in form or intention a contract or the offer of a contract. It was merely an initiatory step, signifying the intention or purpose of the committee, and was not an act by which they meant to be bound as by a contract. If the plaintiff had notified them at once that he would act as architect, in pursuance of their vote, they might have answered that their vote was not a proposal or offer to him. Shaw v. Stone, 1 Cush. 228, 244; Dunham v. City of Boston, 12 Allen 375; Sears v. Railway Co., 152 Mass. 151, 25 N. E. 98; Edgemoor Bridge Works v. Bristol County, 49 N. E. 918.

If the plaintiff's letter was sent after the formal rescission of the vote, the plaintiff would fail to maintain his case for the additional reason that his acceptance of an offer after it had been recalled would be too late. But the decision is not put upon that ground, because, upon the facts stated, the vote was not a proposal or offer to him, and he could not convert it into a contract by signifying his acceptance of it, even though he acted promptly.

THE "SATANITA."

(Court of Appeal. [1895] P. 243.)

The Mudhook Yacht Club having advertised a regatta to be held on the Clyde in July, 1894, the appellant entered his yacht the Satanita, and the respondent entered his yacht, the Valkyrie, for a first-class race in the regatta, each owner signing a letter to the secretary of the club undertaking that while sailing under the entry he would obey and be bound by the sailing rules of the Yacht Club Association. Those rules contained a number of regulations to be observed in races, and among them rule 18 which corresponded to art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. By rule 24, " * * * If a yacht, in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules, shall foul another yacht, or compel another yacht to foul, she shall forfeit all claim to the prize and shall pay all damages." By rule 32, "Any yacht disobeying or infringing any of these rules, which shall apply to all yachts whether sailing in the same or different races, shall be disqualified from receiving any prize she would otherwise have won, and her owner shall be liable for all damages arising therefrom." While sailing under the entry, the Satanita, without the actual fault or privity of the owner, broke the 18th rule and ran into and sank the Valkyrie. The respondent and the master and crew of the latter vessel brought an action in the Admiralty Division against the appellant claiming damages. The appellant paid into court a sum as the amount of damages for which he was answerable under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, c. 63 s. 54, calculated at the rate of £8 per ton on the registered tonnage of the Satanita. Bruce, J., before whom the action was tried, held that even if there was a special contract binding the appellant, the words in the rules, "all damages" were not so express as to override the statutory limitation.

LORD ESHER, M. R.¹⁶ * * * Was there any contract between the proposed contract to that person, the latter having acquired knowledge thereof, could not, by acceptance, bring the owner into a contractual relation of sale. The owner might leave his uncommunicated draft in his agent's hands without liability and retract his agency and abandon his plan at any time. Until communication there is no efficacious proposal which could be accepted." Magie, Chancellor, in Jersey City v. Harrison, 72 N. J. L. 185, 189 (1905).

So a vote of the managers of a school accepting the offer of one who had applied for the position of head teacher did not amount to an acceptance where the managers gave no instructions to any one to communicate the vote to the offeror and later rescinded the vote, although one of the managers did telegraph him, without authorization but the day before the vote of rescission, that he had been selected as head master. Powell v. Lee, 99 L. T. R. 284 (1908). See Cozart v. Herndon, 114 No. Car. 252 (1894).

Portions of the opinion of Lord Esher, M. R., of Lopes, L. J. and of Rigby, L. J. are omitted.

owners of those two yachts? Or it may be put thus: Did the owner of the yacht which is sued enter into any obligation to the owner of the other yacht, that if his yacht broke the rules, and thereby injured the other yacht, he would pay damages? It seems to me clear that he did; and the way that he has undertaken that obligation is this. A certain number of gentlemen formed themselves into a committee and proposed to give prizes for matches sailed between yachts at a certain place on a certain date, and they promulgated certain rules, and said: "If you want to sail in any of our matches for our prize, you cannot do so unless you submit yourselves to the conditions which we have thus laid down. And one of the conditions is that if you do sail for one of such prizes you must enter into an obligation with the owners of the yachts who are competing, which they at the same time enter into similarly with you, that if by a breach of any of our rules, you do damage or injury to the owner of a competing yacht, you shall be liable to make good the damage which you have so done." If that is so, then when they do sail, and not till then, that relation is immediately formed between the yacht owners. There are other conditions with regard to these matches which constitute a relation between each of the yacht owners who enters his yacht and sails it and the committee; but that does not in the least do away with what the yacht owner has undertaken, namely, to enter into a relation with the other yacht owners, that relation containing an obligation.

Here the defendant, the owner of the Satanita, entered into a relation with the plaintiff Lord Dunraven, when he sailed his yacht against Lord Dunraven's yacht, and that relation contained an obligation that, if, by any breach of any of these rules, he did damage to the yacht of Lord Dunraven, he would have to pay the damages.

Now the defendant admits that his yacht, the Satanita, broke the rules. It is not material at present to consider which rule was broken, but, as a consequence of breaking the rule, his yacht ran into Lord Dunraven's yacht and sank it. That is conceded. Now comes the question, What damage is he liable for? * * *

I know that the plaintiff has relied in a sense upon rule 24; but I think the governing rule in this case is rule 32, which runs as follows: "Any yacht disobeying or infringing any of these rules, which shall apply to all yachts, whether sailing in the same or different races,"—I do not construe that part of the rule because I do not think it is material—"shall be disqualified from receiving any prize she would otherwise have won"—that condition by which they have agreed with the committee, the persons who give the prizes, that they shall be disqualified from receiving any prize, does not affect the owners of other yachts. Now we come to this: "And her owner shall be liable for all damages arising therefrom." Can that mean an obligation which they have undertaken to the committee?

If a yacht runs into one of the other yachts as was done on this occasion, how can that damage the committee? The committee have no interest in the yacht, they have not to pay for the loss of the yacht, and have nothing to do with the yacht, except that they have allowed her to run in the race for a prize; and if she won the race the committee has entered into an obligation to give her a cup, or money, or whatever it might be; but the committee is not damaged and cannot be damaged. Then who has the right to claim these damages? It seems to me clear that it is the owner of the yacht which has been sailing against this yacht, or at all events in the regatta. You must read in "to any other yacht which he may damage" for "all damages arising therefrom." If rule 24 is looked at, it seems to me to make it clearer that that must be the meaning, because it says: "If a yacht, in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules, shall foul another yacht,"—that is the thing which does the injury to the other yacht owner—"she shall forfeit all claim to the prize and shall pay all damages." What meaning are we to put upon these words, "all damages"? If it had been "shall pay damages" it would have been a futile rule, because if the rule was broken negligently the yacht owner would be liable to damages. Why is the word "all" put in? Nobody has been able to suggest any meaning to this word "all" except that it must be all the damages caused by the fouling. All the damages to whom? All the damages to the owner whose yacht has been injured. To my mind it is plain and clear. It is all damage caused to the owner of another yacht by reason of an injury having been done to that yacht. On the other hand, as the liability is for injury done to the yacht, if the yacht owner is going to make a present of valuable jewels to a lady after the race is over, and has the box containing them on his yacht at the time, or is allowing a lady to be on board during the race, with boxes of dresses or jewels, or the like, I have no doubt that the loss of these jewels or dresses would be a thing which the other party could not contemplate as a possible result of what he was doing, and therefore he would not be liable.

I cannot see how to construe that word "all" without saying that the effect of it is clearly to do away with the limitation contained in the Merchant Shipping Act. * * * I think, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L. J. * * * The questions are, first, was there a contract? secondly, what was the contract? * * *

As to the first question, I have no doubt that there was a contract. Probably a contract with the committee in certain cases, but also a contract between the owners of the competing yachts among themselves, and that contract was an undertaking that the owner of one competing yacht would pay the owner of any other competing yacht injured by his yacht all the damages arising from any infringement or disobedience of the rules.

In my opinion, directly an owner entered his yacht to sail, this contract arose; and it is clear that the owners of the Valkyrie and the Satanita did enter their respective yachts and did sail. Therefore, there was a contract, and under rule 32 damages became payable. * * *

The case was suggested by counsel for the Satanita of a lady falling into the water and damaging her dress. It is said that, if we give this large construction to the word "all" we should be including a case like that; but the lady would not be a party to this contract, and therefore could not recover under this rule. I am of the opinion that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below must be reversed.

RIGBY, L. J. I am of the same opinion, and out of deference to the learned judge, will shortly state my reasons.

The first question is that of contract or no contract. It appears to me that all that is necessary to constitute a contract between the yacht owners is to bring home to each of them the knowledge that the race is to be run under the Yacht Racing Association rules, and that they, the one and the other, deliberately enter for the race upon these terms. In this case we have a written document signed by each yacht owner, which, if there were any doubt at all, would render it abundantly clear that he was perfectly well aware of the bargain he was entering into. In no other way than that does it appear to me to be material.

The contract did not arise with any one, other than the managing committee, at the moment that the yacht owner signed the document, which it was necessary to sign in order to be a competitor. But when the owner of the Satanita on the one hand, and the owner of the Valkyrie on the other, actually came forward and became competitors upon these terms, I think it would be idle to say that there was not then, and thereby, a contract between them, provided always that there is something in the rule which points to a bargain between the owners of the yachts. Under rule 24, "If a yacht, in consequence of her neglect of any of these rules, shall foul another yacht, or compel other yachts to foul, she shall forfeit all claim to the prize and shall pay all damages." To whom is the owner of that yacht to pay those damages? He cannot pay them to the club, nor do I think the club could recover them. The true and sensible construction is that he must pay the owner of the yacht fouled. * * *

I agree that the judgment below must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

ANDERSON et al. v. WISCONSIN CENT. RY. CO.

proceedings advertised that at a time and place stated the buildings thereon would be sold at public auction. Bids for a certain house had been made until the amount offered amounted to $675. Anderson then increased his bid, $5, making his offer $680. The auctioneer refused to consider this bid, because, as he stated, the amount of the raise was too insignificant. After waiting for a time to give Anderson an opportunity to increase it, the auctioneer announced that the house was sold to the last previous bidder for $675. An entry of this sale was made by the auctioneer in his entry book, as required by section 2815, Rev. Laws 1905. Anderson demanded to know why the auctioneer had not accepted his bid, and on the same day he tendered the $680, and it was refused. Before this tender was made a bill of sale of the building had been executed and delivered to the party to whom the building had been knocked down. Anderson then brought this action for damages, and recovered a verdict for $1,500. The defendant appealed from an order denying its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial.

The conflicting contentions of the parties arise out of fundamentally different conceptions of the nature of an auction. The appellant contends that the advertisement of a sale at auction is a mere declaration of intention which does not bind the owner to sell, or to sell to any particular bidder, and that the contract is not made until the bid is accepted. The complaint [of appellee, however,] * * * proceeds upon the theory that * * * a contract has its inception in the announcement or advertisement of the owner's intention to sell the designated property at public auction to the highest bidder; that, unless the contrary is expressly stated in the announcement, the sale is to be without reserve; that the bid of the highest bidder is the acceptance of the offer; that the fall of the hammer is an announcement by the agent of the owner that he will wait no longer for a higher bid; and that the one whose bid was highest when the hammer fell is the purchaser without reference to the action of the auctioneer in announcing that some other bidder is the purchaser. Reduced to its lowest terms, this means that the offer to sell is made in the advertisement of intention to sell at auction, and that the contract is completed by the acceptance of that offer by the bidder. There is some ground for this theory, but the decided weight of authority sustains the view that the announcement is a mere statement of intention to hold an auction, and that no contract of any character is made until the offer to purchase is accepted by the auctioneer.

The jury, under proper instructions, found that the property was offered without express reservations as to the amount of the bids, that the bid of $5 was made in good faith, and that under the circumstances the amount was not so small as to justify the auctioneer in declining to consider it on that ground. No exceptions were taken to the instructions which submitted these questions to the jury, and on this appeal we accept the conclusions of the jury as final. The issue is also simplified by the fact that the case involves no question of puffing or by-bidding by the owner, or of fraud or misrepresentation in the announcement of the sale. For the purpose of the argument, we assume the correctness of the respondent's claim that an advertisement or announcement of an auction sale which does not state limitations and conditions is equivalent to the announcement that the sale will be without reserve. The issue of law is thus clearly defined.

The custom of selling goods at auction is as old as the law of sale. In Rome military spoils were disposed of at the foot of the spear—sub hastio—by auction, or increase. In later times we find a mode of auction called a "sale by the candle," or by the "inch of candle," which consisted of offering the property for sale for such a length of time as would suffice for the burning of an inch of candle. In Holland they inverted the usual process, and put the property up at a price usually greater than its value, and then gradually lowered the price until some one closed the sale by accepting the offer and thus becoming the purchaser. In ancient Babylon the young women were sold at a public auction according to a method which combined the features of the Dutch and ordinary kinds of auctions. The group of prospective wives would ordinarily contain some who, by reason of personal beauty, were thought more desirable than others. The attractive ones were first sold to the highest bidders. When the supply of this quality was exhausted, those less favored by nature were offered and sold to the bidders who would take them with the least dowry, which was payable out of the money received from the sale of the beauties. Herodotus considered this custom very commendable.

In view of the general prevalence of the custom of selling by auction, it is remarkable that no very early cases are found in the English reports. The parent case of Payne v. Cave, 3 Term R. 148, was decided by Lord Kenyon, C. J., sitting at Guildhall in 1788. The plaintiff offered a distilling apparatus for sale, including a pewter worm, at public auction, on the usual conditions that the highest bidder should be the purchaser. There were several bidders for the worm, of whom Cave, who bid £40, was the last. The auctioneer dwelt on this bid for some time, until Cave said: "Why do you dwell? You will not get more." The auctioneer stated that he was informed that the worm weighed at least 1,300 hundredweight, and was worth more than £40. The bidder then asked him if he would warrant it to weigh so much, and, receiving an answer in the negative, he declared that he would not take it. The worm was then resold on a subsequent day for £30, and an action was brought against Cave for the difference. Lord Kenyon ruled that the bidder was at liberty to withdraw his bid at any time before the hammer fell, and nonsuited the plaintiff. On motion to set aside the nonsuit, it was contended that a bidder is bound by the conditions of the sale to abide by his bid, and could not retract; that the hammer is suspended, not for the benefit of the bidder, or to give him an opportunity for repenting, but for the benefit of the seller; and that in the meantime the person who bid last is a purchaser, conditional upon no one bidding higher. But the court thought otherwise, and held that the auctioneer was the agent of the vendor, and that the assent of both parties was necessary to make the contract binding, and "that is signified on the part of the seller by knocking down the hammer, which was not done here until the plaintiff had retracted." "An auction," said the court, "is not inaptly called a locus pœnitentiæ. Every bidding is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on either side until assented to."

The idea that an action will lie for the breach of an implied undertaking to sell to the highest bidder was advanced in Warlow v. Harrison (1859) 1 El. & El. 309, and dicta supporting it will be found in Harris v. Nickerson (1873) L. R. 8 Q. B. 288, Spencer v. Harding (1870) L. R. 5 C. P. 563, Re Agra & Masterman Bank (1867) 2 Ch. App. 391, 397, and Johnson v. Boyes, [1899] 2 Ch. 73. These cases assume that an offer to sell property at auction is indistinguishable from the case of an offer to the general public, such as a reward for the return of lost property, where it is held that contract rights are created in favor of one who complies with the conditions of the offer. Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., [1893] 1 Q. B. 256; Anson, Contracts, p. 52. Langdell seems to be the only text-writer who takes this view of what the law should be. In his Summary of the Law of Contracts (page 24) it is stated that the correct view is "that the seller makes the offer when the article is put up, namely, to sell it to the highest bidder, and when a bid is made there is an actual sale, subject to the condition that no one else shall bid higher." See note to Tillman v. Dunman in 57 L. R. A. 784, 789.

Warlow v. Harrison, the source of all the uncertainty, was an action against an auctioneer who had advertised that he would sell certain horses, the property of a gentleman, "without reserve," at auction. Warlow bid 60 guineas for one of the horses, whereupon the owner bid 61 guineas. Warlow refused to increase his bid, and the horse was announced as sold for 61 guineas to the owner. Warlow, claiming to be the highest good-faith bidder, tendered the amount of his bid to the auctioneer and demanded the horse, and on this being refused, brought an action against the auctioneer, alleging that the defendant was his agent to complete the contract, that he had refused to do so, and that he had thereby lost certain money in attending the auction and had been deprived of the benefit of his contract. The defendant pleaded (1) not guilty; (2) that the plaintiff was not the highest bidder; and (3) that the auctioneer did not become the bidder's agent to complete the sale. The plaintiff recovered a verdict, but the Common Pleas (Lord Campbell, C. J., Wightman, J., and Erle, J.) ordered a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiff's allegation as to the agency of the defendant and the duty of the defendant to complete the contract on behalf of the plaintiff was not sustained. * * * In the Exchequer Chamber the decision was affirmed; but, as the plaintiff might amend his declaration, the court discussed the merits of the case which might be made. Barons Martin, Byles, and Watson were of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the auctioneer, because the auction was announced to be "without reserve," which meant that neither the owner nor any one in his behalf should bid at the auction, and that the property would be sold to the highest bidder, whether the sum bid was equivalent to the real value or not. On the principle which creates a contract between the loser of property who offers a reward for its return and the finder, or a railway company which advertises a time-table and one who purchases a ticket, it was said that an auctioneer who put the property up for sale upon such conditions pledges himself that the sale shall be without reserve, and that a contract is made with the highest bidder, who, in case of a breach thereof, has a right of action against the auctioneer. "We think," said Baron Martin, "that the auctioneer has contracted that the sale shall be without reserve, and that the contract is broken upon a bid being made by or on behalf of the owner, whether it be during the time the property is under the hammer or it be the last bid upon which the article is knocked down. In either case the sale is not 'without reserve' and the contract of the auctioneer is broken. We entertain no doubt that the owner may, at any time before the contract is legally complete, interfere and revoke the auctioneer's authority; but he does so at his peril, and if the auctioneer has contracted any liability in consequence of his employment and the subsequent revocation or conduct of the owner he is entitled to be indemnified." Baron Bramwell and Willes, J., preferred to rest the judgment upon the ground that the auctioneer had undertaken to have, and yet there was evidence that he had not, authority to sell without reserve.

In Harris v. Nickerson (1875) L. R. 8 Q. B. 286, the nature of the advertisement was considered, and it was held that it should be construed as a mere declaration of intention, which did not amount to a contract with any one who might act upon it, or constitute a warranty that the articles advertised would be offered for sale. Certain articles were not offered, and a party who attended for the purpose of bidding brought an action to recover for his loss of time and expense. Blackburn, J., said: "This is certainly a startling proposition, and would be excessively inconvenient if carried out. It amounts to saying that any one who advertises a sale by publishing an advertisement becomes responsible to every one who attends the sale for his cab hire and traveling expenses." * * * The real point in the case was brought out by Justice Archibald, who said: "This is an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to make a mere declaration of intention a binding contract. He has utterly failed to show authority or reason for the proposition. If a false and fraudulent representation had been made, it would have been quite another matter. But to say that a mere advertisement that certain articles are to be sold at auction amounts to a contract to indemnify all who attend, if the sale of any part of the articles does not take place, is a proposition without authority or ground for supporting it.”

In Johnson v. Boyes, [1899] 2 Ch. 73, * * * it was held that the bidder had not complied with the conditions of sale, which required that the deposit should be in cash. This disposed of the case; but the court stated that the action could have been maintained, had the deposit been tendered in cash and the highest bidder been refused the property. “A vendor,” said Cozens-Hardy, J., “who offers property for sale by action on the terms of the printed conditions can be made liable to a member of the public who accepts the offer, if these conditions be violated”—citing Warlow v. Harrison, 1 El. & El. 295, and Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., [1893] 1 Q. B. 256.

But the doctrine of Warlow v. Harrison was never generally acquiesced in, and in Lord Halsbury’s Laws of England, vol. 1, p. 511 (n), doubt is expressed as to its correctness. * * *

Sale of Goods Act 1893 (St. 56 & 57 Vict. c. 71) § 58 (2), provides that “* * * (2) a sale by auction is complete when the auctioneer announces its completion by the fall of the hammer or in other customary manner. Until such announcement is made, any bidder may retract his bid.” It was held in the Scotch case of Fenwick v. MacDonald, [1904] 6 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 850, that, whatever may have been the law formerly, this statute entitles a bidder to withdraw his bid at any time before the fall of the hammer, and the vendor must be equally free to withdraw his offer to sell, because one party cannot be bound while the other is free. But in the recent case of McManus v. Fortescue, [1907] 2 K. B. 1, some support was again given to Warlow v. Harrison. * * *

In the United States a distinction has sometimes been made between ordinary private and judicial and official sales, but the only difference seems to be that the latter may require the approval of the court. Clifford, J., in Blossom v. Railway Co., 3 Wall. 196, 18 L. Ed. 43. * * *

It has been held that the highest bidder at a judicial sale is entitled, as a matter of law, to the property. State v. Johnston, 2 N. C. 293; McLeod v. McCall, 48 N. C. 89; Gilbert v. Watts-De Golyer Co., 169 Ill. 129, 48 N. E. 430, 61 Am. St. Rep. 154; Morton v. Moore, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 717. But the decided weight of authority is otherwise. Knox v. Spratt, 19 Fla. 833; Rogers Co. v. Cleveland Co., 132 Mo. 458, 34 S. W. 57, 31 L. R. A. 335, 53 Am. St. Rep. 494; Davis v. McCann, 143 Mo. 178, 44 S. W. 795. See, also, Kneightley v. Birch, 3 Camp. 521. * * *

The earnestness with which the respondent contends that the trial court was right in holding that the contract was complete when the bid was made, conditional on there being no higher bid, has induced us to make a somewhat extended examination of the authorities. The result discloses the fact that there has been running through some of the English cases a recognized, but never applied, principle which would sustain the right of action in such a case as the present. But all the cases in which the doctrine is recognized were decided on other grounds. No substantial support for the doctrine is found in the American cases. * * *

On principle and authority the correct rule is that an announcement that a person will sell his property at public auction to the highest bidder is a mere declaration of intention to hold an auction at which bids will be received; that a bid is an offer which is accepted when the hammer falls, and until the acceptance of the bid is signified in some manner neither party assumes any legal obligation to the other. At any time before the highest bid is accepted, the bidder may withdraw his offer to purchase or the auctioneer his offer to sell. The owner's offer to sell is made at the time through the auctioneer, and not when he advertises the auction sale. A merchant advertises that on a certain day he will sell his goods at bargain prices; but no one imagines that the prospective purchaser, who visits the store and is denied the right to purchase, has an action for damages against the merchant. He merely offers to purchase, and if his offer is refused, he has no remedy, although he may have lost a bargain, and have incurred expense and lost time in visiting the store. The analogy between such a transaction and an auction is at least close. As the advertisement in this case was a mere statement of intention to offer the property for sale at public auction to the highest bidder, the respondent's bid did not complete either a contract of sale or a contract to make a sale. * * *

The order is therefore reversed, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.¹⁸

(Court of King's Bench, 1790. 3 Term Reports, 653.)

This was an action upon the case; and the third count in the declaration, upon which the verdict was taken, stated that on, etc., a certain discourse was had, etc., concerning the buying of 266 hogsheads of tobacco; and on that discourse the defendant proposed to the plaintiff that the former should sell and deliver to the latter the said 266 hogsheads [at a certain ¹⁸ See McPherson Bros. Co. v. Okanogan County, 45 Wash. 285 (1907); Freeman v. Poole, 37 R. I. 489 (1915).

Even if the conditions of sale prescribe that "no person shall retract his or her bid," the bid, being only an offer, may be retracted before it is accepted by the fall of the hammer. Fisher v. Seltzer, 23 Pa. St. 308 (1854).

By § 21 (2) of the Uniform Sales Act at an auction, until the fall of the hammer "any bidder may retract his bid; and the auctioneer may withdraw the goods from sale unless the auction has been announced to be without reserve." Local statutes as to auction sales should be consulted.

price]; whereupon the plaintiff desired the defendant to give him (the plaintiff) time to agree to or dissent from the proposal till the hour of four in the afternoon of that day, to which the defendant agreed; and thereupon the defendant proposed to the plaintiff to sell and deliver the same upon the terms aforesaid, if the plaintiff would agree to purchase them upon the terms aforesaid, and would give notice thereof to the defendant before the hour of four in the afternoon of that day; the plaintiff averred that he did agree to purchase the same upon the terms aforesaid, and did give notice thereof to the defendant before the hour of four in the afternoon of that day; he also averred that he requested the defendant to deliver to him the said hogsheads, and offered to pay to the defendant the said price for the same, yet that the defendant did not, etc.

A rule having been obtained to show cause why the judgment should not be arrested, on the ground that there was no consideration for the defendant's promise.

Erskine and Wood now showed cause. This was a bargain and sale on condition; and though the plaintiff might have rescinded the contract before 4 o'clock, yet not having done so, the condition was complied with, and both parties were bound by the agreement. The declaration considered this as a complete bargain and sale; for the breach of the agreement is for not delivering the tobacco, and not for not selling it.

LORD KENYON, C. J. (stopping Bearcroft, who was to have argued in support of the rule). Nothing can be clearer than that at the time of entering into this contract the engagement was all on one side; the other party was not bound; it was therefore nudum pactum.

BULLER, J. It is impossible to support this declaration in any point of view. In order to sustain a promise, there must be either a damage to the plaintiff, or an advantage to the defendant; but there was neither when the contract was first made. Then as to the subsequent time, the promise can only be supported on the ground of a new contract made at 4 o'clock; but there is no pretence for that. It has been argued that this must be taken to be a complete sale from the time when the condition was complied with; but it was not complied with, for it is not stated that the defendant did agree at 4 o'clock to the terms of the sale; or even that the goods were kept till that time.

GROSE, J. The agreement was not binding on the plaintiff before 4 o'clock; and it is not stated that the parties came to any subsequent agreement; there is therefore no consideration for the promise.

*Rule absolute.*¹⁹

"Here is a proposal by the defendant to take property on certain terms—namely, that he should be let into possession in July. In that proposal he gives the plaintiff six weeks to consider; but if six weeks are given on one side to accept an offer, the other has six weeks to put an end to it. One party cannot be bound without the other. * * * These cases [Cooke v. Oxley, 3

THE BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD v. BARTLETT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1849. 3 Cushing, 224.)

This was a bill in equity for the specific performance of a contract in writing.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants on April 1st, 1844, being the owners of certain land situated in Boston, and particularly described in the bill, "in consideration that said corporation would take into consideration the expediency of buying said land for their use as a corporation, signed a certain writing, dated April 1st, 1844," whereby they agreed to convey to the plaintiffs "the said lot of land, for the sum of $20,000, if the said corporation would take the same within thirty days from that date;" that afterward and within the thirty days, the defendants, at the request of the plaintiffs, "and in consideration that the said corporation agreed to keep in consideration the expediency of taking said land," etc., extended the said term of thirty days, by a writing underneath the written contract above mentioned, for thirty days from the expiration thereof; that, on May 29th, 1844, while the extended contract was in full force, and unrescinded, the plaintiffs elected to take the land on the terms specified in the contract, and notified the defendants of their election, and offered to pay them the agreed price (producing the same in money) for a conveyance of the land, and requested the defendants to execute a conveyance thereof, which the plaintiffs tendered to them for that purpose; and that the defendants refused to execute such conveyance, or to perform the contract, and had ever since neglected and refused to perform the same.

The defendants demurred generally.

FLETCHER, J. In support of the demurrer, in this case, the only ground assumed and insisted on by the defendants is, that the agreement on their part was without consideration, and therefore not obligatory. In the view taken of the case by the court, no importance is attached to the consideration set out in the bill—namely, "that the plaintiffs would take into consideration the expediency of buying the land." The argument for the defendants, that their agreement was not binding, because without consideration, erroneously assumes that the writing executed by the defendants is to be considered as constituting a contract at the time it was made. The decision of the court in Maine in the case of Bean v. Burbank, 4 Shepl. 458, which was referred to for the defendants, seems to rest on the ground assumed by them in this case.

In the present case, though the writing signed by the defendants was but an offer, and an offer which might be revoked, yet while it remained in force and unrevoked, it was a continuing offer during the time limited for acceptance; and, during the whole of that time, it was an offer every instant,

T. R. 653, and Payne v. Cave, 3 T. R. 148] have established the principle on which I decide—namely, that till both parties are agreed either has a right to be off."

but as soon as it was accepted, it ceased to be an offer merely, and then ripened into a contract. The counsel for the defendants is most surely in the right, in saying that the writing when made was without consideration, and did not therefore form a contract. It was then but an offer to contract, and the parties making the offer most undoubtedly might have withdrawn it at any time before acceptance.

But when the offer was accepted, the minds of the parties met, and the contract was complete. There was then the meeting of the minds of the parties, which constitutes and is the definition of a contract. The acceptance by the plaintiffs constituted a sufficient legal consideration for the engagement on the part of the defendants. There was then nothing wanting, in order to perfect a valid contract on the part of the defendants. It was precisely as if the parties had met at the time of the acceptance, and the offer had then been made and accepted and the bargain completed at once.

A different doctrine, however, prevails in France and Scotland and Holland. It is there held that whenever an offer is made, granting to a party a certain time within which he is to be entitled to decide, whether he will accept it or not, the party making such offer is not at liberty to withdraw it before the lapse of the appointed time. There are certainly very strong reasons in support of this doctrine. Highly respectable authors regard it as inconsistent with the plain principles of equity, that a person, who has been induced to rely on such an engagement, should have no remedy in case of disappointment. But whether wisely and equitably or not, the common law unyieldingly insists upon a consideration, or a paper with a seal attached.

The authorities, both English and American, in support of this view of the subject, are very numerous and decisive; but it is not deemed to be needful or expedient to refer particularly to them, as they are collected and commented on in several reports as well as in the text-books. The case of Cooke v. Oxley, 3 T. R. 653, in which a different doctrine was held, has occasioned considerable discussion, and in one or two instances has probably influenced the decision. That case has been supposed to be inaccurately reported, and that in fact there was in that case no acceptance. But however that may be, if the case has not been directly overruled, it has certainly in later cases been entirely disregarded, and cannot now be considered as of any authority.

As therefore in the present case the bill sets out a proposal in writing, and an acceptance and an offer to perform, on the part of the plaintiffs, within the time limited, and while the offer was in full force, all which is admitted by the demurrer, so that a valid contract in writing is shown to exist, the demurrer must be overruled.

THOMASON v. BESCHER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1918. 176 N. C. 622, 97 S. E. 654, 2 A. L. R. 626.)

Action by C. E. Thomason and J. F. Curry against J. C. and W. M. Bescher for specific performance of a sealed option which, for the expressed consideration of $1.00 the defendants Bescher, who were tenants in common, gave to plaintiff Thomason, and in which the plaintiff Curry acquired prior to suit a one-half interest. The sealed option was given June 18, 1917, and was to purchase a certain tract of timber, roads and sawmill sites for $6,000.00, provided the option was exercised and payment rendered on or before August 18, 1917. The jury found specially that the $1.00 recited in the option was not paid; that the plaintiffs notified one of the defendants prior to June 23, 1917, that they would take the timber, roads and mill sites and would be down the following week to pay the price and take the deed therefor; that the plaintiffs were at all times able and willing to pay the purchase price for the deed; but that the defendants on June 23, 1917, notified the plaintiffs that the option was withdrawn and that they would not convey. On August 7, 1917, plaintiff Thomason tendered the purchase price. The defendants' evidence tended to show that before any acceptance or notice thereof by the plaintiffs, the defendants had in writing notified plaintiffs that they elected to terminate the contract.

Judgment on verdict for plaintiffs, and defendants excepted and appealed.

HOKE, J.²⁰ It is the accepted principle of the common law that instruments under seal require no consideration to support them. Whether this should rest on the position that a seal conclusively imports a consideration, or that the solemnity of the act imports such reflection and care that a consideration is regarded as unnecessary, such instruments are held to be binding agreements enforceable in all actions before the common-law courts. Speaking to the question in Harrell v. Watson, 63 N. C. 454, Pearson, C. J., said:

"A bond needs no consideration. The solemn act of sealing and delivering is a deed; a thing done, which, by the rule of the common law, has full force and effect, without any consideration. Nudum pactum applies only to simple contracts." * * *

While there is much diversity of opinion on the subject, we think it the better position and sustained by the weight of authority that the principle should prevail in reference to these unilateral contracts or options when, as in this case, they take the form of solemn written covenants under seal and its proper application is to render them binding agreements, irrevocable within the time designated, and that the stipulations may be enforced and made effective by appropriate remedies, when such time is reasonable and there is nothing offensive and unconscionable in the terms of the principal contract.

In Watkins v. Robertson, 105 Va. 269, 54 S. E. 33, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1194, 115 Am. St. Rep. 880, the question is directly presented, and in a convincing and learned opinion by Judge Cardwell the conclusion of the court on the subject is announced to the effect:

"That an option under seal for the sale of shares in a joint-stock company is a binding offer from which the promiser cannot recede during the time stipulated for in the option, and, if accepted during that time, constitutes a contract the specific performance of which a court of equity will compel. The option is in the nature of a continuing offer to sell, and, being under seal, must be regarded as made upon a sufficient consideration, and no proof to the contrary will be received at law or in equity."

In Willard v. Tayloe, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 557, 19 L. Ed. 501, Associate Justice Field delivering the opinion, it was held, among other things:

"A covenant in a lease giving to the lessee a right or option to purchase the premises leased at any time during the term is in the nature of a continuing offer to sell. The offer thus made, if under seal, is regarded as made upon sufficient consideration, and therefore one from which the lessor is not at liberty to recede."

And the position is approved by other courts of the highest authority and by writers of established repute. O'Brien v. Boland, 166 Mass. 481, 44 N. E. 602; Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 3 L. R. A. 94; McMillan v. Ames, 33 Minn. 257, 22 N. W. 612; Pomeroy on Contracts, § 387, note 1; 9 Cyc. p. 287. * * *

We are not unmindful of the position that, in equity causes, the court looks beyond the form and will usually refuse to exert its powers in aid of a sealed instrument, its collection and enforcement, except when there is a valuable consideration; in our own court the case of Woodal v. Prevatt, 45 N. C. 199, being an apt illustration of the principle. But these options, containing a continuing offer to sell and constituting a contract, binding on the parties because in the form of a covenant under seal, serve their purpose in keeping the offer open for the time specified and preventing a withdrawal by the vendor. On acceptance and offer to perform within the time, a bilateral contract is then constituted, which, on breach, is enforceable by appropriate remedies, legal or equitable. And in case of action for specific performance the consideration is not restricted to the seal or the nominal amount usually present in these bargains, but extends to and includes the purchase price agreed upon. This position is recognized with us in the case of Ward v. Albertson, 165 N. C. 218, 222, 81 S. E. 168. * * * On the same question in McMillan v. Ames, 33 Minn. 257, 22 N. W. 612, supra, Vanderburgh, Judge, delivering the opinion, said:

"It is true that equity will not lend its auxiliary remedies to aid in the enforcement of a contract which is inequitable, or is not supported by a substantial consideration, but at the same time it will not on such grounds interfere to set it aside. But no reason appears why equity might not have decreed specific performance in this case (had the land not been sold), because the substantial and meritorious consideration required by the court in such case would consist in that stipulated in the instrument as the condition of a conveyance, performance of which by the plaintiff would have been exacted as a prerequisite to relief, so as to secure to defendant mutuality in the remedy, and all his rights under the contract."

And see, also, Woodruff v. Woodruff, 44 N. J. Eq. 349, 16 Atl. 4, 1 L. R. A. 380; 6 Pomeroy's Eq. § 773.

As heretofore stated, there are opposing decisions on the question, holding that a written option without valuable consideration, though under seal, may be recalled at any time before notice of acceptance given.²¹ Some of these, as pointed out in Watkins v. Robertson, supra, are dependent on statutes which change or modify the effect given to seals under the principles of the common law. In others, there being nothing in the record to present it, the mind of the judges was not specially called to the distinctions existent and usually observable between a mere offer to sell without consideration and without seal and one that is effective as a binding agreement by reason of the seal. * * * So far as examined, we have found no case with us in which the question has been directly considered, and under the principles stated, and on the facts of this record, we are of opinion, and so hold, that the defendants are bound by their covenant under seal and not at liberty to withdraw their offer before the expiration of the

In Crandall v. Willig, 166 Ill. 233, 239-240 (1897) Carter, J. said:

"The contract in the case at bar was a mere option given by the Willigs to Wickersham to purchase the land in question within the time mentioned, and there was, before its acceptance, no consideration to support the contract. It was therefore within the power of the Willigs to withdraw this option at any time before their offer to sell was accepted. True the contract was under seal and purported to be based upon the nominal consideration of one dollar, but the evidence showed that there was in fact no consideration whatever, and it is well settled that in equity the real consideration may be inquired into, and the parties are not concluded by the recitals in the contract, though under seal. * * * It is clearly proved in this case, that after the expiration of one year—the period which the Willigs claimed they understood the contract was to run—and before its acceptance by Wickersham, the Willigs refused to perform but declared it to be at an end, and so notified Wickersham. After they had repudiated it and had declared to him that they would never perform it, he sent them his written acceptance to which they paid no attention, and still later he assigned the contract to appellant. When therefore appellant received the contract, it had [in equity] no binding force."

The Illinois cases were based on a passage in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, but in the second edition (Vol. 5, p. 4934n) they are repudiated.

A paid for option is irrevocable. Cummins v. Beavers, 103 Va. 230 (1904).

time agreed upon. The verdict having established that, before any attempted withdrawal by defendants, plaintiff [Thomason] had notified one of the parties of acceptance, he would in any event be entitled to judgment as to that interest. And it further appearing that plaintiff has been at all times ready and able to comply, tendering the entire purchase money, at latest, by August 7th, that defendants refused to accept the same and deny any and all obligations under the alleged contract, plaintiff, as held in Ward v. Albertson and other cases of like import, is entitled to have specific performance as to both interests, and the judgment to that effect is affirmed.

"There may be (1) a sale of lands; (2) an agreement to sell lands and (3) what is popularly called an 'option.' The first is the actual transfer of title from grantor to grantee by appropriate instrument of conveyance. The second is a contract to be performed in the future, and if fulfilled results in a sale. It is a preliminary to a sale, and is not the sale. Breaches, rescission, or release may occur by which the contemplated sale never takes place. The third, an option originally, is neither a sale nor an agreement to sell. It is simply a contract by which the owner of property (real estate being the species we are now discussing) agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property, at a fixed price, within a time certain. He does not sell his land; he does not then agree to sell it; but he does then sell something, viz., the right or privilege to buy at the election or option of the other party. The second party gets, in present, not lands, or an agreement that he shall have lands, but he does get something of value; that is, the right to call for and receive lands if he elects. The owner parts with his right to sell his lands, except to the second party, for a limited period. The second party receives this right, or rather, from his point of view, he receives the right to elect to buy." De Witt, J., in Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 11 (1890).

"The contract purported to be an option. It contained no promise to be performed by the optionee. It is conceded by plaintiff that nothing was paid therefor. The only consideration contended for * * * is amplified in the reply argument of appellant by a statement that he was promoting an addition which would include the tract in question and adjoining tracts, and that this was known to the contracting parties, and that he was also looking for purchasers for the tract. If a consideration for the option can be thus supplied with mere subsequent voluntary conduct of the optionee, then an option offer would seldom be revocable. It may be fairly presumed that every optionee does something after obtaining his option looking to his possible acceptance thereof. In Axe v. Tolbert, 179 Mich. 556, 146 N. W. 418, it was expressly held that:

"Time and money spent by a party in trying to sell property for which he holds an option cannot be construed as a consideration to the party from whom he has secured the option."

"We agree with that view.

"An option without consideration [or a seal where seals have their common law effect] is a mere offer, and is not binding until its acceptance. It necessarily follows that it may be withdrawn before its acceptance. In Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469, we said:

"An option is not a sale. It is not even an agreement for a sale. At best, it is but a right of election in the party receiving the same to exercise a priv-

(Court of King's Bench, 1818. Barnewall & Anderson, 681.)

Action for non-delivery of wool according to agreement. At the trial at the last Lent assizes for the county of Worcester, before Burrough, J., it appeared that the defendants, who were dealers in wool at St. Ives, in the county of Huntingdon, had, on Tuesday, September 2d, 1817, written the following letter to the plaintiffs, who were woollen manufacturers residing in Bromsgrove, Worcestershire. "We now offer you eight hundred tods of wether fleeces, of a good fair quality of our country wool, at 35s. 6d. per tod, to be delivered at Leicester, and to be paid for by two months' bill in two months, and to be weighed up by your agent within fourteen days, receiving your answer in course of post." This letter was misdirected by the defendants, to Bromsgrove, Leicestershire, in consequence of which it was not received by the plaintiffs in Worcestershire till 7 p. m. on Friday, September 5th. On that evening the plaintiffs wrote an answer, agreeing to accept the wool on the terms proposed. The course of the post between St. Ives and Bromsgrove is through London, and consequently this answer was not received by the defendants till Tuesday, September 9th. On Monday, September 8th, the defendants not having, as they expected, received an answer on Sunday, September 7th (which in case their letter had not been misdirected would have been in the usual course of the post), sold the wool in question to another person. Under these circumstances the learned judge held, that the delay having been occasioned by the neglect of the defendants, the jury must take it that the answer did come back in due course of post; and that then the defendants were liable for the loss that illeg, and only when that privilege has been exercised by acceptance does it become a contract to sell.'

"There was not a moment prior to June 11th when the plaintiff was bound to anything under this option. He had parted with nothing, and had made no promises. There was therefore no consideration, and the option was revocable." Evans, J., in Jester v. Gray, (Ia.) 175 N. W. 758, 760 (1920).

"It is only when the vendee has made his election and complied or in good faith attempted to comply with the terms of the option, that it becomes a contract enforceable by him in equity. And it is strictly speaking, inaccurate to speak of the specific performance of an option; for before the remedy can be invoked it has ceased to be an option and has ripened into a mutually binding and mutually enforceable contract." Helm, J., in Rude v. Levy, 43 Colo. 482, 487-488 (1908).

"It is the established rule, both in law and equity, that time is of the essence of an option." Carroll, J., in Morgan v. Forbes, (Mass.) 128 N. E. 792, 793 (1920).

On rights conferred by a "refusal" or "option", see 21 L. R. A. 127, note. On instrument for purchase of land as a contract or an option, see 3 A. L. R. 576, note. See Arthur L. Corbin, Option Contracts, 23 Yale L. J. 641.

had been sustained, and the plaintiffs accordingly recovered a verdict.

Jervis having in Easter Term obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that there was no binding contract between the parties.

Dauncey, Puller & Richardson showed cause. They contended that at the moment of the acceptance of the offer of the defendants by the plaintiffs the former became bound. And that was on the Friday evening, when there had been no change of circumstances. They were then stopped by the court, who called upon Jervis & Campbell in support of the rule. They relied on Payne v. Cave, 3 T. R. 148, and more particularly on Cooke v. Oxley, Ibid., 653. In that case Oxley, who had proposed to sell goods to Cooke, and given him a certain time at his request, to determine whether he would buy them or not, was held not liable to the performance of the contract, even though Cooke, within the specified time, had determined to buy them, and given Oxley notice to that effect. So here the defendants who have proposed by letter to sell this wool, are not to be held liable, even though it be now admitted that the answer did come back in due course of post. Till the plaintiffs' answer was actually received there could be no binding contract between the parties; and before then the defendants had retracted their offer by selling the wool to other persons.

But the court said that if that were so, no contract could ever be completed by the post. For if the defendants were not bound by their offer when accepted by the plaintiffs till the answer was received, then the plaintiffs ought not to be bound till after they had received the notification that the defendants had received their answer and assented to it. And so it might go on ad infinitum. The defendants must be considered in law as making, during every instant of the time their letter was travelling, the same identical offer to the plaintiffs, and then the contract is completed by the acceptance of it by the latter. Then as to the delay in notifying the acceptance, that arises entirely from the mistake of the defendants, and it therefore must be taken as against them that the plaintiffs' answer was received in course of post.

*Rule discharged.*²³

(House of Lords, 1848. 1 House of Lords Cases 381.)

This was an appeal against a decree of the Court of Session, made under the following circumstances: Messrs. Dunlop & Co. were iron masters in Glasgow, and Messrs. Higgins & Co. were iron merchants in Liverpool.

²³ "It seems to me to have been properly decided that a letter posted in one place and received in another has a continuous effect and speaks in the place where it is received." Lindley, J., in Bennett v. Cosgriff, 38 L. T. R. (N. S.) 177, 178 (1878).

Messrs. Higgins had written to Messrs. Dunlop respecting the price of iron, and received the following answer:

"Glasgow, January 22, 1845.

"We shall be glad to supply you with 2000 tons, pigs, at 65s. per ton, net, delivered here."

Messrs. Higgins wrote the following reply:

Liverpool, January 25, 1845.

"You say 65s. net, for 2000 tons pigs. Does this mean for our usual four months bill? Please give us this information in course of post, as we have to decide with other parties on Wednesday next."

On the 28th Messrs. Dunlop wrote:

"Our quotation meant 65s. net, and not a four months bill."

This letter was received by Messrs. Higgins on January 30th, and on the same day, and by post, but not by the first post of that day, they dispatched an answer in these terms:

"We will take the 2000 tons pigs you offer us. Your letter crossed ours of yesterday, but we shall be glad to have your answer respecting the additional 1000 tons. In your first letter you omitted to state any terms, hence the delay." This letter was dated "January 31st." It was not delivered in Glasgow until 2 o'clock p. m. on February 1st, and, on the same day, Messrs. Dunlop sent the following reply:

"Glasgow, February 1, 1845.

"We have your letter of yesterday, but are sorry that we cannot now enter the 2000 tons pig iron, our offer of the 28th not having been accepted in course."

Messrs. Higgins wrote on February 2d to say that they had erroneously dated their letter on January 31st, that it was really written and posted on the 30th, in proof of which they referred to the postmark. They did not, however, explain the delay which had taken place in its delivery.† The iron was not furnished to them, and iron having risen very rapidly in the market, the question whether there had been a complete contract between the parties was brought before a court of law. Messrs. Higgins instituted a suit in the Court of Session for damages, as for breach of contract. The defence of Messrs. Dunlop was, that their letter of the 28th, offering the contract, not having been answered in due time, there had been no such acceptance as would convert that offer into a lawful and binding contract; that their letter having been delivered at Liverpool before 8 o'clock in the morning of January 30th, Messrs. Higgins ought, according to the usual practice of merchants, to have answered it by the first post, which left Liverpool at 3 o'clock p. m. on that day. A letter so dispatched would be due in Glasgow at 2 o'clock p. m. on January 31st; another post left Liverpool for Glasgow every day at 1 o'clock a. m., and letters to be dispatched by that post must be put into the office during the preceding evening, and if any letter had been sent by that post on the morning of the 31st, it must have been delivered in Glasgow in the regular course of post at 8 o'clock in the morning of February 1st. As no communication from Messrs. Higgins arrived by either of these posts, Messrs. Dunlop contended that they were entitled to treat their offer as not accepted, and that they were not bound to wait until the third post delivered in Glasgow at 2 o'clock p. m., of Saturday, February 1st (at which time Messrs. Higgins' letter did actually arrive), before they entered into other contracts, the taking of which would disable them from performing the contract they had offered to Messrs. Higgins.

The cause came before Lord Ivory, as Lord Ordinary, who directed an issue. The counsel for Messrs. Dunlop tendered exceptions.

These exceptions were afterward argued before the judges of the First Division, who pronounced an interlocutor, disallowing the exceptions; and that interlocutor was the subject of the present appeal.

The Lord Chancellor [Lord Cottenham].²⁴ * * * I do not think that, in the facts of the case, there is anything to warrant the appeal. The contest arises from an order sent from Liverpool to Glasgow, or rather a proposition sent from Glasgow to Liverpool, and accepted by the house at Liverpool. It is unnecessary to go earlier into the history of the case than the letter sent from Liverpool by Higgins, bearing date of January 31st. A proposition had been made by the Glasgow house of Dunlop, Wilson & Co., to sell 2000 tons of pig iron. The answer is of that date of January 31st: "Gentlemen, we will take the 2000 tons, pigs, you offer us." Another part of the letter refers to other arrangements; but there is a distinct and positive offer to take the 2000 tons of pigs. To that letter there is annexed a postscript in which they say: "We have accepted your offer unconditionally, but we hope you will accede to our request as to delivery and mode of payment by two months bill."

That, my Lords, therefore, is an unconditional acceptance, by the letter dated January 31st, which was proved to have been put into the post-office at Liverpool on the 30th; but it was not delivered, owing to the state of severe frost at that time, which delayed the mail from reaching Glasgow at the time at which, in the ordinary course it would have arrived there. The letter having been put in on January 30th, it ought to have arrived at Glasgow on the following day, but it did not arrive till the 1st of February.

It appears that between the time of writing the offer and February 1st, the parties making the offer had changed their minds; and instead of being willing to sell 2000 tons of pig iron on the terms proposed, they were anxious to be relieved from that stipulation, and on that day, February 1st, they say: "We have yours of yesterday, but are sorry that we cannot enter the 2000 tons of pig iron, our offer of the 28th not having been accepted in course."

²⁴ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

Under these circumstances, the parties wishing to buy, and by their letter accepting the offer, instituted proceedings in the Court of Session for damages sustained by the non-performance of the contract. And the first question raised by the first exception applies not to the summing up of the learned judge, but to the admission of evidence by him. * * *

The exception is that the learned judge was wrong in permitting the pursuer to explain his mistake [in dating January 31 the letter written and posted on the 30th]. The proposition is, that if a man is bound to answer a letter on a particular day, and by mistake puts a date in advance, he is to be bound by his error, whether it produces mischief to the other party or not. It is unnecessary to do more than state this proposition in order to induce you to assent to the view I take of the objection, and to come to the conclusion that the learned Judge was right in allowing the pursuer to go into evidence to show the mistake. * * *

The next exception to be considered is the second, and that raises a more important question, though not one attended with much difficulty. The exception is, that his Lordship did direct the jury in point of law, that if the pursuers posted their acceptance of the offer in due time, according to the usage of trade, they are not responsible for any casualties in the post-office establishment.

Now, there may be some little ambiguity in the construction of that proposition. It proceeds on the assumption that, by the usage of trade, an answer ought to have been returned by the post, and that the 30th was the right day on which that answer ought to have been notified. Then comes the question, whether, under those circumstances, that being the usage of trade, the fact of the letter being delayed, not by the act of the party sending it, but by an accident connected with the post, the party so putting the letter in on the right day is to lose the benefit which would have belonged to him if the letter had arrived in due course?

I cannot conceive, if that is the right construction of the direction of the learned judge, how any doubt can exist on the point. If a party does all that he can do, that is all that is called for. If there is a usage of trade to accept such an offer, and to return an answer to such an offer, and to forward it by means of the post, and if the party accepting the offer puts his letter into the post on the correct day, has he not done everything he was bound to do? How can he be responsible for that over which he has no control? It is not the same as if the date of the party's acceptance of the offer had been the subject of a special contract; as if the contract had been, "I make you this offer, but you must return me an answer on the 30th, and on the earliest post of that day." The usage of trade would require an answer on the day on which the offer was received, and Messrs. Higgins, therefore, did on the 30th, in proper time, return an answer by the right conveyance—the post-office.

If that was not correct, and if you were to have reference now to any usage constituting the contract between the parties a specific contract, it is quite clear to me that the rule of law would necessarily be that which has obtained by the usage of trade. It has been so decided in cases in England, and none has been cited from Scotland which controverts that proposition; but the cases in England put it beyond all doubt. It is not disputed—it is a very frequent occurrence—that a party having a bill of exchange, which he tenders for payment to the acceptor, and payment is refused, is bound to give the earliest notice to the drawer. That person may be resident many miles distant from him; if he puts a letter into the post at the right time, it has been held quite sufficient; he has done all that he is expected to do as far as he is concerned; he has put the letter into the post, and whether that letter be delivered, or not, is a matter quite immaterial, because for accidents happening at the post-office he is not responsible. * * *

THE HOUSEHOLD FIRE AND CARRIAGE ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY (Limited) v. GRANT.

Action to recover £94 15s., being the balance due upon 100 shares allotted to the defendant on October 25th, 1874, in pursuance of an application from the defendant for such shares dated September 30th, 1874.

At the trial before Lopes, J., during the Middlesex Sittings, 1878, the following facts were proved. In 1874 one Kendrick was acting in Glamorganshire as the agent of the company for the placing of their shares, and on September 30th the defendant handed to Kendrick an application in writing for shares in the plaintiff's company, which stated that the defendant had paid to the bankers of the company £5, being a deposit of 1s. per share, and requesting an allotment of 100 shares, and agreeing to pay the further sum of 19s. per share within twelve months of the date of the allotment. Kendrick duly forwarded this application to the plaintiffs in London, and the secretary of the company on October 20th, 1874, made out the letter of allotment in favor of the defendant, which was posted addressed to the defendant at his residence, 16 Herbert Street, Swansea, Glamorganshire; his name was then entered on the register of shareholders. This letter of allotment never reached the defendant. The defendant never paid the £5 mentioned in his application, but the plaintiffs' company being indebted to the defendant in the sum of £5 for commission, that sum was duly credited to his account in their books. In July, 1875, a dividend at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent was declared on the shares, and in February, 1876, a further dividend at the same rate; these dividends, amounting altogether to the sum of 5s., were also credited to the defendant's account in the books of the plaintiffs' company. Afterward the company went into liquidation, and on December 7th, 1877, the official liquidator applied for the sum sued for from the defendant; the defendant declined to pay on the ground that he was not a shareholder.

On these facts the learned judge left two questions to the jury. 1. Was the letter of allotment of October 20th in fact posted? 2. Was the letter of allotment received by the defendant? The jury found the first question in the affirmative and the last in the negative.

The learned judge reserved the case for further consideration, and after argument directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs on the authority of Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381.

The defendant appealed.

THESIGER, L. J.⁸⁵ In this case the defendant made an application for shares in the plaintiffs' company under circumstances from which we must imply that he authorized the company, in the event of their allotting to him the shares applied for, to send the notice of allotment by post. The company did allot him the shares, and duly addressed to him and posted a letter containing the notice of allotment, but upon the finding of the jury it must be taken that the letter never reached its destination. In this state of circumstances Lopes, J., has decided that the defendant is liable as a shareholder. He based his decision mainly upon the ground that the point for his consideration was covered by authority binding upon him, and I am of opinion that he did so rightly, and that it is covered by authority equally binding upon this court.

The leading case upon the subject is Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381. It is true that Lord Cottenham might have decided that case without deciding the point raised in this. But it appears to me equally true that he did not do so, and that he preferred to rest and did rest his judgment as to one of the matters of exception before him upon a principle which embraces and governs the present case. * * * But if Dunlop v. Higgins were out of the way, Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587, would still go far to govern the present. There it was held that the acceptance of the offer at all events binds both parties from the time of the acceptance being posted, and so as to prevent any retraction of the offer being of effect after the acceptance had been posted. Now, whatever in abstract discussion may be said as to the legal notion of its being necessary, in order to the effecting of a valid and binding contract, that the minds of the parties should be brought together at one and the same moment, that notion is practically the foundation of English law upon the subject of the formation of contracts. Unless therefore a contract constituted by correspondence is absolutely concluded at the moment that the continuing offer is accepted by the person to whom the offer is addressed, it is difficult to see how the two minds are ever to be brought together at one and the same moment. This was pointed out by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 B. & A. 681, which is recognized authority upon this branch of the law. But, on the other hand, it is a principle of law, as well established as the legal notion to which I have referred, that the minds of the two parties must be brought together by mutual communication. An acceptance, which only remains in the breast of the acceptor without being actually and by legal implication communicated to the offerer, is no binding acceptance. How, then, are these elements of law to be harmonized in the case of contracts formed by correspondence through the post? I see no better mode than that of treating the post-office as the agent of both parties, and it was so considered by Lord Romilly in Hebb's Case, L. R. 4 Eq. at p. 12, when in the course of his judgment he said: "Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, decides that the posting of a letter accepting an offer constitutes a binding contract, but the reason of that is, that the post-office is the common agent of both parties." Alderson, B., also in Stocken v. Collin, 7 M. & W. at p. 516, a case of notice of dishonor, and the case referred to by Lord Cottenham, says: "If the doctrine that the post-office is only the agent for the delivery of the notice were correct, no one could safely avail himself of that mode of transmission." But if the post-office be such common agent, then it seems to me to follow that, as soon as the letter of acceptance is delivered to the post-office, the contract is made as complete and final and absolutely binding as if the acceptor had put his letter into the hands of a messenger sent by the offerer himself as his agent to deliver the offer and receive the acceptance. What other principle can be adopted short of holding that the contract is not complete by acceptance until and except from the time that the letter containing the acceptance is delivered to the offerer, a principle which has been distinctly negatived? This difficulty was attempted to be got over in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108, which was a case directly on all fours with the present and in which Kelly, C. B., (at p. 115,) is reported to have said: "It may be that in general, though not in all cases, a contract takes effect from the time of acceptance and not from the subsequent notification of it. As in the case now before the court, if the letter of allotment had been delivered to the defendant in the due course of the post he would have become a shareholder from the date of the letter. And to this effect is Potter v. Sanders, 6 Hare, 1. And hence, perhaps, the mistake has arisen that the contract is binding upon both parties from the time when the letter is written and put into the post, although never delivered; whereas although it may be binding from the time of acceptance, it is only binding at all when afterward duly notified." But with deference I would ask how a man can be said to be a shareholder at a time before he was bound to take any shares, or to put the question in the form in which it is put by Mellish, L. J., in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 586, at p. 596, how there can be any relation back in a case of this kind as there may be in bankruptcy? If, as the Lord Justice said, the contract after the letter has arrived in time is to be treated as having been made from the time the letter is posted, the reason is that the contract was actually made at the time when the letter was posted. The principle indeed laid down in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 586, at p. 596, as well as in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, can really not be reconciled with the decision in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108. James, L. J., in the passage I have already quoted, Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 592, affirms the proposition that when once the acceptance is posted neither party can afterward escape from the contract, and refers, with approval, to Hebb's Case, L. R. 4 Eq. 9. There a distinction was taken by the Master of the Rolls that the company chose to send the letter of allotment to their own agent, who was not authorized by the applicant for shares to receive it on his behalf, and who never delivered it, but he at the same time assumed that if, instead of sending it through an authorized agent, they had sent it through the post-office, the applicant would have been bound, although the letter had never been delivered. Mellish, L. J., really goes as far, and states forcibly the reasons in favor of this view. The mere suggestion thrown out (at the close of his judgment, at p. 597), when stopping short of actually overruling the decision in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108, that although a contract is complete when the letter accepting an offer is posted, yet it may be subject to a condition subsequent that, if the letter does not arrive in due course of post, then the parties may act on the assumption that the offer has not been accepted, can hardly, when contrasted with the rest of the judgment, be said to represent his own opinion on the law upon the subject. The contract, as he says, L. R. 7 Ch. at p. 596, is actually made when the letter is posted. The acceptor, in posting the letter, has, to use the language of Lord Blackburn, in Brogden v. Directors of Metropolitan Ry. Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, 691, "put it out of his control and done an extraneous act which clinches the matter, and shows beyond all doubt that each side is bound." How, then, can a casualty in the post, whether resulting in delay, which in commercial transactions is often as bad as no delivery, or in non-delivery, unbind the parties or unmake the contract? To me it appears that in practice a contract complete upon the acceptance of an offer being posted, but liable to put an end to by an accident in the post, would be more mischievous than a contract only binding upon the parties to it upon the acceptance actually reaching the offerer, and I can see no principle of law from which such an anomalous contract can be deduced.

There is no doubt that the implication of a complete, final, and absolutely binding contract being formed, as soon as the acceptance of an offer is posted, may in some cases lead to inconvenience and hardship. But such there must be at times in every view of the law. It is impossible in transactions which pass between parties at a distance, and have to be carried on through the medium of correspondence, to adjust conflicting rights between innocent parties, so as to make the consequences of mistake on the part of a mutual agent fall equally upon the shoulders of both. At the same time I am not prepared to admit that the implication in question will lead to any great or general inconvenience or hardship. An offerer, if he chooses, may always make the formation of the contract which he proposes dependent upon the actual communication to himself of the acceptance. If he trusts to the post he trusts to a means of communication which, as a rule, does not fail, and if no answer to his offer is received by him, and the matter is of importance to him, he can make inquiries of the person to whom his offer was addressed. On the other hand, if the contract is not finally concluded, except in the event of the acceptance actually reaching the offerer, the door would be opened to the perpetration of much fraud, and, putting aside this consideration, considerable delay in commercial transactions, in which despatch is, as a rule, of the greatest consequence, would be occasioned; for the acceptor would never be entirely safe in acting upon his acceptance until he had received notice that his letter of acceptance had reached its destination.

Upon balance of conveniences and inconveniences it seems to me, applying with slight alterations the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Insurance Co., 9 How. (U. S.) 390, more consistent with the acts and declarations of the parties in this case to consider the contract complete and absolutely binding on the transmission of the notice of allotment through the post, as the medium of communication that the parties themselves contemplated, instead of postponing its completion until the notice had been received by the defendant.*6

*6 "But a little reflection will show, that, in all cases of contracts entered into between parties at a distance by correspondence, it is impossible that both should have a knowledge of it the moment it becomes complete. This can only exist where both parties are present.

"The position may be illustrated by the case before us. If the contract became complete, as we think it did, on the acceptance of the offer by the applicant, on the 21st of December, 1844, the company, of course, could have no knowledge of it until the letter of acceptance reached the agent, on the 31st of the month; and, on the other hand, upon the hypothesis it was not complete until notice of the acceptance, and then became so, the applicant could have no knowledge of it at the time it took effect. In either aspect, and, indeed, in any aspect in which the case can be presented, one of the parties must be unadvised of the time when the contract takes effect, as its consummation must depend upon the act of one of them in the absence of the other.

"The negotiation being carried on through the mail, the offer and acceptance cannot occur at the same moment of time; nor, for the same reason, can the meeting of the minds of the parties on the subject be known by each at the moment of concurrence; the acceptance must succeed the offer after the lapse of some interval of time; and, if the process is to be carried further in order to complete the bargain, and notice of the acceptance must be received, the only effect is to reverse the position of the parties, changing the knowledge of the completion from the one party to the other.

"It is obviously impossible, therefore, under the circumstances stated, ever to perfect a contract by correspondence, if a knowledge of both parties at the moment they become bound is an essential element in making out the obligation. And as it must take effect, if effect is given at all to an endeavor to enter into a

Upon principle, therefore, as well as authority, I think that the judgment of Lopes, J., was right and should be affirmed, and that this appeal should therefore be dismissed.

BRAMWELL, L. J. The question in this case is not whether the post-office was a proper medium of communication from the plaintiffs to the defendant. There is no doubt that it is so in all cases where personal service is not required. It is an ordinary mode of communication, and every person who gives any one the right to communicate with him gives the right to communicate in an ordinary manner, and so in this way and to this extent, that if an offer were made by letter in the morning to a person at a place within half an hour's railway journey of the offerer, I should say that an acceptance by post, though it did not reach the offerer till the next morning, would be in time. Nor is the question whether, when the letter reaches an offerer, the latter is bound and the bargain made from the time the letter is posted or despatched, whether by post or otherwise. The question in this case is different. I will presently state what in my judgment it is. Meanwhile I wish to mention some elementary propositions which, if carefully borne in mind, will assist in the determination of this case:

First. Where a proposition to enter into a contract is made and accepted, it is necessary, as a rule, to constitute the contract that there should be a communication of that acceptance to the proposer. Per Brian, C. J., and Lord Blackburn: Brogden v. Metropolitan Ry. Co., 2 App. Cas. at p. 692.

Secondly. That the present case is one of proposal and acceptance.

Thirdly. That as a consequence of or involved in the first proposition, if the acceptance is written or verbal—i. e., is by letter or message—as a rule, it must reach the proposer or there is no communication, and so no acceptance of the offer.

Fourthly. That if there is a difference where the acceptance is by a letter sent through the post which does not reach the offerer, it must be by virtue of some general rule or some particular agreement of the parties. As, for instance, there might be an agreement that the acceptance of the proposal may be by sending the article offered by the proposer to be bought, or hanging out a flag or sign to be seen by the offerer as he goes by, or leaving a letter at a certain place, or any other agreed mode, and in the same contract by correspondence, in the absence of the knowledge of one of the parties at the time of its consummation, it seems to us more consistent with the acts and declarations of the parties, to consider it complete on the transmission of the acceptance of the offer in the way they themselves contemplated; instead of postponing its completion till notice of such acceptance has been received and assented to by the company.

"For why make the offer, unless intended that an assent to its terms should bind them? And why require any further assent on their part, after an unconditional assent by the party to whom it is addressed"? Nelson, J., in Taylor v. Merchants Fire Ins. Co., 9 How. (U. S.) 390, 400-401 (1850).

way there might be an agreement that dropping a letter in a post pillar-box or other place of reception should suffice.

Fifthly. That as there is no such special agreement in this case, the defendant, if bound, must be bound by some general rule which makes a difference when the post-office is employed as the means of communication.

Sixthly. That if there is any such general rule applicable to the communication of the acceptance of offers, it is equally applicable to all communications that may be made by post. Because, as I have said, the question is not whether this communication may be made by post. If, therefore, posting a letter which does not reach is a sufficient communication of acceptance of an offer, it is equally a communication of everything else which may be communicated by post—e. g., notice to quit. It is impossible to hold, if I offer my landlord to sell him some hay, and he writes accepting my offer, and in the same letter gives me notice to quit, and posts his letter, which, however, does not reach me, that he had communicated to me his acceptance of my offer, but not his notice to quit. Suppose a man has paid his tailor by check or bank-note, and posts a letter containing a check or bank-note to his tailor, which never reaches, is the tailor paid?²⁷ If he is, would he be if he had never been paid before in that way? Suppose a man is in the habit of sending checks and bank-notes to his banker by post, and posts a letter containing checks and bank-notes, which never reaches. Is the banker liable? Would he be if this was the first instance of a remittance of the sort? In the cases I have supposed, the tailor and banker may have recognized this mode of remittance by sending back receipts and putting the money to the credit of the remitter. Are they liable with that? Are they liable without it? The question then is, Is posting a letter which is never received a communication to the person addressed, or an equivalent, or something which dispenses with it? It is for those who say it is to make good their contention. I ask why is it? My answer beforehand to any argument that may be urged is, that it is not a communication, and that there is no agreement to take it as an equivalent for or to dispense with a communication. That those who affirm the contrary say the thing which is not. That if Brian, C. J., had had to adjudicate on the case, he would deliver the same judgment as that reported. That because a man, who may send a communication by post or ²⁷ In Mitchell-Henry v. Norwich Union Life Insurance Society, Ltd., [1918] 2 K. B. 67, the defendant in asking plaintiff for an instalment payment on a loan wrote: "Please return this notice when remitting." The amount was £48 5s. 8d. and plaintiff put £48 in £1 Treasury notes and the balance in a postal order and stamps in an ordinary envelope and registered it to the defendant. The elevator boy of the building, not employed by the defendant, receipted for the letter and stole the money. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he had paid the instalment. It was held that though the defendant had impliedly authorized the plaintiff to send the money through the post, it was not usual to send so large a sum by post in notes as small as that and so there was no payment.

otherwise, sends it by post, he should bind the person addressed, though the communication never reaches him, while he would not so bind him if he had sent it by hand, is impossible. There is no reason in it; it is simply arbitrary.²⁸ I ask whether any one who thinks so is prepared to fol-²⁸ "A letter missive is only a series of words fixed upon paper; but these words are addressed to an absent person; it is necessary, therefore, in order that they should have their effect, that the absent person to whom they are addressed should understand them; they are, therefore, without effect so far as he to whom they are addressed has not understood them; as they would be without effect if, being addressed to a person present, that person was, from a physical cause, not in a condition to understand them. Now how can an absent person understand the words that are addressed to him? Certainly he can only understand them by reading the letter which contains them. The letter by which I contract an obligation can therefore only fulfil its object so far as I can be supposed to persist, at the moment when it arrives, in the will which I had in writing it. If, therefore, at the moment when my letter arrives, I have already in another way manifested and notified a contrary will, my letter can no longer bind me; it is paralyzed in advance.

"That is so true that if, at the moment when my letter arrives, I am no longer able to speak to the person to whom it is addressed, or to persist in the will which I had in writing it, that will cannot be opposed to me, it cannot produce any effect against me; and it is upon this foundation that all the doctors teach that if, after having written to a person with whom I was in treaty for a bargain, that I accepted his proposition, I happen to die before my letter reaches that person, there is no contract between him and me. * * *

"And here recurs the comparison, which we made just now, of the consent expressed by a letter addressed to an absent person, with the consent expressed by words addressed to a person present.

"I find myself in the presence of a deaf person who says to me: Will you buy of me such a thing for such a price? I answer him: I will; but he does not hear me; he declares to me that he has not heard me, and he prays me to give him in writing the answer which he judges, by the movement of my lips, that I have made to him. Then I take a pen and trace for him these words: I said that I would, but on further reflection your proposition is not satisfactory. Could this man pretend that, by the answer which I admit that I made to him viva voce, I am bound to him irrevocably? Certainly not; and if he prosecuted me, the judge would dismiss him without hesitation.

"Wherefore would it be otherwise in the case of a letter written to an absent person? Because the absent person has become proprietor of my letter from the moment when it left my hands? But let us take another comparison.

"A man has in his cabinet an acoustic vault, constructed in such a manner that, by reason of the various and extremely multiplied windings of the tubes which compose it, the words transmitted through one of the extremities do not reach the other till after a space of five minutes. I am in the presence of that man, and in his cabinet in question. There, after saying to me: Will you buy of me such a thing for such a sum? he adds: Answer me by my acoustic vault. Thereupon we take our places, I at one of the extremities of his vault, he at the other and I say to him by his speaking trumpet: I will. But a minute after I change my resolution; I run to him, and before he has been able to hear my answer, I say to him: I will not. Could he, after having heard the answer which I made to him at first by his acoustic vault, pretend that this answer having been transmitted to him by tubes of which he was pro-low that opinion to its consequence; suppose the offer is to sell a particular chattel, and the letter accepting it never arrives, is the property in the chattel transferred? Suppose it is to sell an estate or grant a lease, is the bargain completed? The lease might be such as not to require a deed; could a subsequent lessee be ejected by the would-be acceptor of the offer because he had posted a letter? Suppose an article is advertised at so much, and that it would be sent on receipt of a post-office order. Is it enough to post the letter? If the word "receipt" is relied on, is it really meant that that makes a difference? If it should be said let the offerer wait, the answer is, may be he may lose his market meanwhile. Besides, his offer may be by advertisement to all mankind. Suppose a reward for information, information posted does not reach, some one else gives it and is paid, is the offerer liable to the first man?

It is said that a contrary rule would be hard on the would-be acceptor, who may have made his arrangements on the footing that the bargain was concluded. But to hold as contended would be equally hard on the offerer, who may have made his arrangements on the footing that his offer was not accepted; his non-receipt of any communication may be attributable to the person to whom it was made being absent. What is he to do but to act on the negative, that no communication has been made to him? Further, the use of the post-office is no more authorized by the offerer than the sending an answer by hand, and all these hardships would befall the person posting the letter if he sent it by hand. Doubtless in that case he would be the person to suffer if the letter did not reach its destination. Why should his sending it by post relieve him of the loss and cast it on the other party? It was said, if he sends it by hand it is revocable, but not if he sends it by post, which makes the difference. But it is revocable when sent by post, not that the letter can be got back, but its arrival might be anticipated by a letter by hand or telegram, and there is no case to show that such anticipation would not prevent the letter from binding. It would be a most alarming thing to say that it would [not],—that a letter honestly but mistakenly written and posted must bind the writer if hours before its arrival he informed the person addressed that it was coming, but was wrong and recalled. Suppose a false but honest character given, and the mistake found out after the letter posted, and notice that it was wrong given to the person addressed.

prietor, and having consequently become his property at the very instant that it left my mouth, I could not retract it before it had struck his ear? No, emphatically no; a hundred times no!

"For the same reason, the obligation which I contract by a letter to an absent person does not bind me, so long as the absent person to whom I have addressed that letter has not received it." Merlin's argument in S— v. F—, as reported in 1 Langdell's Cases on Contracts, 2 ed., pp. 160, 162.

Then, as was asked, is the principle to be applied to telegrams?³⁰ Further, it seems admitted that if the proposer said, "Unless I hear from you by return of post the offer is withdrawn," that the letter accepting it must reach him to bind him. There is, indeed, a case recently reported in the Times, before the Master of the Rolls, where the offer was to be accepted

³⁰ It is applied to telegrams. If the offer is by telegram, a telegram of acceptance, promptly sent prepaid and properly addressed completes a contract.

In Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 309-311 (1867), Scrugham, J., said for the court: "The sending of a letter accepting the proposition is regarded as an acceptance, because it is an overt act clearly manifesting the intention of the party sending it to close with the offer of him to which it is sent, and thus marking that aggregatio mentium which is necessary to constitute a contract."

"It was agreed between these parties that their business should be transacted through the medium of the telegraph. The object of this agreement was to substitute the telegraph for other methods of communication, and to give to their transactions by it the same force and validity they would derive if they had been performed through other agencies. In accordance with this agreement the offer was made by telegraph to the appellants in New York, and the acceptance addressed to the respondents in New Orleans, and immediately despatched from New York by order of the appellants. It cannot, therefore, be said that the appellants did not put their acceptance in a proper way to be communicated to the respondents, for they adopted the method of communication which had been used in the transaction by the respondents, and which had been selected by prior agreement between them as that by means of which their business should be transacted.

"Under these circumstances the sending of the despatch must be regarded as an acceptance of the respondents' offer, and thereupon the contract became complete.

"I cannot conceive upon what principle an agreement to communicate by telegraph can be held to be in effect a warranty by each party that his communication to the other shall be received. On the contrary, by agreeing beforehand to adopt that means of communication the parties mutually assume its hazards, which are principally as to the prompt receipt of the dispatches."

"The fact that there was a valid contract has been found by the referee. The evidence showed that a proposal, in writing, was made by Mr. Daly to the plaintiff for an engagement of her services for the year 1869. The plaintiff testifies that she signed an acceptance on Saturday, April 13th, 1870, and placed it in the letter-box of the defendant, at the theatre. The defendant admits that this letter-box was sometimes used as a place for deposit of the duplicates of contracts made between him and the actors. It is true that he testified that he never received the papers which the plaintiff asserts that she deposited in the box. This, however, is immaterial. The minds of the parties met when the plaintiff complied with the usual, or even occasional, practice, and left the acceptance in a place of deposit recognized as such by the defendant. This doctrine is analogous to that which has been adopted in the case of communication by letter or by telegraph. (Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Trevor v. Wood, 36 id. 307.) The principle governing these cases is, that there is a concurrence of the minds of the parties upon a distinct proposition, manifested by an overt act. (White v. Corlies, 46 N. Y. 467). The deposit in the box, under the circumstances of the present case, is such an act." Dwight, C., in Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 365, 366 (1875).

within fourteen days, and it is said to have been held that it was enough to post the letter on the 14th, though it would and did not reach the offerer till the 15th. Of course there may have been something in that case not mentioned in the report. But as it stands it comes to this, that if an offer is to be accepted in June, and there is a month's post between the places, posting the letter on June 30th will suffice, though it does not reach till July 31st; but that case does not affect this. There the letter reached, here it has not. If it is not admitted that "unless I hear by return the offer is withdrawn" makes the receipt of the letter a condition, it is to say an express condition goes for naught. If it is admitted, is it not what every letter says? Are there to be fine distinctions, such as, if the words are "unless I hear from you by return of post," etc., it is necessary the letter should reach him, but "let me know by return of post," it is not; or if in that case it is, yet it is not where there is an offer without those words. Lord Blackburn says that Mellish, L. J., accurately stated that where it is expressly or impliedly stated in the offer, "you may accept the offer by posting a letter," the moment you post this letter the offer is accepted. I agree; and the same thing is true of any other mode of acceptance offered with the offer and acted on—as firing a cannon, sending off a rocket, give your answer to my servant the bearer. Lord Blackburn was not dealing with the question before us; there was no doubt in the case before him that the letter had reached. As to the authorities, I shall not re-examine those in existence before the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108. But I wish to say a word as to Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381; the whole difficulty has arisen from some expressions in that case. Mr. Finlay's argument and reference to the case when originally in the Scotch Court has satisfied me that Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, decided nothing contrary to the defendant in this case. Mellish, L. J., in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 596, says: "That case is not a direct decision on the point before us." It is true, he adds, that he has great difficulty in reconciling the case of the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108, with Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381. I do not share that difficulty. I think they are perfectly reconcilable, and that I have shown so. Where a posted letter arrives, the contract is complete on the posting. So where a letter sent by hand arrives, the contract is complete on the writing and delivery to the messenger. Why not? All the extraordinary and mischievous consequences which the Lord Justice points out in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Cr. 569, might happen if the law were otherwise when a letter is posted, would equally happen where it is sent otherwise than by the post. He adds that the question before the Lords in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, was whether the ruling of the Lord Justice Clerk was correct, and they held it was. Now Mr. Finlay showed very clearly that the Lord Justice Clerk decided nothing inconsistent with the judgment in the British and American Telegraph Co. v. Colson, L. R. 6 Ex. 108. Since the last case there have been two before Vice-Chancellor

Malins, in the earlier of which he thought it "reasonable," and followed it. In the other, because the Lord Justices had in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 596, thrown cold water on it, he appears to have thought it not reasonable. He says, suppose the sender of a letter says, "I make you an offer. let me have an answer by return of post." By return the letter is posted, and A. has done all that the person making the offer requests. Now that is precisely what he has not done. He has not let him "have an answer." He adds there is no default on his part. Why should he be the only person to suffer? Very true. But there is no default in the other, and why should he be the only person to suffer? The only other authority is the expression of opinion by Lopes, J., in the present case. He says the proposer may guard himself against hardship by making the proposal expressly conditioned on the arrival of the answer within a definite time. But it need not be express nor within a definite time. It is enough that it is to be inferred that it is to be, and if it is to be it must be within a reasonable time. The mischievous consequences he points out do not follow from that which I am contending for. I am at a loss to see how the post-office is the agent for both parties. What is the agency as to the sender? merely to receive? But suppose it is not an answer, but an original communication. What then? Does the extent of the agency of the post-office depend on the contents of the letter? But if the post-office is the agent of both parties, then the agent of both parties has failed in his duty, and to both. Suppose the offerer says, "My offer is conditional on your answer reaching me." Whose agent is the post-office then? But how does an offerer make the post-office his agent, because he gives the offeree an option of using that or any other means of communication?

I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. I am of opinion that there was no bargain between these parties to allot and take shares, that to make such bargain there should have been an acceptance of the defendant's offer and a communication to him of that acceptance. That there was no such communication. That posting a letter does not differ from other attempts at communication in any of its consequences, save that it is irrevocable as between the poster and post-office. The difficulty has arisen from a mistake as to what was decided in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, and from supposing that because there is a right to have recourse to the post as a means of communication, that right is attended with some peculiar consequences, and also from supposing that because if the letter reaches it binds from the time of posting, it also binds though it never reaches. Mischief may arise if my opinion prevails. It probably will not, as so much has been said on the matter that principle is lost sight of. I believe equal if not greater, will, if it does not prevail. I believe the latter will be obviated only by the rule being made nugatory by every prudent man saying, "Your answer by post is only to bind if it reaches me." But the question is not to be decided on these considerations. What is the law? What is the principle? If Brian, C. J., had had to decide this, a public post being instituted in his time, he would have said the law is the same, now there is a post, as it was before, viz., a communication to affect a man must be a communication, i. e., must reach him.

On the time when a contract consisting of letters or telegrams is complete, see 6 Ann. Cas. 378, note; 110 Am. St. Rep. 742, note.

For the contract to be complete on the mailing of the letter of acceptance, the latter must be properly addressed and stamped. Blake v. Hamburg-Bremen Fire Ins. Co., 67 Tex. 160 (1886). If, however, a letter of acceptance not properly addressed, or not stamped so as to be entitled to be forwarded promptly according to the postal regulations, is in fact so forwarded and actually reaches the offeror before the offer has been revoked or has expired, it would seem that there is a contract.

Postal regulations determine when a letter is mailed. Differences in such regulations make delivery to a letter carrier mailing in the United States (Pearce v. Langfit, 101 Pa. St. 507 (1882)) while it is not so in England until the carrier, as the messenger of the sender, deposits the letter in the proper mailing place of the proper post office. In re London & Northern Bank, [1900] 1 Ch. 220.

The fact that by acting promptly and complying with certain postal requirements, the sender of a letter may reclaim it from the post office is not deemed to prevent the mailing of an acceptance of an offer made by mail from completing a contract. "Nor can it be conceded that except on some extraordinary occasion and on evidence satisfactory to the post office authorities, a letter once mailed can be withdrawn by the party who mailed it. When letters are placed in a post office they are within the legal custody of the officers of the government, and it is the duty of postmasters to deliver them to the persons to whom they are addressed." Shiras, J., in McDonald v. Chemical Nat. Bk., 174 U. S. 610, 620 (1898). So the fact that a telegram of acceptance may be intercepted and withdrawn by the acceptor is not deemed to prevent a contract from arising on the despatch of the telegram of acceptance. Occasionally, however, a doubt is expressed.

On withdrawal, or right to withdraw letter from the mail as affecting the consummation of a contract, see 9 A. L. R. 386, note.

A letter deposited in the mails, properly addressed and with postage prepaid, will be presumed to have reached its destination in due course of post. Ruder v. National Council of Knights and Ladies of Security, 124 Minn. 431 (1914).

BYRNE & CO v. VAN TIENHOVEN & CO.

LINDLEY, J.²¹ This was an action for the recovery of damages for the non-delivery by the defendants to the plaintiffs of 1000 boxes of tinplates, pursuant to an alleged contract, which I will refer to presently. The action was tried at Cardiff before myself without a jury; and it was agreed at the trial that in the event of the plaintiffs being entitled to damages they should be £375.

The defendants carried on business at Cardiff and the plaintiffs at New York, and it takes ten or eleven days for a letter posted at either place to reach the other. The alleged contract consists of a letter [containing an offer to sell 1000 boxes of tin plate branded "Hensol" at 15s. 6d. per box] written by the defendants to the plaintiffs on October 1st, 1879, and received by them on the 11th, and accepted by telegram and letter sent [by the plaintiffs] to the defendants on October 11th and 15th respectively.

* * * These letters and telegram would, if they stood alone, plainly constitute a contract binding on both parties. * * * The defendants, however, raise two other defences to the action which remain to be considered. First, they say that the offer made by their letter of October 1st was revoked by them before it had been accepted by the plaintiffs by their telegram of the 11th or letter of the 15th. The facts as to these are as follows: On October 8th the defendants wrote and sent by post to the plaintiffs a letter withdrawing their offer of the 1st. The material part of this letter was as follows: "Confirming our respects of the 1st inst. we hasten to inform you that there having been a regular panic in the tinplate market during the last few days, which has caused prices to run up about 25 per cent, we are reluctantly compelled to withdraw any offer we have made to our constituents, and must therefore also consider our offer to you for 1000 boxes 'Hensols' at 17s. 6d. to be cancelled from this date." This letter of October 8th reached the plaintiffs on October 20th. On the was delivered, and that after the option had expired. It was held that the acceptance did not take effect when mailed. Bal v. Van Staden, 20 So. Afric. L. J. 407. The decision is doubtless sound. The acceptor ought not to be allowed knowingly to throw any risk upon the offerer which the latter has not, at least by implication, agreed to accept. The same principle applies as in the case of his negligence. Whenever at the time the acceptor mails the letter he knows that he is incurring an unauthorized risk or whenever at that time his negligence has occasioned such a risk, the acceptance should not take effect until received." 17 Harv. L. Rev. 342. But cf. Pead v. Trull, reported post, p. 806, which, however, related to performance under an existing contract and not to the acceptance of an offer. What if the offer be paid for? In such case, is inability to find a representative of the other party who has died a stronger reason for extending a period than is inability because of war to get a letter to a living person? Of course time is generally of the essence of options and may not have been of the essence in Pead v. Trull.

same day the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendants demanding shipment, and sent them a letter insisting on completion of the contract. * * * This letter is followed by one from the defendants to the plaintiffs of October 25th refusing to complete. * * *

There is no doubt that an offer can be withdrawn before it is accepted, and it is immaterial whether the offer is expressed to be open for acceptance for a given time or not. Routledge v. Grant, 4 Bing. 653. For the decision of the present case, however, it is necessary to consider two other questions—viz.: 1. Whether a withdrawal of an offer has any effect until it is communicated to the person to whom the offer has been sent? 2. Whether posting a letter of withdrawal is a communication to the person to whom the letter is sent?

It is curious that neither of these questions appears to have been actually decided in this country. As regards the first question, I am aware that Pothier and some other writers of celebrity are of opinion that there can be no contract if an offer is withdrawn before it is accepted, although the withdrawal is not communicated to the person to whom the offer has been made. The reason for this opinion is that there is not, in fact, any such consent by both parties as is essential to constitute a contract between them. Against this view, however, it has been urged that a state of mind not notified cannot be regarded in dealings between man and man; and that an uncommunicated revocation is for all practical purposes and in point of law no revocation at all. This is the view taken in the United States. See Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Insurance Co., 9 How. (U. S.) 390, cited in Benjamin on Sales, pp. 56-58, and it is adopted by Mr. Benjamin. The same view is taken by Mr. Pollock in his excellent work on Principles of Contract, ed. ii., p. 10, and by Mr. Leake in his Digest of the Law of Contracts, p. 43. This view, moreover, appears to me much more in accordance with the general principles of English law than the view maintained by Pothier. I pass, therefore, to the next question—viz., whether posting the letter of revocation was a sufficient communication of it to the plaintiff. The offer was posted on October 1st, the withdrawal was posted on the 8th, and did not reach the plaintiff until after he had posted his letter of the 11th, accepting the offer. It may be taken as now settled that where an offer is made and accepted by letters sent through the post, the contract is completed the moment the letter accepting the offer is posted (Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587, Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381) even although it never reaches its destination. When, however, these authorities are looked at, it will be seen that they are based upon the principle that the writer of the offer has expressly or impliedly assented to treat an answer to him by a letter duly posted as a sufficient acceptance and notification to himself, or, in other words, he has made the post-office his agent to receive the acceptance and notification of it. But this principle appears to me to be inapplicable to the case of the withdrawal of an offer. In this particular case I can find no evidence of any authority in fact given by the plaintiffs to the defendants to notify a withdrawal of their offer by merely posting a letter; and there is no legal principle or decision which compels me to hold, contrary to the fact, that the letter of October 8th is to be treated as communicated to the plaintiff on that day or any day before the 20th, when the letter reached them. But before that letter had reached the plaintiffs they had accepted the offer, both by telegram and by post; and they had themselves resold the tin-plates at a profit. In my opinion the withdrawal by the defendants on October 8th of their offer of the 1st was inoperative; and a complete contract binding on both parties was entered into on October 11th, when the plaintiffs accepted the offer of the 1st, which they had no reason to suppose had been withdrawn. Before leaving this part of the case it may be as well to point out the extreme injustice and inconvenience which any other conclusion would produce. If the defendants' contention were to prevail, no person who had received an offer by post and had accepted it would know his position until he had waited such a time as to be quite sure that a letter withdrawing the offer had not been posted before his acceptance of it. It appears to me that both legal principles and practical convenience require that a person who has accepted an offer not known to him to have been revoked shall be in a position safely to act upon the footing that the offer and acceptance constitute a contract binding on both parties. * * *

"There is no doubt that the reply was handed to the telegraph company promptly, and, at least, it would have been open to a jury to find that the plaintiffs had done all that was necessary on their part to complete the contract. If, then, the offer was outstanding when it was accepted, the contract was made. But the offer was outstanding. At the time when the acceptance was received, even, the revocation of the offer had not been received. It seems to us a reasonable requirement that, to disable the plaintiffs from accepting their offer, the defendants should bring home to them actual notice that it had been revoked. By their choice and act, they brought about a relation between themselves and the plaintiffs, which the plaintiffs could turn into a contract by an act on their part, and authorized the plaintiffs to understand and to assume that that relation existed. When the plaintiffs acted in good faith on the assumption, the defendants could not complain. Knowingly to lead a person reasonably to suppose that you offer, and to offer, are the same thing. O'Donnell v. Clinton, 146 Mass. 461, 463, 14 N. E. 747; Cornish v. Abington, 4 Hurl. & N. 549. The offer must be made before the acceptance, and it does not matter whether it is made a longer or a shorter time before, if, by its express or implied terms, it is outstanding at the time of the acceptance. Whether much or little time has intervened, it reaches forward to the moment of the acceptance, and speaks then. It would be monstrous to allow an inconsistent

HENTHORN v. FRASER.

(Court of Appeal. [1892] 2 Ch. 27.)

In 1891 the plaintiff was desirous of purchasing from the Huskisson Benefit Building Society certain houses in Flamank Street, Birkenhead. In May he, at the office of the society in Chapel Street, Liverpool, signed a memorandum drawn up by the secretary, offering £600 for the property, which offer was declined by the directors; and on July 1st he made in the same way an offer of £700, which was also declined. On July 7th he again called at the office, and the secretary verbally offered to sell to him for £750. This offer was reduced into writing, and was as follows:

"I hereby give you the refusal of the Flamank Street property at £750 for fourteen days."

The secretary, after signing this, handed it to the plaintiff, who took it away with him for consideration.

On the morning of the 8th another person called at the office, and offered £760 for the property, which was accepted, and a contract for purchase signed, subject to a condition for avoiding it if the society found that they could not withdraw from the offer to the plaintiff.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock on that day the secretary posted to the plaintiff, who resided in Birkenhead, the following letter:

"Please take notice that my letter to you of the 7th instant, giving you the option of purchasing the property, Flamank Street, Birkenhead, for £750, in fourteen days, is withdrawn, and the offer cancelled."

This letter, it appeared, was delivered at the plaintiff's address between 5 and 6 in the evening, but, as he was out, did not reach his hands till about 8 o'clock.

On the same July 8th the plaintiff's solicitor, by the plaintiff's direction, wrote to the secretary as follows:

"I am instructed by Mr. James Henthorn to write you, and accept your offer to sell the property, 1 to 17 Flamank Street, Birkenhead, at the price of £750. Kindly have contract prepared and forwarded to me."

This letter was addressed to the society's office, and was posted in Birkenhead at 3.50 p. m., was delivered at 8.30 p. m. after the closing of the office, and was received by the secretary on the following morning. The secretary replied, stating that the society's offer had been withdrawn.

The plaintiff brought this action in the Court of the County Palatine act of the offerer, not known or brought to the notice of the offeree, to affect the making of the contract; for instance, a sale by an agent elsewhere one minute after the principal personally has offered goods which are accepted within five minutes by the person to whom he is speaking. The principle is the same when the time is longer, and the act relied on a step looking to, but not yet giving, notice." Holmes, J., in Brauer v. Shaw, 168 Mass. 198, 199-200 (1897). See Patrick v. Bowman, 149 U. S. 411 (1893); Stephen M. Weld & Co. v. Victory Mfg. Co., 205 Fed. 770 (1913).

for specific performance. The Vice-Chancellor dismissed the action, and the plaintiff appealed.

LORD HERSCHELL.²² This is an action for the specific performance of a contract to sell to the plaintiff certain house property situate in Flamank Street, Birkenhead. The action was tried before the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancashire, who gave judgment for the defendants.
* * *

If the acceptance by the plaintiff of the defendants' offer is to be treated as complete at the time the letter containing it was posted, I can entertain no doubt that the society's attempted revocation of the offer was wholly ineffectual. I think that a person who has made an offer must be considered as continuously making it until he has brought to the knowledge of the person to whom it was made that it is withdrawn. This seems to me to be in accordance with the reasoning of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Adams v. Lindsell, 3 B. & W. 681, which was approved by the Lord Chancellor in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, 399, and also with the opinion of Lord Justice Mellish in Harris's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 587. The very point was decided in the case of Byrne v. Van Tienhoven, 5 C. P. D. 344, by Lord Justice Lindley, and his decision was subsequently followed by Mr. Justice Lush. The grounds upon which it has been held that the acceptance of an offer is complete when it is posted have, I think, no application to the revocation or modification of an offer. These can be no more effectual than the offer itself, unless brought to the mind of the person to whom the offer is made. But it is contended on behalf of the defendants that the acceptance was complete only when received by them and not on the letter being posted. It cannot, of course, be denied, after the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, in the House of Lords, that, where an offer has been made through the medium of the post, the contract is complete as soon as the acceptance of the offer is posted, but that decision is said to be inapplicable here, inasmuch as the letter containing the offer was not sent by post to Birkenhead, but handed to the plaintiff in the defendants' office at Liverpool. The question therefore arises in what circumstances the acceptance of an offer is to be regarded as complete as soon as it is posted. In the case of the Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Company v. Grant, 4 Ex. D. 216, Lord Justice Baggallay said (Ibid, 227): "I think that the principle established in Dunlop v. Higgins is limited in its application to cases in which by reason of general usage, or of the relations between the parties to any particular transactions, or of the terms in which the offer is made, the acceptance of such offer by a letter through the post is expressly or impliedly authorized." And in the same case Lord Justice Thesiger based his judgment, 4 Ex. D. 218, on the defendant having made an application for shares under circumstances

"from which it must be implied that he authorized the company, in the event of their allotting to him the shares applied for, to send the notice of allotment by post." The facts of that case were that the defendant had, in Swansea, where he resided, handed a letter of application to an agent of the company, their place of business being situate in London. It was from these circumstances that the Lords Justices implied an authority to the company to accept the defendant's offer to take shares through the medium of the post. Applying the law thus laid down by the Court of Appeal, I think in the present case an authority to accept by post must be implied. Although the plaintiff received the offer at the defendants' office in Liverpool, he resided in another town, and it must have been in contemplation that he would take the offer, which by its terms was to remain open for some days, with him to his place of residence, and those who made the offer must have known that it would be according to the ordinary usages of mankind that if he accepted it he should communicate his acceptance by means of the post. I am not sure that I should myself have regarded the doctrine that an acceptance is complete as soon as the letter containing it is posted as resting upon an implied authority by the person making the offer to the person receiving it to accept by those means. It strikes me as somewhat artificial to speak of the person to whom the offer is made as having the implied authority of the other party to send his acceptance by post. He needs no authority to transmit the acceptance through any particular channel; he may select what means he pleases, the post-office no less than any other. The only effect of the supposed authority is to make the acceptance complete so soon as it is posted, and authority will obviously be implied only when the tribunal considers that it is a case in which this result ought to be reached. I should prefer to state the rule thus: Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted. It matters not in which way the proposition be stated, the present case is in either view within it. The learned Vice-Chancellor appears to have based his decision to some extent on the fact that before the acceptance was posted the defendants had sold the property to another person. The case of Dickinson v. Dodds, 2 Ch. D. 463, was relied upon in support of that defence. In that case, however, the plaintiff knew of the subsequent sale before he accepted the offer, which, in my judgment, distinguishes it entirely from the present case. For the reasons I have given, I think the judgment must be reversed and the usual decree for specific performance made. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal and of the action.

KAY, L. J. * * * In his judgment, in Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Company v. Grant, Theisiger, L. J., refers to the cases in which the decision in Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, has been explained by saying that the post-office was treated as the common agent of both contracting parties. That reason is not satisfactory. The post-office are only carriers between them. They are agents to convey the communication, not to receive it. The communication is not made to the post-office, but by their agency as carriers. The difference is between saying "Tell my agent A., if you accept," and "Send your answer to me by A." In the former case A. is to be the intelligent recipient of the acceptance, in the latter he is only to convey the communication to the person making the offer which he may do by a letter, knowing nothing of its contents. The post-office are only agents in the latter sense. All that Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, decided was, that the acceptor of the offer having properly posted his acceptance, was not responsible for the delay of the post-office in delivering it; so that after receipt the said party could not rescind on the ground of that delay. I cannot help thinking that the decision has been treated as going much further than the House of Lords intended. Baggallay, L. J., in his judgment in Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Company v. Grant, 4 Ex. D. 227, treats it as applicable "to cases in which by reason of general usage, or of the relations between the parties to any particular transactions, or of the terms in which the offer is made, the acceptance of such offer by a letter through the post is expressly or impliedly authorized." If for authorized the word "contemplated" is substituted, I should be disposed to agree with this dictum. But I would rather express it thus: "Posting an acceptance of an offer may be sufficient where it can fairly be inferred from the circumstances of the case that the acceptance might be sent by post."

Is that a proper inference in the present case? I think it is. One party resided in Liverpool, the other in Birkenhead. The acceptance would be expected to be in writing, the subject of purchase being real estate. These and the other circumstances to which I have alluded, in my opinion, warrant the inference that both parties contemplated that a letter sent by post was a mode by which the acceptance might be communicated. I think, therefore, that we are bound by authority to hold that the contract was complete at 3.50 p. m. on July 8th, when the letter of acceptance was posted, and before the letter of withdrawal was received.

Then what was the effect of the withdrawal by the letter posted between 12 and 1 the same day, and received in the evening? Did that take effect from the time of posting? It has never been held that this doctrine applies to a letter withdrawing the offer. Take the cases alluded to by Lord Bramwell in the Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Company v. Grant, 4 Ex. D. 234. A notice by a tenant to quit can have no operation till it comes to the actual knowledge of the person to whom it is addressed. An offer to sell is nothing until it is actually received. No doubt there is the seeming anomaly pointed out by Lord Bramwell that the same letter might contain an acceptance, and also such a notice or offer as to other property, and that when posted it would be effectual as to the acceptance, and not as to the notice or offer. But the anomaly, if it be one, arises from the different nature of the two communications. As to the acceptance, if it was contemplated that it might be sent by post, the acceptor, in Lord Cottenham's language, has done all that he was bound to do by posting the letter, but this cannot be said as to the notice of withdrawal. That was not a contemplated proceeding. The person withdrawing was bound to bring his change of purpose to the knowledge of the said party, and as this was not done in this case till after the letter of acceptance was posted, I am of opinion that it was too late.

The point has been so decided in two cases: Byrne v. Van Tienhoven, 5 C. P. D. 344, and Stevenson v. McLean, 5 Q. B. D. 346, and I agree with those decisions.³⁴

³⁴ "It is to be taken as settled law, both in this country and in England, in cases of contracts between parties distant from each other, but communicating in modes recognized in commercial business, that when an offer is made by one person to another, the minds of the parties meet and a contract is to be deemed concluded, when the offer is accepted in reasonable time, either by telegram duly sent in the ordinary way, or by letter duly posted to the proposer, provided either be done before the offer is withdrawn to the knowledge of or upon notice of the other party." Harlan, J., for the court, in Burton v. U. S., 202 U. S. 344, 384-5. In that case the court regarded the offer as made in conversation in Illinois and accepted by telegram confirmed by letter sent from St. Louis, Mo. to the offeror in Washington, D. C., and the contract as concluded at St. Louis.

Opposed in principle to Henthorn v. Fraser, is Scottish Amer. Mortgage Co. v. Davis, 96 Tex. 504 (1903).

On telegraphed acceptance of oral or written offer, see South Branch Cheese Co. v. American Butter & Cheese Co., 191 Mich. 507 (1916) saying acceptance of written offer complete when telegraphed. Cf. Perry v. Mt. Hope Iron Co., 15 R. I. 380 (1886). But see Lucas v. W. U. Tel. Co., 131 Ia. 669 (1906).

On time and place of consummation of contract when offer by letter is accepted by telegram or vice versa, see 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1016, note; L. R. A. 1916A, 1302, note.

In Bruner v. Moore, [1904] 1 Ch. 305, it was held that the exercise of an option to purchase patent rights is within the rule of Henthorn v. Fraser. The contract giving the option was entered into in London, but as Farwell, J. said (p. 316): "In the present case the parties are American citizens staying temporarily at London hotels when they signed the contract. That contract obviously contemplates the events that in fact happened—that the two parties would separate and would visit various parts of Europe and would communicate with one another constantly by letter and telegram. If there ever was a case in which the parties contemplated that 'the post might be used as a means of communicating' in all subjects connected with the contract this is that case. I hold therefore that the option was duly exercised."

But where an offer is made by telegram, an acceptance by letter may not complete a contract. In Quenerduaine v. Cole, 32 Weekly Rep. 185 (1883) Grove, J., said that the offer by telegram "implied the expectation of a prompt reply" and the alleged acceptance by letter, which was sent the same day the offer was received but which could not reach the offeror until after the time when the offer was to be kept open, "was not therefore made in reasonable time, even if the parties were ever ad idem, which I think they were not." HALDANE et al. v. UNITED STATES.

(Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1895. 69 Fed. 819, 16 C. C. A. 447.)

On April 30, 1890, the United States advertised for proposals to furnish hay and straw for certain military posts. A circular issued in connection with the advertisement stated that "proposals * * * will not be entertained unless accompanied by a guaranty * * * ; that the bidder will not withdraw his proposal within sixty days succeeding the 31st day of May, 1890, and that, if the proposal be accepted in whole or in part, he will enter into a contract and bond agreeably to the terms of his proposal within ten days after the day on which he is notified of such acceptance and award." Peter Haldane and W. D. Moore filed a proposal on May 30, 1890 to furnish and stack hay at Ft. Riley which was among the proposals which were duly opened on May 31, 1890. The chief quartermaster, as it is claimed, duly notified Peter Haldane and W. D. Moore that their proposal of May 30th was accepted by the government. On or about July 22, 1890, the chief quartermaster also transmitted to them, by mail, a contract, to be by them executed in accordance with their proposal. Haldane and Moore claimed that they received no notice, personal or otherwise, of the acceptance by the government of their proposal until July 31, 1890, more than 60 days subsequent to May 31, 1890, and for that reason, and other reasons

Ins. Co. v. Schultz, 80 Fed. 337 (1897) the extended negotiation between the parties seemingly made the court assume that the offer by telegram could be accepted by letter. A similar holding is found in Farmers' Produce Co. v. McAlister Storage & Com. Co., 48 Okla. 488 (1915).

In Robeson v. Pells, 202 Pa. St. 399 (1902) an offer cabled from Hamburg, Germany, to sell 300 tons of Ferro Manganese, then rising in price, was received by the offeree in Philadelphia, shortly after one o'clock on Saturday. At three o'clock the following Monday an acceptance was wired. The Supreme Court approved a charge to the jury which was in part, as follows:

"* * * I suppose everybody understands, I should think the inference is an irresistible one, that a message sent by telegram, in the nature of things, calls for a speedier answer than a message sent by letter. If a man in New York telegraphs to Philadelphia that he has something which he can sell at a certain price, and puts in his telegram 'Answer whether you want it,' it seems to me that the necessary inference to be drawn from such an inquiry made in such a way is that he is expected and ought to have a prompt reply. I cannot say to you as matter of law what would be a prompt reply; whether one hour, five hours, ten hours, twenty-four hours or forty-eight hours would be a prompt reply, but I do say that the reply ought to be prompt, as quick as under the circumstances of the case with reference to the nature of the transaction the reply could be sent. Of course, you would say the man had a right to turn around, had a right to think and decide what would be the proper thing to do under the circumstances, but allowing all that, it would seem to me that the jury ought to say in regard to such an exchange of inquiries and replies by wire that the parties who claim that they have rights fixed by such messages should be held to prompt, quick action in the matter. If you think that this plaintiff did not make such a prompt reply as was reasonable under the circumstances, then he cannot claim that there was any contract."

as well, they declined to sign the contract or deliver the hay. For their refusal to execute said contract, and to deliver the hay according to their proposal of May 30, 1890, the United States brought an action against them in the District Court of the United States for the district of Kansas, and recovered a judgment against them and their guarantors in the sum of $3,572.28. To reverse that judgment, the defendants below sued out the present writ of error.

THAYER, J.† Another error, which we think has been sufficiently assigned to warrant us in noticing it, consists in the action of the trial court in charging the jury, as it did in substance, that the deposit of a notice in the mail by the officers of the government on or about July 24, 1890, addressed to Haldane and Moore, notifying them that their proposal of May 30, 1890, to furnish hay at Ft. Riley, had been accepted, was a good and sufficient notice of acceptance to bind Haldane and Moore to deliver the hay, notwithstanding the fact that the notice did not reach them or either of them until July 31, 1890. The court declined to submit to the jury the question whether the defendants were notified in time of the acceptance of their bid, but decided as a matter of law, and so charged the jury, that the mailing of the notice of acceptance on or about July 24, 1890, addressed to the defendants at their place of residence, bound them to comply with their proposal of May 30, 1890. * * * There was evidence that neither Haldane nor Moore had any intimation of the acceptance of their bid by the government until the morning of July 31, 1890, when Haldane returned to Junction City, and received the notice of acceptance from the mail in a letter which bore date July 24, 1890, but was probably not mailed until a day or two afterwards.

The doctrine is well established that, when a statute requires notice to be given to a person for the purpose of creating a liability, personal notice is intended, unless some other form of notice is expressly authorized by the statute. Rathbun v. Acker, 18 Barb. 393; McDermott v. Board, 25 Barb. 635, 646; Ryan v. Kelley, 9 Mo. App. 396; Corneli v. Partridge, 3 Mo. App. 575; State v. Jacobs, 2 Jones (N. C.) 52; Gorham v. Luckett, 6 B. Mon. 146, 161, 168. The same rule, we think, is applicable to notices required to be given by the terms of an express contract. If a contract requires a notice to be given for the purpose of creating a liability or imposing an obligation, personal notice should be given, unless the parties expressly stipulate that the notice shall be served in some other way, as by mailing it to a designated address. This, we think, is the correct rule, except in those cases where the party to be notified conceals himself or resorts to some trick or artifice to avoid the service of personal notice. In such cases, no doubt, reasonable efforts to serve the notice personally is all that should be required of him whose duty it is to give the notice. In the present case the circular issued by the government for the information of bidders notified them that they would be expected to enter into a contract and give a bond within 10 days after the day on which the bidder was notified of the acceptance of his bid. No agreement having been made, and no information having been given to them that a notice deposited in the mail would be deemed sufficient to constitute an acceptance by the government, the bidder had the right to expect personal notice, or at least to insist that, if the mail was used to convey notice, the acceptance of the proposal should not be deemed complete or effectual to bind the bidder until the agency employed to convey the notice had delivered it into the hands of the bidder. We think, therefore, that the district court erred in deciding that the deposit of the notice of acceptance in the mail some 5 or 6 days before the expiration of the 60 days during which the proposal was to remain open was a sufficient acceptance to bind the defendants. We think that the jury should have been instructed, under the circumstances heretofore detailed, that if they found that the notice of acceptance did not in fact reach Haldane and Moore, or either of them, until July 31, 1890, they were not bound to abide by and carry out their proposal.

It was suggested in the charge of the learned trial judge, but not decided, that possibly the government had the right to accept the defendants' bid even after the lapse of 60 days; that the stipulation in the circular that the bid should not be withdrawn for 60 days was not tantamount to a statement that it should not be subject to acceptance after that time. We cannot assent to that view. In the absence of the clause not to withdraw the bid for 60 days, it would only have remained open for a reasonable time. By the insertion of the clause in question, the parties to the transaction, in effect, determined how long ought to be allowed for acceptance, and, by inference at least, they agreed that more than 60 days was an unreasonable period for the proposal to remain open and unaccepted.

For the error heretofore pointed out, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.²⁶

HORNE et al. v. NIVER et al.

Action by Horne and others against Niver and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs except. Exceptions overruled.

HOLMES, J. This is an action on an alleged contract to sell 400 tons of coal at $2.50 a ton. On July 17, 1895, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs offering "a very low figure on a small lot of our Columbia coal at Salem." The letter continued: "We beg to quote you $2.50 on cars at that place, and, should you deem it wise to favor us with an order of 5 or 600 tons, kindly wire us at our expense on receipt of this." On July 19th the plaintiffs replied, ordering 400 tons. The presiding judge, against the plaintiffs' request and exception, ruled that the answer was not in time to constitute a good acceptance, and found as a fact that the offer was not accepted according to its terms. The ruling was clearly right, as applied to the written offer alone, since the offer did not purport to extend beyond the time for a reply by telegraph (Eliason v. Henshaw, 4 Wheat. 225; Maclay v. Harvey, 90 Ill. 525); and, so far as appears, the finding was justified (Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Columbus Rolling Mill Co., 119 U. S. 149, 152, 7 Sup. Ct. 168). There was conflicting evidence of some conversation between the two letters, which is relied on as showing that the offer was treated as open; but, as the judge found that the only oral agreement made was conditional upon the coal not having been all disposed of, which in fact it had been, the talk cannot help the plaintiffs.

The finding just mentioned made the plaintiffs' other requests for rulings as to a verbal extension of time or consent to an acceptance on July 19th immaterial.

"The evidence shows that there were two daily mails between Peoria and Monmouth—one arriving at Monmouth at 11 o'clock a. m., and the other at 6 o'clock p. m., and it did not require more than one day's time between the points. Appellee's letter to appellant making the offer, it will be remembered, bears date March 21st. Assuming the date of appellant's postal card (which, she says, was written on the morning after she received appellee's letter) to be correct, she received appellee's letter on the evening of the 22d. Appellee was, therefore, entitled to expect a reply mailed on the 23d, which he ought to have received on that day, or, at farthest, by the morning of the 24th; but appellant's reply was not mailed until the 25th. It does not relieve appellant of fault that she gave the postal card to a boy on the 23d, to have him mail it. Her duty was not to place an answer in private hands, but in the post-office. The boy was her agent, not that of appellee, and his negligence in mailing the postal card was her negligence.

"The question of whether it would not have equally well subserved appellee's object had he treated the postal card of appellant as the consummation of a contract is irrelevant. Appellant seeks to recover upon the strict letter of a special contract, and it is, therefore, incumbent on her to prove such contract. It is required of her, as we have seen, to prove an acceptance of appellee's offer within the time to which it was limited—that is to say, by the placing in the post-office of an answer unequivocally accepting the offer in time for the return mail, which she did not do. Appellee was, thereafter, under no obligation to regard the contract as closed. He might, it is true, have done so, but he was not legally bound in that respect, nor was he legally bound to notify appellant that her acceptance had not been signified within the time to which his offer was limited. She is legally chargeable with knowledge that her acceptance

UNION NAT. BANK v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1890. 106 N. C. 347, 11 S. E. 321, 19 Am. St. Rep. 538.)

Action by the Union National Bank of Chicago against John W. Miller and others, to recover personal property alleged to have been wrongfully attached. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

SHEPHERD, J.²⁷ The only question necessary to be considered in disposing of this appeal involves the correctness of his honor's instruction that the title to the property had, by reason of the telegraphic correspondence, passed out of the plaintiff, and into Van Landingham, at the time of the levy of the attachment. The property was in Charlotte, in the possession of a common carrier, and on the 26th of November, 1888, Van Landingham made the following offer by telegraph to the plaintiff's agent at Chicago: "Charlotte, N. C., Nov. 26, 1888. To Gregg, Garvey & Co.: Nineteen dollars per ton. Must have reply early to-morrow. Jno. Van Landingham." On the next day, at 5.34 p. m., Van Landingham received a telegram from the said agent accepting the offer. This latter telegram was sent from Chicago before, but was not received by Van Landingham until after the levy of the attachment. His honor held that the contract was complete when the telegram was sent from Chicago, and that, the title to the property having passed to Van Landingham before the alleged conversion, the plaintiff could not recover. * * * We are of the opinion that under the peculiar terms of this correspondence, and in view of the testimony, the court was not warranted in charging the jury that the title vested in Van Landingham at the time the telegram was sent. It does not appear that it was sent early in the day, according to the terms of the offer, and it was incumbent on the defendant to have shown this fact before he could avail himself of the principle contended for. "In our own law the effect of naming a definite time in the proposal is simply negative, and for the proposer's benefit; that is, it operates as a warning that an acceptance will not be received after the lapse of the time named. In fact, the proposal so limited comes to an end of itself at the end of that time, and there is nothing for the other party to accept." Pol. Cont. 9; Larmon v. Jordan, 56 Ill. 204; Railroad Co. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. 224; Mactier's Adm'r v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103; Cheney v. Cook, 7 Wis. 413. * * * The requirement of the offerer, Van Landingham that he "must have a reply early was not in time, and in order to fix a liability thereby upon appellee, it was incumbent upon her, before assuming that appellee waived this objection, to ascertain that he in fact did so."

"It will be noticed that by its terms the offer demanded an acceptance by return mail, and there is no pretense that such was forthcoming. There was therefore no acceptance, and the offer is eliminated in law from the record and is as if it had never been made." Bruce, J., in Ackerman v. Maddux, 26 No. Dak. 50, 56 (1913) to-morrow," cannot be regarded otherwise than as a stipulation for an acceptance within that time; and, as the defendant has not shown a compliance with such stipulation, it must follow that there was error on the part of his honor in charging the jury that the mere sending of the acceptance before the levy operated to transfer the title. The offer was limited to early in the day. The acceptance was not received until late in the evening. Even conceding that the contract would be complete from the sending of the dispatch, there is, as we have said, no testimony to show that it was sent within the time limited by the offer. The title, therefore, did not pass. Benj. Sales, (3d Amer. Ed.) 48, note. For these reasons we are of the opinion that there should be a new trial.³⁸

³⁸ In Lewis v. Browning, 130 Mass. 176 (1880), Gray, C. J., said: "In any view, the person making the offer may always, if he chooses, make the formation of the contract which he proposes dependent upon the actual communication to himself of the acceptance. Thesiger, L. J., in Household Ins. Co. v. Grant, 4 Ex. D. 223. Pollock on Con. (2d ed.) 17. Leake on Con. 39, note. And in the case at bar, the letter written in the plaintiff's behalf by her husband as her agent on July 8th, 1878, in California, and addressed to the defendant at Boston, appears to us clearly to manifest such an intention. After proposing the terms of an agreement for a new lease, he says: 'If you agree to this plan, and will telegraph me on receipt of this, I will forward power of attorney to Mr. Ware,' the plaintiff's attorney in Boston. 'Telegraph me "yes" or "no." If "no," I will go at once to Boston with my wife, and between us we will try to recover our lost ground. If I do not hear from you by the 18th or 20th, I shall conclude "no." ' Taking the whole letter together, the offer is made dependent upon an actual communication to the plaintiff of the defendant's acceptance on or before July 20th, and does not discharge the old lease, nor bind the plaintiff to execute a new one, unless the acceptance reaches California within that time." See Mercer Electric Mfg. Co. v. Conn. Electric Mfg. Co., 87 Conn. 691 (1914); Haas v. Myers, 111 Ill. 421 (1884). But of Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441, 447-8 (1854).

In Eliason v. Henshaw, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 225 (1819), the plaintiffs sent from Harper's Ferry to defendant at Mill Creek by a wagoner an offer to take two or three hundred barrels of flour at $9.50 per barrel, the postscript to the letter of offer stating: "Please write by return of wagon whether you accept our offer." The wagoner not returning to Harper's Ferry, the defendant sent an acceptance addressed to the plaintiffs at Georgetown where by the terms of the offer the flour was to be delivered, and it was in fact received by the plaintiffs at that place. The court held that "by return of wagon" fixed Harper's Ferry as the place to which the answer was to be sent as "an essential part of the plaintiffs' offer" and that "an acceptance communicated at a place different from that pointed out by the plaintiffs, and forming a part of their proposal, imposed no obligation binding upon them unless they had acquiesced in it, which they declined doing." That is a fanciful construction of the words "by return of wagon" and if the answer reached the plaintiffs in Georgetown at as early a moment as it would have if sent to Harper's Ferry by the first wagon or equally expeditious conveyance, the decision must be disapproved.

CAROW TOWING CO. v. THE "ED. McWILLIAMS."

Action for towage by the plaintiffs against the ship "Ed. McWilliams," a British ship registered at Amherstburg, Ont.

The plaintiffs are a partnership, with their head office at Cheboygan, Mich., in the United States of America.

The contract of towage on which the claim herein was based, was arrived at as follows: telegram from Sault Ste. Marie, Ont. by the Lake Superior Paper Co., to the plaintiffs at Cheboygan, Mich. and reply from plaintiffs to the paper company. No contract was made by these telegrams. Subsequently a long distance telephone call was sent by the plaintiff, William Martin, at Cheboygan, to Capt. Thos. R. Climie's house at Sault Ste. Marie, where it was answered by Capt. Climie, who by telephone discussed and agreed to the terms of the towage contract.

The subsequent towage service was in accordance with the contract, and consisted in towing the "Ed. McWilliams" a dump barge, from Sault Ste. Marie to Calcite, Michigan, light, and back to Sault Ste. Marie loaded with limestone. The claim $434.38 was admitted to be correct.

At the time of the towage contract and of said towage service, the "Ed McWilliams" was subject to two registered mortgages, both of which are still subsisting. The amount of these mortgages greatly exceeds the value of the ship.

HODGINS, L. J. A.³⁹ * * * I think the contract was one made in Ontario, for, when Captain Climie went to his telephone, he then and there received an offer, or discussed terms, which, when accepted, formed the contract. In other words, the plaintiffs at Cheboygan, Mich., by using the long distance telephone, were able to reach Captain Climie in Ontario just as if they had telegraphed to him and he had received the telegram at the Soo. His reply at the telephone is of the same effect as if he had posted a letter or sent off a telegram from an office in Ontario. See Weyburn Townsite Company v. Honsburger (1919) 15 O. W. N. 428.

³⁹ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

⁴⁰ In Bank of Yolo v. The Sperry Flour Co., 141 Cal. 314, Beatty, C. J. said: "A contract is supposed to be made at some place, and the place where it becomes complete is the place where it is made. If a contract is made by exchange of letters or telegrams, it is held to have been made at the place where the letter is mailed, or telegram filed, containing an unconditional acceptance by one party of the offer of the other. If the communications are oral, either with or without the telephone, between parties on opposite sides of a county line, the same principle would seem to require that the contract should be deemed to have been made in the county where the offer of one is accepted by the other—in this case in Sacramento", where the acceptance was talked into the telephone.

CARLILL v. CARBOLIC SMOKE BALL CO.

(Court of Appeal. [1893] 1 Q. B. 256.)

Appeal from a decision of Hawkins, J. [1892] 2 Q. B. 484.

The defendants, who were the proprietors and vendors of a medical preparation called "The Carbolic Smoke Ball," inserted in the Pall Mall Gazette of November 13, 1891, and in other newspapers, the following advertisement:

"£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic influenza, colds, or any disease caused by taking cold, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball. £1000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent Street shewing our sincerity in the matter.

"During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand carbolic smoke balls were sold as preventives against the disease, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the carbolic smoke ball.

"One carbolic smoke ball will last a family several months, making it the cheapest remedy in the world at the price, 10s., post free. The ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. Address, Carbolic Smoke Ball Company, 27 Princes Street, Hanover Square, London."

The plaintiff, a lady, on the faith of this advertisement, bought one of the balls at a chemist's and used it as directed, three times a day, from November 20, 1891, to January 17, 1892, when she was attacked by influenza. Hawkins, J., held that she was entitled to recover the £100. The defendants appealed.

LINDLEY, L. J.⁴¹ * * * The first observation I will make is that we are not dealing with any inference of fact. We are dealing with an express promise to pay £100 in certain events. Read the advertisement how you will, and twist it about as you will, here is a distinct promise expressed in language which is perfectly unmistakable: "£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the influenza after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball."

We must first consider whether this was intended to be a promise to all, or whether it was a mere puff which meant nothing. Was it a mere

While "the place at which a contract is made is necessarily the place of the acceptance of the offer" (Smith, C. J., in Couret v. Conner, 118 Miss. 374, 392 (1918)), the question in the telephone cases is whether the offer is accepted when the acceptor speaks his acceptance or when the offeror hears. Suppose the parties talk from New York to San Francisco over impeded wires and after the acceptor speaks his acceptance and before the offeror hears it, the acceptor dies of heart disease. Would there be a contract?

On contracts by telephone, see 127 Am. St. Rep. 538, note.

puff? My answer to that question is "No," and I base my answer upon this passage: "£1000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, shewing our sincerity in the matter." Now, for what was that money deposited or that statement made except to negative the suggestion that this was a mere puff and meant nothing at all? The deposit is called in aid by the advertiser as proof of his sincerity in the matter that is, the sincerity of his promise to pay this £100 in the event which he has specified. I say this for the purpose of giving point to the observation that we are not inferring a promise; there is the promise, as plain as words can make it.

Then it is contended that it is not binding. In the first place, it is said that it is not made with anybody in particular. Now that point is common to the words of this advertisement and to the words of all other advertisements offering rewards. They are offers to anybody who performs the conditions named in the advertisement, and anybody who does perform the condition accepts the offer. In point of law this advertisement is an offer to pay £100 to anybody who will perform these conditions, and the performance of the conditions, is the acceptance of the offer. That rests upon a string of authorities, the earliest of which is Williams v. Carwardine, 4 Barn. & Adol. 621, which has been followed by many other decisions upon advertisements offering rewards.

But then it is said, "Supposing that the performance of the conditions is an acceptance of the offer, that acceptance ought to have been notified." Unquestionably, as a general proposition, when an offer is made, it is necessary in order to make a binding contract, not only that it should be accepted, but that the acceptance should be notified. But is that so in cases of this kind? I apprehend that they are an exception to that rule, or, if not an exception, they are open to the observation that the notification of the acceptance need not precede the performance. This offer is a continuing offer. It was never revoked, and if notice of acceptance is required,—which I doubt very much, for I rather think the true view is that which was expressed and explained by Lord Blackburn in the case of Brogden v. Railway Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, 691,—if notice of acceptance is required, the person who makes the offer gets the notice of acceptance contemporaneously with his notice of the performance of the condition. If he gets notice of the acceptance before his offer is revoked, that in principle is all you want. I, however, think that the true view, in a case of this kind, is that the person who makes the offer shews by his language and from the nature of the transaction that he does not expect and does not require notice of the acceptance apart from notice of the performance.

We, therefore, find here all the elements which are necessary to form a binding contract enforceable in point of law, subject to two observations. First of all it is said that this advertisement is so vague that you can not really construe it as a promise—that the vagueness of the language shows that a legal promise was never intended or contemplated. The language is vague and uncertain in some respects, and particularly in this, that the £100 is to be paid to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic after having used the balls three times daily for two weeks. It is said, when are they to be used? According to the language of the advertisement no time is fixed, and, construing the offer most strongly against the person who has made it, one might infer that any time was meant. I do not think that was meant, and to hold the contrary would be pushing too far the doctrine of taking language most strongly against the person using it. I do not think that business people or reasonable people would understand the words as meaning that if you took a smoke ball and used it three times daily for two weeks you were to be guaranteed against influenza for the rest of your life, and I think it would be pushing the language of the advertisement too far to construe it as meaning that. But if it does not mean that, what does it mean? It is for the defendants to shew what it does mean; and it strikes me that there are two, and possibly three, reasonable constructions to be put on this advertisement, any one of which will answer the purpose of the plaintiff. Possibly it may be limited to persons catching the "increasing epidemic" (that is, the then prevailing epidemic), or any colds or diseases caused by taking cold, during the prevalence of the increasing epidemic. That is one suggestion; but it does not commend itself to me. Another suggested meaning is that you are warranted free from catching this epidemic, or colds or other diseases caused by taking cold, whilst you are using this remedy after using it for two weeks. If that is the meaning, the plaintiff is right, for she used the remedy for two weeks and went on using it till she got the epidemic. Another meaning, and the one which I rather prefer, is that the reward is offered to any person who contracts the epidemic or other disease within a reasonable time after having used the smoke ball. Then it is asked, what is a reasonable time? It has been suggested that there is no standard of reasonableness; that it depends upon the reasonable time for a germ to develop! I do not feel pressed by that. It strikes me that a reasonable time may be ascertained in a business sense and in a sense satisfactory to a lawyer, in this way: Find out from a chemist what the ingredients are; find out from a skilled physician how long the effect of such ingredients on the system could be reasonably expected to endure so as to protect a person from an epidemic or cold,—and in that way you will get a standard to be laid before a jury, or a judge without a jury, by which they might exercise their judgment as to what a reasonable time would be. It strikes me, I confess, that the true construction of this advertisement is that £100 will be paid to anybody who uses this smoke ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions, and who gets the influenza or cold or other diseases caused by taking cold within a reasonable time after so using it; and if that is the true construction, it is enough for the plaintiff.

I come now to the last point which I think requires attention: that is, the consideration. It has been argued that this is nudum pactum—that there is no consideration. We must apply to that argument the usual legal tests. Let us see whether there is no advantage to the defendants. It is said that the use of the ball is no advantage to them, and that what benefits them is the sale; and the case is put that a lot of these balls might be stolen, and that it would be no advantage to the defendants if the thief or other people used them. The answer to that, I think, is as follows: It is quite obvious that in view of the advertisers a use by the public of their remedy, if they can only get the public to have confidence enough to use it, will react and produce a sale which is directly beneficial to them. Therefore, the advertisers get out of the use an advantage which is enough to constitute a consideration.

But there is another view. Does not the person who acts upon this advertisement and accepts the offer put himself to some inconvenience at the request of the defendants? Is it nothing to use this ball three times daily for two weeks according to the directions at the request of the advertiser? Is that to go for nothing? It appears to me that there is a distinct inconvenience, not to say a detriment, to any person who so uses the smoke ball. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is ample consideration for the promise. * * *

It appears to me, therefore, that the defendants must perform their promise, and, if they have been so unwary as to expose themselves to a great many actions, so much the worse for them.

BOWEN, L. J. I am of the same opinion. We are asked to say that this document was a contract too vague to be enforced.

The first observation which arises is that the document itself is not a contract at all; it is only an offer made to the public. * * * But the main point seems to be that the vagueness of the document shews that no contract whatever was intended. It seems to me that, in order to arrive at a right conclusion, we must read this advertisement in its plain meaning, as the public would understand it. It was intended to be issued to the public and to be read by the public. How would an ordinary person reading this document construe it? It was intended unquestionably to have some effect, and I think the effect which it was intended to have, was to make people use the smoke ball, because the suggestions and allegations which it contains are directed immediately to the use of the smoke ball as distinct from the purchase of it. It did not follow that the smoke ball was to be purchased from the defendants directly or even from agents of theirs directly. The intention was that the circulation of the smoke ball should be promoted, and that the use of it should be increased. The advertisement begins by saying that a reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic after using the ball. It has been said that the words do not apply only to persons who contract the epidemic after the publication of the advertisement, but include persons who had previously contracted the influenza. I cannot so read the advertisement. It is written in colloquial and popular language, and I think that it is equivalent to this: "£100 will be paid to any person who shall contract the increasing epidemic after having used the carbolic smoke ball three times daily for two weeks." And it seems to me that the way in which the public would read it would be this: that if anybody, after the advertisement was published, used three times daily for two weeks the carbolic smoke ball, and then caught cold, he would be entitled to the reward. Then again it was said: "How long is this protection to endure? Is it to go on forever, or for what limit of time?" I think that there are two constructions of this document, each of which is good sense, and each of which seems to me to satisfy the exigencies of the present action. It may mean that the protection is warranted to last during the epidemic, and it was during the epidemic that the plaintiff contracted the disease. I think, more probably, it means that the smoke ball will be a protection while it is in use. That seems to me the way in which an ordinary person would understand an advertisement about medicine, and about a specific against influenza. It could not be supposed that after you have left off using it you are still to be protected for ever, as if there was to be a stamp set upon your forehead that you were never to catch influenza because you had once used the carbolic smoke ball. I think the immunity is to last during the use of the ball. That is the way in which I should naturally read it, and it seems to me that the subsequent language of the advertisement supports that construction. It says: "During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand carbolic smoke balls were sold, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using" (not, "who had used") "the carbolic smoke ball," and it concludes with saying that one smoke ball will last a family several months (which imports that it is to be efficacious while it is being used), and that the ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. I, therefore, have myself no hesitation in saying that I think, on the construction of this advertisement, the protection was to enure during the time that the carbolic smoke ball was used. My brother the lord justice who preceded me, thinks that the contract would be sufficiently definite if you were to read it in the sense that the protection was to be warranted during a reasonable period after use. I have some difficulty myself on that point; but it is not necessary for me to consider it further, because the disease here was contracted during the use of the carbolic smoke ball.

Was it intended that the £100 should, if the conditions were fulfilled, be paid? The advertisement says £1000 is lodged at the bank for that purpose. Therefore, it cannot be said that the statement that £100 would be paid was intended to be a mere puff. I think it was intended to be understood by the public as an offer which was to be acted upon.

But it was said there was no check on the part of the persons who issued the advertisement, and that it would be an insensate thing to promise £100 to a person who used the smoke ball unless you could check or superintend his manner of using it. The answer to that argument seems to me to be that if a person chooses to make extravagant promises of this kind he probably does so because it pays him to make them, and, if he has made them, the extravagance of the promises is no reason in law why he should not be bound by them.

It was also said that the contract is made with the world,—that is, with everybody,—and that you cannot contract with everybody. It is not a contract made with all the world. There is the fallacy of the argument. It is an offer made to all the world; and why should not an offer be made to all the world which is to ripen into a contract with anybody who comes forward and performs the condition? It is an offer to become liable to any one who, before it is retracted, performs the condition, and, although the offer is made to the world, the contract is made with that limited portion of the public who come forward and perform the condition on the faith of the advertisement. It is not like cases in which you offer to negotiate, or you issue advertisements that you have got a stock of books to sell, or houses to let, in which case there is no offer to be bound by any contract. Such advertisements are offers to negotiate, offers to receive offers, offers to chaffer, as, I think, some learned judge in one of the cases has said. If this is an offer to be bound, then it is a contract the moment the person fulfills the condition. * * *

Then it was said that there was no notification of the acceptance of the contract. One cannot doubt that, as an ordinary rule of law, an acceptance of an offer made ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together. Unless this is done, the two minds may be apart, and there is not that consensus which is necessary according to the English law—I say nothing about the laws of other countries—to make a contract. But there is this clear gloss to be made upon that doctrine, that as notification of acceptance is required for the benefit of the person who makes the offer, the person who makes the offer may dispense with notice to himself if he thinks it desirable to do so, and I suppose there can be no doubt that where a person in an offer made by him to another person, expressly or impliedly intimates a particular mode of acceptance as sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the other person to whom such offer is made to follow the indicated method of acceptance; and if the person making the offer, expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating acceptance of it to himself, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification. * * *

Now, if that is the law, how are we to find out whether the person who makes the offer does intimate that notification of acceptance will not be necessary in order to constitute a binding bargain? In many cases you look to the offer itself. In many cases you extract from the character of the transaction that notification is not required, and in the advertisement cases it seems to me to follow as an inference to be drawn from the transaction itself that a person is not to notify his acceptance of the offer before he performs the condition, but that if he performs the condition notification is dispensed with. It seems to me that from the point of view of common sense no other idea could be entertained. If I advertise to the world that my dog is lost, and that anybody who brings the dog to a particular place will be paid some money, are all the police or other persons whose business it is to find lost dogs to be expected to sit down and write a note saying that they have accepted my proposal? Why, of course, they at once look after the dog, and as soon as they find the dog they have performed the condition. The essence of the transaction is that the dog should be found, and it is not necessary under such circumstances, as it seems to me, that in order to make the contract binding there should be any notification of acceptance. It follows from the nature of the thing that the performance of the condition is sufficient acceptance without the notification of it, and a person who makes an offer in an advertisement of that kind makes an offer which must be read by the light of that common sense reflection. He does, therefore, in his offer impliedly indicate that he does not require notification of the acceptance of the offer. * * *

Here, * * * if you once make up your mind that there was a promise made to this lady who is the plaintiff, as one of the public,—a promise made to her that if she used the smoke ball three times daily for a fortnight and got the influenza, she should have £100,—it seems to me that her using the smoke ball was sufficient consideration. I cannot picture to myself the view of the law on which the contrary could be held when you have once found who are the contracting parties. If I say to a person, "If you use such and such a medicine for a week I will give you £5," and he uses it, there is ample consideration for the promise. * * *

⁴⁸ "The proposition is stated by Chitty * * * that if the one party never was bound on his part to do the fact which forms the consideration for the promise of the other, the agreement is void for want of mutuality (Chitty Contr. 15); but the proposition is too broadly stated. It is confined to those cases where the want of mutuality would leave one party without a valid or available consideration for his promise (Arnold v. Mayor of Poole, 4 Man. & Gr. 860). For there are many valid contracts not mutually binding at the time when made; as where A says to B, if you will furnish goods to C I will pay for them. B is not bound to furnish them, but if he does he may recover on the promise (2 Saund. 137h; Matoon v. Burr, 7 Ad. & E. 19; Kennaway v. Treleavan, 5 M. & W. 498)." Edmonds, J., in L'Amoreux v. Gould, 7 N. Y. 349, 350-351 (1852).

"If there was an agreement, purporting to be made in reference to the defendant's sale of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property in the form of an offer that the defendant might, if he chose, refrain from paying the note, and from taking measures to secure payment of it out of the proceeds of

POST v. ALBERT FRANK & CO.

(Supreme Court, Appellate Term, 1912. 75 Misc. 130, 132 N. Y. Supp. 807.)

Action by Lyman D. Post against Albert Frank & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, after a trial without a jury, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The action was brought to recover the price alleged to have been agreed to be paid for certain advertising under the following order:

"New York City, Aug. 20, 1909.

"Publisher Paper Mill & Wood Pulp News, New York: Please insert the following order:

Order Number	Client.	Title of Advertisement.	Space.	Time.	Position.	Rate.
3898		Schlisische Cellulose etc.	5 in.	every 3 weeks for 15 beg. at once	Good.	$229.50 less 2% cash 15 days "Important: If rate or space is incorrect, write us at once and we will be governed according to your acceptance. Copies of each publication must be forwarded same day adv. appears.

"Yours very truly,

Albert Frank & Co., per F. R."

After certain insertions had been made, defendant undertook to cancel the order. Plaintiff denied defendant's right so to do, and now sues for the full amount stated in the order, less a sum conceded to have been paid.

The order being for a definite and fixed sum and for a specific number of advertisements of insertions, it must be deemed, in view of the language used, to have been accepted in toto by the commencement of the advertisement, and that plaintiff thereby undertook to complete it. Having become a binding bilateral contract, defendant could not cancel it without plaintiff's consent. The part performance of an order for a definite number of insertions and for a definite amount necessarily implies an acceptance and an agreement to complete, as, unless completed, nothing would be earned. Mendell v. Willyoung, 42 Misc. Rep. 210, 85 N. Y. Supp. 647; Humphreys Mfg. Co. v. David Williams Co., 70 Misc. Rep. 354, 128 N. Y. Supp. 680. Cases such as White v. Allen Kingston Motor Car Co., 69 Misc. Rep. 627, 126 N. Y. Supp. 150, are not in the mortgaged property, and that the plaintiff would look to the property alone for the payment of it, and the defendant, relying upon the offer, did refrain from making any effort to have the property applied to the payment of the note when it became due, and thereby suffered detriment, there would be a sufficient consideration for the agreement. It would be an ordinary case of a unilateral contract growing out of an offer of one party to do something if the other will do or refrain from doing something else. If the party to whom such an offer is made acts upon it in the manner contemplated, either to the advantage of the offeror or to his own disadvantage, such action makes the contract complete, and notice of the acceptance of the offer before the action is unnecessary." Knowlton, J., in First National Bank v. Watkins, 154 Mass. 385, 387-8 (1891).

conflict with this rule, as there the part performance implied only an acceptance of the offer to pay according to the insertions. See Per Curiam opinion in North Side News Co. v. Michael Cypres, 132 N. Y. Supp. 806.

IN THE MATTER OF KELLY.

FOSTER, J.⁴⁴ This application is based on the 247th section of the Act concerning Crimes and Punishments, Rev. Stat., 294, and the payment of the reward sought to be recovered is resisted on several grounds.

* * * The application sets forth that the selectmen of the town offered a reward of $200 to any person or persons who should make discovery and give information against the person or persons guilty of the crime of burning the barn of Mrs. Hepzibah Kelly, October 1st, 1865, so that he or they might be tendered to justice and convicted; that the applicant made discovery and gave information against one Nathaniel B. Goodrich, who was guilty of the crime mentioned, so that he was tendered to justice and convicted before the Superior Court on the third Tuesday of December, 1868. * * * The claim that the right to this reward is barred by lapse of time since the advertisement was published is not well founded.

The case of Loring v. City of Boston, 7 Met., 409, is not applicable. The reward offered in that case was not for the discovery and punishment of crimes already committed; it was wholly prospective, being "for the ⁴³ In American Publishing Co. v. Walker, 87 Mo. App. 503 (1901), the order signed and duly accepted read:

"It is agreed that the American Publishing and Engraving Company will not be held responsible for any provisions not embodied in writing herein, and that this contract cannot be cancelled without the written consent of the said company.

"The American Publishing and Engraving Company, Syndicate Department, 146 to 150 Nassau Street, and 2 to 6 Spruce Street, New York: You are hereby authorized to furnish the undersigned for my exclusive use one cut and no duplicate and reading matter weekly to illustrate the merchant tailor business in the city of Springfield, State of Missouri, only, for the term of one year from the commencement of service, and until notified in writing to discontinue same, for which I agree to pay to your order at New York, the sum of seventy-five cents and postage for each cut, and twenty-five cents and postage for each duplicate at the end of each calendar month; matter sent is not to be duplicated to any other concern in my line of business in Springfield, Missouri.

apprehension and conviction of any person who shall set fire to any building within the limits of the city." The advertisement was first published on the 26th of May, 1837, and was continued for about a week. In January, 1841, three years and eight months after, there was a fire within the city set by an incendiary, which consumed several buildings. The plaintiff caused the guilty party to be arrested, and he was tried and convicted. On suit brought to recover the reward, the only question was whether said offer of reward continued to be in force at the time of the fire. Chief Justice Shaw, who gave the opinion of the court, said it was manifest that the offer, though not limited in terms, could not have been intended to be perpetual, or to last ten or twenty years, or more; it must have been understood to have some limit. There being no limit in terms, by a general rule of law it must be limited to a reasonable time, and as the court thought three years and eight months not a reasonable time, under the circumstances, they gave judgment for defendants. We make no question as to the entire correctness of this decision, and readily assent to the soundness of the principles on which it rests.⁴⁵

But the case at bar is of a totally different character. Here, a reward was offered to any one who should make a discovery and give information, &c., as to a crime committed on a previous day, especially pointed out. The offer, it is true, is not limited in its terms as to time, but the statute of limitations, which is applicable to the crime in question, necessarily restricts the offer to the period within which the delinquent must be informed against and prosecuted, three years next after the offense was committed. So long as the statute of limitations continued to run against the offender, so long would this offer of a reward hold good. As soon as the statute becomes a bar to the prosecution, all liability to pay the reward of course ceases, for the conviction of the offender is an event necessarily antecedent to the payment of the reward.

We think the petitioner is entitled to recover; and the Superior Court is advised to render judgment in his favor.⁴⁶

⁴⁵ In Loring v. City of Boston, cited supra, the action was to recover a reward of $1000 under an offer which recited as the occasion of its offer "the frequent and successful repetition of incendiary attempts," which necessitated "that the most vigorous efforts should be made to prevent their occurrence." While the offer covered future as well as past attempts, it might well have been construed as limited to attempts fairly to be deemed within the reign of crime then taking place.

⁴⁶ "Whether an offer remains open is a question of fact. Of course the proffer may limit the time for acceptance, as every man has the right to dictate the terms upon which he will sell his property. Where an answer by return mail is requested, or may be expected from the usage of trade, or nature of the business, the making of the offer is accompanied by an implied stipulation that the answer shall be immediate. But unless the time is limited, the proposition is open until it is accepted or rejected, provided an answer is given in a reasonable time." Smith, J., in Kempner v. Cohn, 47 Ark. 519, 525-526 (1886).

FERRIER v. STORER.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1884. 63 Ia. 484, 19 N. W. 288, 50 Am. Rep. 752.)

Action upon an account. The defendant pleaded a general denial. He also, by way of counter-claim, pleaded that the plaintiff was indebted to him for interest on money loaned, for the use of certain land, for money paid to remove an incumbrance from land purchased of plaintiff, for labor and lumber furnished plaintiff, and for an overpayment for land. There was a trial to a jury, and verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant for $208.65. The plaintiff appeals.

ADAMS, J.⁴⁷ * * * The instruction given is in these words: "The letters given in evidence—the one from plaintiff to defendant [dated Lincoln, May 1, 1871], proposing to defendant to use defendant's money in plaintiff's hands and allow him interest at the rate of ten per cent, and the other from defendant to plaintiff [dated Depere, Wis., May 29] accepting the proposal or consenting to plaintiff's use of the money,—if written by the respective parties, would constitute a written contract between them as to that matter binding on both, unless the plaintiff immediately, on the receipt of the defendant's letter, gave notice to the defendant that he had withdrawn his offer or declined to accept the money as a loan." The giving of this instruction is assigned as error. * * *

In the instruction the court ruled, in effect, that the acceptance became binding upon the parties unless the plaintiff immediately notified the defendant that he had withdrawn his offer. The rule now supported by the great preponderance of authority, and almost, if not quite universally adhered to, is that when a proposal is accepted by letter the contract is choose to assent to it; meaning, although it is not so expressed, if you choose to assent to it in a reasonable time. * * * It is an implied term in such an offer that you shall within a reasonable time and promptly, accept it." Lord Chancellor Cranworth in Meynell v. Surtees, 25 L. J. Ch. 257, 259-260 (1856).

"The better opinion is, that what is, or is not, a reasonable time, must depend upon the circumstances attending the negotiation, and the character of the subject matter of the contract, and in no better way can the intention of the parties be determined. If the negotiation is in respect to an article stable in price, there is not so much reason for an immediate acceptance of the offer, and the same rule would not apply as in a case where the negotiation related to an article subject to sudden and great fluctuations in the market. * * *

"It seems clear that the intention of the plaintiff, in making the offer by telegraph, to sell an article which fluctuates so much in price, must have been upon the understanding that the acceptance, if at all, should be immediate, and as soon after the receipt of the offer as would give a fair opportunity for consideration. The delay here [24 hours] was too long, and manifestly unjust to the plaintiff, for it afforded the defendant an opportunity to take advantage of a change in the market, and accept or refuse the offer as would best subserve its interests." Nelson, J., in Minnesota Linseed Oil Co. v. Collier White Lead Co., 4 Dillon 431, 435-436, Fed. Cas. No. 9635 (1876).

deemed to become complete when the letter is mailed, provided the offer is standing and the acceptance is made within a reasonable time. Moore v. Pierson, 6 Iowa 292; Mactier's Adm'rs v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103; Brisban v. Boyd, 4 Paige 17; Tayloe v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co., 9 How. 390; Hallock v. Ins. Co., 2 Dutch. 268; Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681; Potter v. Sanders, 6 Hare 1. The contract is deemed complete when the letter is mailed, because the mailing constitutes the overt act by which the acceptance is manifested. In Hallock v. Ins. Co., supra, Vrendenburgh, J., speaking of the overt act by which acceptance is manifested, said: "The overt act may be as various as the form and nature of contracts. It may be by the fall of the hammer, by words spoken, by letter, by telegraph. * * * The acceptor can no more overtake and countermand his letter mailed than he can his words of acceptance after they have issued from his lips." And he adds: "The bargain, if struck at all, must be eo instanti with such overt act. Mailing a letter containing an acceptance, or the instrument itself, intended for the other party, is certainly such overt act." Such we believe to be the well-recognized doctrine as to the point of time when a contract made by correspondence is deemed complete. It will be seen that the rule is sharply defined. The instruction given seems to us to be a departure from it. It assumes that the contract in the case at bar was not necessarily complete when the letter of acceptance was mailed, and that no contract would have been made if the plaintiff immediately upon the receipt of the letter had notified the defendant that the offer was withdrawn. The departure from the recognized rule must have been deemed called for upon the ground that the letter of acceptance was not mailed within a reasonable time. * * * The court doubtless assumed the rule to be that a contract by correspondence is not completed by the mailing of the letter of acceptance where that is not done within a reasonable time. In this the court was unquestionably correct. * * *

Taking this to be the rule, we have to inquire whether an acceptance, after the time limited, or, in the absence of an express limitation, after the lapse of a reasonable time, imposes upon the person who made the offer any obligation. The theory of the court below seems to have been that it does. But in our opinion it does not. The offer, unless sooner withdrawn, stands during the time limited, or, if there is no express limitation, during a reasonable time. Until the end of that time the offer is regarded as being constantly repeated. Chit. Cont. (11th Ed.) 17. After that there is no offer, and, properly considered, nothing to withdraw. The time having expired, there is nothing which the acceptor can do to revive the offer, or produce an extension of time. * * *

As to whether the letter of acceptance was mailed within a reasonable time, we have to say that the burden was upon the defendant, who sets up the contract, to show that it was. We have already seen that the letter of acceptance was dated four weeks later than the letter containing the offer. One was dated at Lincoln and the other at Depere. These were probably the postoffices of the respective parties. But as to where they are, there is no evidence, and we do not take judicial notice of such matters. Neither is the character of the mail communication shown. We could not say that four weeks was not an unreasonable time, unless we could say so upon a state of facts the most favorable to the plaintiff which we could assume. But it would be useless to go into any such inquiry. It is immaterial as to when the defendant's letter was dated. The question is as to when it was mailed, and on that we find no evidence whatever. In our opinion, therefore, the instruction was erroneous, and not without prejudice. * * *

MACTIER'S ADMINISTRATORS, APPELLANTS, AND FRITH, RESPONDENT.

(New York Court of Errors, December, 1830. 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262.)

Appeal from Chancery. At New York, in the autumn of 1822, the respondent and Henry Mactier, the intestate, agreed to embark in a ⁴⁸ In Phillips v. Moor, 71 Me. 78, 80 (1880) Barrows, J., for the court, said:

"It is true that an offer, to be binding upon the party making it, must be accepted within a reasonable time. Peru v. Turner, 10 Maine 185. But if the party to whom it is made, makes known his acceptance of it to the party making it, within any period which he could fairly have supposed to be reasonable, good faith requires the maker, if he intends to retract on account of the delay, to make known that intention promptly. If he does not, he must be regarded as waiving any objection to the acceptance as being too late."

It has been suggested that "More exactly from an analytical standpoint the last clause should read 'if he does not wish his silence to be construed as an acceptance of the counter-offer contained in the late acceptance.'" 1 Williston on Contracts, § 93, p. 175. But is not the real point that in determining what is a reasonable time the action of the one sending the acceptance and the silence of the one receiving it, showing that both think the offer open for acceptance, are facts to be considered? Just as in Mactier v. Frith, post, the fact that the offeror regarded his offer as still open could properly be considered by the court in determining whether more than a reasonable time for its continuance had elapsed.

In Morrell v. Studd, [1913] 2 Ch. 648, it was held that negotiations as to security subsequent to acceptance of an offer to purchase an interest in a lease for part cash and the rest secured to the vendor's satisfaction might be deemed to constitute an agreement implied by conduct to treat the acceptance as in time, though it had to be given in a lunar month (28 days) and may not have been given in that time but was given in a calendar month. Asbury, J., said: "I think I am entitled to hold (subject to the question of the Statute of Frauds) that there was an agreement upheld by the defendant's conduct and the circumstances of the case either to enlarge the time for acceptance or to treat the actual acceptance as a proper acceptance" (pp. 657-8). See McCarty v. Helbling, 73 Ore. 356 (1914).

commercial adventure, in which they were to be jointly and equally interested. Frith was to direct a shipment of 200 pipes of brandy from France to New York, to be consigned to Mactier, who was to ship to Frith at Jacmel, in St. Domingo, provisions to the amount of the invoice cost of the brandy, and the respondent was to place the shippers of the brandy in funds by shipments of coffee to France, in French vessels, and the parties were to share equally in the result of the speculation all around.

In pursuance of this arrangement, Frith, on the 5th September, 1822, wrote Firebrace, Davidson, & Co., a mercantile house at Havre, to ship 200 pipes of brandy to New York to the consignment of Mactier. On the 24th of December, Frith, who had returned to Jacmel, where he did business as a merchant, wrote a letter to Mactier on a variety of subjects, in which was contained a paragraph in these words: "I also have the pleasure of handing you copies of Messrs. Firebrace, Davidson, & Co.'s letters regarding the brandy order. By-the-bye, as your brother, before I left New York, declined taking the interest I offered him in this speculation, and wishing to confine myself in business as much as possible, so as to bring my concerns to a certain focus, I would propose to you to take the adventure solely to your own account, holding the value to cover the transaction to my account in New York." On the 17th January, 1823, Mactier wrote to Frith, acknowledging the receipt of his letter of the 24th ult.; thanks him for sending the copy of Firebrace, Davidson, & Co.'s letter on the subject of the brandy order; says that he has received a letter from them, informing that the brandy would be shipped and leave Bordeaux about the 1st of December then past; and adds, "This has been from the first a favorable speculation with me, and am pleased to say it still promises a favorable result; but to render it complete, I am desirous the speculation should go forward in the way first proposed, thereby making it a treble operation. As you have, however, expressed a wish that I should take the adventure to my own account, I shall delay coming to any determination till I again hear from you. The prospect of war between France and Spain may defeat the object of this speculation, as far as relates to the shipment of provisions hence to Hayti, to be invested in coffee for France, in which case I will at once decide to take the adventure to my own account. Our London accounts, down to the 5th of December, speak confidently of a war between France and Spain, —a measure which, if carried into effect, would operate to your disadvantage." Also, "The next arrival from Europe will probably decide the question of peace or war, and I will lose no time in communicating the same to you;" and also, "Let what will happen, I trust you will in no way be a sufferer." On the 7th March, 1823, Frith wrote Mactier, making no other allusion to the last letter of Mactier than the following: "I have received your esteemed favors of the 17th and 31st January, and note their respective contents." [This letter was received by Mactier on the 7th of April. See 1 Paige (N. Y.) 434, 442.] On the twelfth day of March, 1823, the ship La Claire arrived at New York, laden with the brandy in question, and was at the wharf on the morning of the 13th of March. A clerk of Mactier testified that he had a conversation with Mactier about the time the brandy arrived, perhaps the morning after, and Mactier then said he should take it to himself. A merchant of New York also testified that Mactier consulted with him on the subject of some brandy which he expected to arrive; there was some offer for his taking it on his own account, and he appeared inclined to take it. From the state of things, he advised Mactier to take it, and there was a letter drafted by Mactier upon the subject, in which the merchant made some alterations. The letter stated that he, Mactier, should take the brandy to his own account. On the 17th of March, Mactier entered the brandy at the custom-house as owner, and not as consignee, took the usual oath, and gave a bond for the duties. On the twenty-second day of March, he sold 150 pipes of the brandy on the wharf to several commercial houses, and took their notes for the price of the same. The remaining 50 pipes were put in the public store, and remained there in bond, the liquidated duties not having been secured to be paid by Mactier. On the twenty-fifth day of March, Mactier wrote a letter directed to Frith at Jacmel, in which he said: "I have now to advise the arrival of French ship La Claire with the 200 pipes of brandy, and that in consequence of the probability of war between France and Spain, and in compliance with the wish expressed in your regarded favor of the 24th December, and my answer thereto of the 17th January last, I have decided to take this adventure to my own account. I therefore credit you with the amount of the invoice," amounting to $14,254.57. To this letter was attached a postscript, dated the 31st of March. On the twenty-eighth day of March, Frith wrote a letter to Mactier, dated at Jacmel, in which, speaking of the brandy in question, he says: "With regard to this adventure, I would wish to confirm, if altogether satisfactory to you, what I mentioned to you some time ago, and which I omitted to repeat to you in my previous letter, in reply to yours of the 17th of January. I find the more one does in this country, in the present state of trade, the more one's affairs get shackled." Previous to the arrival of these two last letters at their respective places of direction, Mactier was dead, he having departed this life on the 10th of April, 1823. On the 21st of April, Frith again wrote a letter addressed to Mactier, in which he acknowledges the receipt of his letter of the 25th of March, says he has noted its contents, and requests Mactier to charter on his account a staunch, first-class vessel, and send out to Jacmel by her 400 barrels of flour, 150 barrels of pork, 150 barrels of beef, 100 barrels of mackerel, &c., &c. In the meantime, however, Mactier having died, administration of his goods, &c., was granted to A. N. Lawrence and another, who, in May, 1823, gave the requisite bonds to secure the duties on the 50 pipes of brandy which had not been bonded for by Mactier in his lifetime, except by the general bond on entering the goods at the custom-house, and took the 50 pipes from the public store and sold them at public auction.

The respondent, unwilling to come in as a general creditor of Mactier and receive pro rata distribution, on the 1st of April, 1824, filed his bill in the Court of Chancery, alleging that the brandy was shipped from France on his sole account, and that Mactier was only the consignee thereof. The respondent in his bill admits that he proposed to Mactier to become the purchaser of the brandy, but avers that, after the receipt of his letter of the 17th January, he considered him as having declined his proposal and that no other offer was subsequently made by the respondent. He sets forth a letter written to him by Mactier, on the thirteenth day of March, 1823, in which, speaking of the brandy ordered from France, he says: "I am looking daily for its arrival; it is to be regretted the order was not more promptly executed, as the delay I fear will operate to our disadvantage. We have London dates to the 30th January; war between France and Spain may now be considered inevitable; France has recalled her minister, and 100,000 Frenchmen have been ordered to march into Spain." He alleges that the letter of Mactier to him, of the 25th March, was not received until several days after the death of Mactier, and that his letter to Mactier of the 21st April was written in ignorance of the death of Mactier, and that he did not intend thereby, and he conceives he did not finally consummate, the sale as claimed. He avers that the promissory notes, received by Mactier from the purchasers of the 150 pipes of brandy, remained in Mactier's possession at the time of his death, not discounted or passed away; and that the same came into the possession of, and were at maturity collected by, the defendants; that the defendants, by wrongfully and collusively representing themselves as entitled to the 50 pipes of brandy remaining in the public store, obtained possession of and sold the same; and that on the 2d July, 1823, he, by his attorney, claimed of the defendants the part of the shipment or invoice of brandy which remained unsold at the decease of Mactier; and also demanded the proceeds of that part of the invoice sold by Mactier, existing in notes or otherwise, and the proceeds of the part sold by the defendants. The bill concludes by praying an account of the sales of the brandy, and a decree directing the defendants to retain in their hands sufficient of the funds belonging to the estate of Mactier to pay and satisfy the respondent when his accounts shall be settled, and adjudged upon by the court.

The defendants put in their answer, insisting that the brandy on its arrival in the port of New York, was the sole and exclusive property of Mactier; and that the portion thereof which came to their hands at his decease, and the proceeds of that part thereof which was sold by him in his lifetime, and which came to their hands, rightfully belonged to his estate, and was subject to be disposed of in due course of administration.

The cause was heard upon the exceptions [to the master's report] before Chancellor Walworth, who, in March, 1829, * * * decreed that the report be referred back to the master * * * to take and state an account, and report the amount due the complainant, on the principle that he, as survivor, is entitled to the net proceeds of the adventure of brandy, so far as they can be traced and identified, and has a specific lien on the net proceeds of the 50 pipes of brandy sold by the administrators, and on the proceeds of the notes given for the 150 pipes which remained uncollected or not passed away at the time of Mactier's death, or on so much as is necessary to satisfy the balance due complainant for payment and disbursements on account of that adventure, after deducting from those proceeds the balance of the amount paid for duties and expenses, if any, over and above the amount of proceeds of the shipment of brandy which were received by Mactier in his lifetime. From this decree the defendants appealed. For the reasons of the Chancellor for the decree pronounced by him, see 1 Paige 434.

MARCY, J.⁴⁹ The object of the bill filed in this case is to obtain from the administrators of Mactier the proceeds of the 50 pipes of brandy which came to their possession after his death, and the amount of such notes taken on the sale of the 150 pipes on the 22d of March, 1823, as were uncollected and undisposed of at the death of Mactier, or at least so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the balance due the respondent for disbursements on account of the adventure. The question on which the decision in this case, as I apprehend, mainly depends, relates to the alleged sale of the brandy to Mactier. There are many definitions of what constitutes a contract, but all of them are of course substantially alike. Powell states a contract to be a transaction in which each party comes under an obligation to the other, and each reciprocally acquires a right to what is promised by the other. Powell on Cont. 4. In testing the validity of contracts many things are to be considered. The contract that the appellants set up in this case is alleged by the respondent to be deficient in several essential requisites. When that was done which, on the assumption of there being parties capable of contracting, was necessary, as the respondent contends, to complete it, Mactier was dead. If the contract was only in progress of execution, and there remained but a single act to be done to complete it, his death rendered the performance of that act impossible; it suspended the proceedings at the very point where they were when it occurred. * * *

I am now to consider whether there was a contract before Mactier's death, which had the consent of the contracting parties so given and made known as to be binding on them. That a consent is necessary, all agree; but what shall constitute it in a given case, may admit of much diversity of opinion. The consent of the parties in a contract of sale, as explained by Pothier, consists in the concurrence of the will of the vendor to sell a particular thing to the purchaser for a specified price, with the will of the purchaser to buy the same thing for that price. Pothier, Traité du Contrat de Vente, p. 1 § 2, art. 3, No. 31. * * * Although the will of the party making the offer may precede that of the party accepting yet it must continue down to the time of the acceptance. Where parties are together chaffering about an article of merchandise, and one expresses a present willingness to accept of certain terms, that willingness is supposed to continue, unless it is revoked, to the close of their interview and negotiation on the same subject; and if during this time, the other party says that he will take the article on the terms proposed, the bargain is thereby closed. * * *

Where the negotiation between the contracting parties, residing at a distance from each other, is conducted, as it usually is, by letters, it is necessary, in order that their minds may meet, that the will of the party making the proposition to sell should continue until his letter shall have reached the other, and he shall have signified, or at least had an opportunity to signify, his acceptance of the proposition. This Pothier holds to be the legal presumption, unless the contrary appears. His language is: Cette volonté est présumée tant qu'il ne paraît rien de contraire. This doctrine, which presumes the continuance of a willingness to contract after it has been manifested by an offer, is not confined to the civil law and the codes of those nations which have constructed their systems with the materials drawn from that exhaustless store-house of jurisprudence; it is found in the common law; indeed, it exists of necessity wherever the power to contract exists in parties separated from each other. The rule of the common law is, that wherever the existence of a particular subject-matter or relation has been once proved, its continuance is presumed till proof be given to the contrary, or till a different presumption be afforded by the nature of the subject-matter. 16 East, 55; Stark. Ev. 1252. The case of Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681, proceeds upon and affirms the principle, that the willingness to contract thus manifested is presumed to continue for the time limited, and, if that be not indicated by the offer, until it is expressly revoked or countervailed by a contrary presumption. In that case it was said, "The defendants must be considered in law as making, during every instant of time their letter was travelling, the same identical offer to the plaintiffs; and then the contract is complete by the acceptance of it by the latter." * * *

All the authorities state a contract, or an agreement (which is the same thing), to be aggregatio mentium. Why should not this meeting of the minds, which makes the contract, also indicate the moment when it becomes obligatory? I might rather ask, is it not, and must it not be, the moment when it does become obligatory? If the party making the offer is not bound until he knows of this meeting of minds, for the same reason the party accepting the offer ought not to be bound when his acceptance is received, because he does not know of the meeting of the minds; for the offer may have been withdrawn before his acceptance was received. If more than a concurrence of minds upon a distinct proposition is required to make an obligatory contract, the definition of what constitutes a contract is not correct. Instead of being the meeting of the minds of the contracting parties, it should be a knowledge of this meeting. It was said on the argument, that if concurrence of minds alone would make a valid contract, one might be constructed out of mere volitions and uncommunicated wishes; I think such a result would not follow. The law does not regard bare volitions and pure mental abstractions. When it speaks of the operations of the mind, it means such as have been made manifest by overt acts; when it speaks of the meeting of minds, it refers to such a meeting as has been made known by proper acts; and when thus made known it is effective, although the parties who may claim the benefit of, or be bound by a contract thus made, may for a season remain ignorant of its being made. * * * I think I am therefore warranted in saying that the proposition may be considered as established, that the acceptance of a written offer of a contract of sale consummates the bargain, provided the offer is standing at the time of the acceptance.

What shall constitute an acceptance will depend in a great measure upon circumstances. The mere determination of the mind, unacted on, can never be an acceptance. Where the offer is by letter, the usual mode of acceptance is the sending of a letter announcing a consent to accept; where it is made by a messenger, a determination to accept, returned through him, or sent by another, would seem to be all the law requires, if the contract may be consummated without writing. There are other modes which are equally conclusive upon the parties: keeping silence, under certain circumstances, is an assent to a proposition; any thing that shall amount to a manifestation of a formed determination to accept, communicated or put in the proper way to be communicated to the party making the offer, would doubtless complete the contract; but a letter written would not be an acceptance, so long as it remained in the possession or under the control of the writer.⁵⁰ An acceptance is the distinct

But Professor Ashley qualifies this case by supplying a condition going to performance under the contract as follows:

"Thus where the offer and acceptance are read to surrounding friends, al-act of one party to the contract, as much as the offer is of the other; the knowledge, by the party making the offer, of the determination of the party receiving it, is not an ingredient of an acceptance. It is not com-though the contract arises it is fairly to be implied that mailing a reply promptly is a condition precedent in the contract. Unless this condition happens, the original offeror is not compelled to perform the promise into which his offer has ripened." Ashley on Contracts, p. 38.

See Trounstone & Co. v. Sellers, 35 Kan. 447 (1886). There the plaintiffs, of Cincinnati, Ohio, had sold on credit to Moore & Weaver of Ottawa, Kansas, certain clothing and a dispute arising as to the terms of credit, Moore & Weaver offered to return the goods they had not sold and pay for the rest and expressed the hope that they would hear from the plaintiffs soon. The plaintiffs did not answer but, soon after Moore & Weaver's letter was received, John W. Harper, one of the plaintiffs, started on a business trip, intending to go to Ottawa after attending to some important matters. A month after Moore & Weaver wrote their offer, Mr. Harper reached Ottawa and found that the day before his arrival Moore & Weaver had mortgaged the clothing to creditors who had put defendant in charge. The defendant refused to yield possession, so plaintiffs replevied the goods. Johnston, J., for the court, said:

"The right of possession to the clothing in controversy depends upon whether the proposition made to the plaintiffs by Moore & Weaver on November 16th, 1884, was accepted and became a contract before the execution of the mortgages by Moore & Weaver to their creditors on the 15th day of December, 1884. * * *

"If the plaintiffs intended to accept the proposal it was their duty to have signified their acceptance, either through the mails or by some equally expeditious means. The plaintiffs say that they determined to accept the proposition as soon as the offer was received, and that Mr. Harper's act in starting to Ottawa was an overt act amounting to an acceptance. Every overt act caused by a determination to accept a proposition does not constitute an acceptance. If it was the intention of the plaintiffs to accept the offer, they could and most likely would have written Moore & Weaver a letter, which was the usual mode of communication between the parties, and which is the usual mode of accepting an offer made by letter. Instead of sending a letter or telegram announcing a determination to accept, one of them started on a business trip through the country, intending finally to come to Kansas and take the goods, which trip consumed almost thirty days' time, during which time they were at liberty to change their purpose and reject the proposition. The mere determination to accept, an offer does not constitute an acceptance which is binding on the parties. 'The assent must either be communicated to the other party, or some act must have been done which the other party has expressly or impliedly offered to treat as a communication.' (Benjamin on Sales, 54.) Where parties are distant, and the contract is to be made by correspondence, the writing of a letter or telegram containing a notice of acceptance is not of itself sufficient to complete a contract. In such a case the act must involve an irrevocable element, and the letter must be placed in the mail, or the telegram deposited in the office for transmission, and thus placed beyond the power or control of the sender, before the assent becomes effectual to consummate a contract; and not then, unless the offer is still standing. The action of the plaintiffs in sending a member of the firm by a circuitous route to Kansas, was no more than a mere mental assent, which, as we have seen, is insufficient. There was no act of acceptance until Harper arrived at Ottawa and demanded the goods. This was not within a reasonable time, and when the proposition was not met pounded of an assent by one party to the terms offered, and a knowledge of that assent by the other.

I will now apply this law to the facts of this case. Frith's offer to within a reasonable time, Moore & Weaver were at liberty to regard their proposition as rejected, and to make other disposition of their property, which they manifestly did do."

See Beckwith v. Cheever, 21 N. H. 41 (1850) where plaintiff said he would accept an offer to cut and take timber if he could get his brother to assist him and the offeror said that plaintiff could give a decided answer later. Gilchrist, C. J., said: "The plaintiff did not notify Bellows, nor did he enter upon the land. He did nothing but engage his brother to assist him. It cannot with propriety be said that this, not brought home to the knowledge of Bellows, can be regarded as an acceptance."

In Cleveland, etc. Rwy. Co. v. Shea, 174 Ind. 303 (1910) an action on an alleged contract to pay a contractor's debt to plaintiff in consideration of plaintiff's refraining from filing a mechanic's lien. Monks, C. J., said: "Appellee may have had it in mind to claim a lien upon the property, he may have had it in mind that appellant's letter to him of February 17 was an offer to pay his claim if he would not file a lien upon the work for such claim, and he may have had it in mind to accept said offer, but if so he announced none of these mental processes to appellant. In order that the mental conclusion of one party to an alleged contract shall affect the other party, such conclusion must be communicated to the party who is to be affected by it; or if it be the mere acceptance of a distinct proposal, the acceptance must be put by the party accepting, in a proper channel to be communicated to the party making the offer" (p. 309). See also O'Donnell v. Clinton, 145 Mass. 461, 463 (1888).

In Brogden v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 2 App. Cas. 666, at pp. 691-2 (1877), Lord Blackburn said: "Mr. Justice Brett, referring to the case of Ex Parte Harris (In re Imperial Land Company of Marseilles, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 587), before the Lords Justices, and other cases, says that, looking to all this, he has come 'to a strong opinion that the moment one party has made a proposition of terms to another, and it can be shewn by sufficient evidence that the other has accepted those terms in his own mind, then the contract is made, before that acceptance is intimated to the proposer.' And he goes on to say, applying that to the present case, that, to his mind, as soon as Burnett put the letter into his drawer, a contract was made, although none was formally entered into.

"My Lords, I must say that that is contrary to what my impression is, and that I cannot agree in it. If the law was as intimated by Mr. Justice Brett, there would be nothing to discuss in the present case. But I have always believed the law to be this, that when an offer is made to another party, and in that offer there is a request express or implied that he must signify his acceptance by doing some particular thing, then as soon as he does that thing, he is bound. If a man sent an offer abroad saying: I wish to know whether you will supply me with goods at such and such a price, and, if you agree to that, you must ship the first cargo as soon as you get this letter, there can be no doubt, that as soon as the cargo was shipped the contract would be complete, and if the cargo went to the bottom of the sea, it would go to the bottom of the sea at the risk of the orderer. So again, where as in the case of Ex Parte Harris, supra, a person writes a letter and says, I offer to take an allotment of shares, and he expressly or impliedly says, if you agree with me send an answer by the post, there, as soon as he has sent that answer by the post, and put it out of his control, and done an extraneous act which clenches the matter, and shews beyond all doubt that each side is bound, I agree the contract is perfectly plain and clear.

sell his interest in the brandy certainly continued till his letter of the 24th of December was received at New York, and Mactier had a fair opportunity to answer it. If the answer of the 17th of January had contained an unqualified acceptance, the bargain would have been closed when it was sent away for Jacmel; but the offer was not then accepted. There was a promise to accept upon a contingency; for Mactier says, after alluding to the prospect of a war between France and Spain, "in which case," that is, in case of such war, "I will at once decide to take the adventure to my own account." This concluded nothing. If the event had actually happened, and Frith had insisted on enforcing this conditional acceptance, it would not have been in his power to do so. The most that Mactier said was, that if an expected event happened, he would do an act which would complete the bargain. The happening of the event could not, without the act, complete it. The Roman law regarded the tense of the verb used by the contracting parties to determine whether the bargain was concluded: Verbum imperfecti temporis rem adhuc imperfectum significat. There is a wide difference between a promise to give an assent to a proposition for a contract on the happening of a contingency, and the annunciation of a present assent to it. If the expected event happens, and the act promised is performed, the bargain is closed; but it is the promised

"But when you come to the general proposition which Mr. Justice Brett seems to have laid down, that a simple acceptance in your own mind, without any intimation to the other party, and expressed by a mere private act, such as putting a letter into a drawer, completes a contract, I must say I differ from that. It appears from the year books that as long ago as the time of Edward IV (17 Edw. IV., T. Pasch case, 2), Chief Justice Brian decided this very point. The plea of the defendant in that case justified the seizing of some growing crops because he said the plaintiff had offered him to go and look at them, and if he liked them, and would give 2s. 6d. for them, he might take them; that was the justification. That case is referred to in a book which I published a good many years ago, Blackburn on Contracts of Sale, page 190, et seq., and is there translated. Brian gives a very elaborate judgment, explaining the law of the unpaid vendor's lien, as early as that time, exactly as the law now stands, and he consequently says: 'This plea is clearly bad, as you have not shewn the payment or the tender of the money;' but he goes further, and says (I am quoting from memory, but I think I am quoting correctly), 'moreover, your plea is utterly naught, for it does not show that when you had made up your mind to take them you signified it to the plaintiff, and your having it in your own mind is nothing, for it is trite law that the thought of man is not triable, for even the devil does not know what the thought of man is; but I grant you this, that if in his offer to you he had said, Go and look at them, and if you are pleased with them, signify it to such and such a man, and if you had signified it to such and such a man, your plea would have been good, because that was a matter of fact.' I take it, my Lords, that that which was said 300 years ago and more, is the law this day, and it is quite what Lord Justice Mellish in Ex Parte Harris, supra, accurately says, that where it is expressly or impliedly stated in the offer that you may accept the offer by posting a letter, the moment you post the letter the offer is accepted. You are bound from the moment you post the letter, not as it is put here, from the moment you make up your mind on the subject."

acceptance, and not the happening of the event, that gives validity to the contract. If, in this case, the offer of Frith had been to Mactier to take the brandy on the happening of a French and Spanish war, and Mactier had promised to decide to take it in such an event, the simple fact of his taking it after the war would have enabled Frith to treat him as the purchaser of it. Such an act would have been a valid acceptance; but a conditional acceptance of an unconditional offer, followed up by acts of the acceptor, after the condition was fulfilled on which the acceptance depended, might not be considered as completing the bargain, without the acquiescence of the party making the offer in those acts, because the minds of the parties would not have met on the precise terms of the contract.

To conclude the bargain, Mactier must have accepted the offer as tendered to him by Frith, and that acceptance must have been while the offer, in contemplation of law, was still held out to him. That there was an acceptance, or rather that Mactier did all that was incumbent on him to do to effect an acceptance was not denied; but it was insisted, on the part of the respondent, that it was made after the offer was withdrawn. It will be necessary to consider when this acceptance took place, as preparatory to settling the fact of the continuance of the offer down to that time. There is not the slightest evidence of the determination on the part of Mactier to take the brandy before the seventeenth day of March; * * * but if the situation of the parties was changed, and Frith was now endeavoring to set up the contract, I am at a loss to conceive how Mactier's representatives could withstand the force of the facts which took place on the 17th of March. In answer to the offer, Mactier delayed coming to a determination thereon, but promised to accept it if there should be a war; on the 17th of March, when that event was considered settled, he entered the brandy as his own property, and told his clerk that he had determined to take it. But if there should be any doubt as to the effect of this conduct, there can be none as to his subsequent acts. By a letter dated the 25th, with a postscript of the 31st of March, he accepts the offer. This letter was immediately transmitted to Frith, and as soon as the 28th of March entries were made in his books, showing that he had become the purchaser. Enough was done by the 31st to constitute an acceptance of Frith's offer and to complete the bargain, if the offer can be considered as standing till that day.

An offer, when once made, continues, as I have heretofore shown, to the satisfaction of my own mind at least, until it is expressly revoked, or until circumstances authorize a presumption that it is revoked. The offer itself may show very clearly when the presumption of revocation attaches. Where it is made to be replied to by return mail, the party to whom it is addressed must at once perceive that it is not to stand for an acceptance to be transmitted after the mail. If an offer stands until it is expressly withdrawn, or is presumed to be withdrawn, whether it is held out to a party at a particular period or not, is a matter of fact. Then we are to determine, as a matter of fact, whether Frith's offer was held out for Mactier's acceptance until the 31st of March; if Frith intended it should stand so, and he viewed himself as tendering it to Mactier down to that time, we are bound to regard it as standing, unless his intention was the result of the fraudulent conduct of Mactier. The acts of Frith, after the death of Mactier, could do nothing towards completing an unfinished contract; but I think they may be fairly adverted to for the purpose of ascertaining his intentions in relation to the continuance of his offer. On the 7th of March he acknowledges Mactier's letter of the 17th of January, which did not decline, as it has been construed to do, the offer, but apprised him that it was kept under advisement; and by using the expression, "noting the contents," Frith is, I think, to be understood as yielding to the proposed delay. If a doubt as to this construction of that letter could spring up in the mind, it would be at once removed by the perusal of the letter of the 28th of the same month. In that he expresses a wish to confirm what he had said in the letter making the offer to sell, and declares that he had in a previous letter, which must mean that of the 5th, omitted to communicate the same thing. In answering Mactier's letter which contained the acceptance of his offer, he recognizes the bargain as closed, and gives directions as to investing the proceeds of the brandy. All the subsequent correspondence acquiesces in the sale. It appears to me to be impossible to say, after reading the letters of Frith written subsequent to his knowledge of Mactier's acceptance, that he did not consider the offer as held out to Mactier down to the time when it was accepted, and the bargain closed by that acceptance; and I think we must adjudge it to have been closed, unless the agreement was nugatory by reason that the thing to which it related had not an actual or potential existence when the contract was consummated. * * *

The decree of the Chancellor was accordingly reversed with costs.⁵¹

⁵¹"Langdell, Summary, sec. 14, suggests that in this case no promise was necessary, because a debt would arise on Mactier's acceptance of the brandy; but the writer believes that such an acceptance necessarily involves a promise to pay, in fact, and that without such a promise the offeror did not intend title to pass." AVERILL AND ANOTHER v. HEDGE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1838. 12 Conn. 424.)

This was an action of assumpsit, alleging that the defendant, who conducted business at Wareham, Mass., under the name of the "Washington Iron Company," promised to deliver to the plaintiffs a quantity of rods, shapes, and band-iron, in March, 1836.

The whole correspondence between the parties was read in evidence; the substance of which was as follows:—

HARTFORD, 29th February, 1836. DEAR SIR,—Regarding the future disposal of your nails as settled, it would be improper to importune you further on that point. Perhaps, however, you will not object to sending us a supply of rods and shapes for our spring sales. Please to say on what terms you will send us ten or fifteen tons, assorted, by first packet in the spring. We shall also be glad to purchase our hollow ware of you on the same terms as heretofore. Shall be pleased to hear from you soon. [Signed, "J. & H. AVERILL," the plaintiffs; and addressed to JOHN THOMAS, Esq.]

WAREHAM, 2d March, 1836. On the writer's return from the South last evening, he found your favor of the 29th ult., to which we now reply. We will deliver to you in Hartford ten or fifteen tons of rods, shapes, and band-iron, as follows: say—shapes and band-iron, at $110 per gross ton, six months; and old sable rods, at $116, six months. Old sable iron is now quick at $110 per ton in Boston; and there is but very little iron there at any price. We will deliver you at Hartford a common assortment of hollow ware, at $28 per ton, six months. [Signed "WASHINGTON IRON COMPANY, per JOHN THOMAS, Agent;" and addressed to the plaintiffs.]

HARTFORD, 14 March, 1836. DEAR SIR,—We have bought of Ripley & Averill their stock of hollow ware, with the understanding that we were to receive the benefit of their orders given you last July. The balance of this order we believe was in readiness last fall; but, owing to the early closing of our navigation, was not shipped. Will you ship us this lot of ware by first packet, on terms then agreed on with R. & A.? Please advise us by return mail if we may expect it. [Signed by plaintiffs, and addressed to JOHN THOMAS, Esq.]

WAREHAM, March 14, 1836. DEAR SIRS,—Your favor of the 14th inst. is at hand, and contents noted. We shall most cheerfully comply with your request to ship to you the balance of Ripley & Averill's order of hardware, not filled in consequence of the early frost last autumn; such being the understanding between yourselves and Mr. Ripley. We learn from our neighbors, engaged in the manufacture of this article, that they now hold it at $30 per ton, and shall not sell it at a less price through the season; and consequently we shall not consider ourselves holden to the offer made to you on the 2d inst., unless you signify your acceptance thereof by return mail, but shall furnish the balance of Ripley & Averill's order in conformity with the contracts made with them.

Do you accept of our proposal for supplying you with rods, shapes, and band-iron; and if so, what quantity of each shall we send you? [Signed, "WASHINGTON IRON COMPANY, per JOHN THOMAS, Agent;" and addressed to the plaintiffs.]

HARTFORD, March 19th, 1836. DEAR SIR,—Your favor of the 17th came to hand last evening, too late to be answered before this morning. We note and duly appreciate your prompt assent to send us the balance of R. & A.'s order for hollow ware, at old prices. In our future purchases of that article, we will buy of you at $28 per ton, six months, as offered in your favor of the 2d. We will also take the following shapes, &c., on your terms there given: 160 bundles of new sable or Swedes, different shapes, specified; also 40 bundles smaller shapes, to be of old sable, assorted; 120 bundles band-iron, assorted; 60 bundles half-inch spike rods; 200 bundles P S I horse-nail rods, or a ton, if convenient, in 28lb. bundles, sending 5 tons in all. [Signed by the plaintiffs, and addressed to JOHN THOMAS, Esq.]

In a letter dated March 21st, 1836, addressed to John Thomas, Esq., the plaintiffs alter their order for band-iron, varying the sorts.

WAREHAM, April 2d, 1836. Your favors of the 19th and 21st reached here in the absence of the writer. We regret that you had not sooner signified your acceptance of our proposition of the 2d of March, touching supplies of shapes, band-iron, &c., as we had, prior to the reception of your favors above alluded to, entered into such engagements in other markets as rendered it impossible for us to supply you with those articles on any terms. [Signed "WASHINGTON IRON COMPANY, per JOHN THOMAS, Agent;" and addressed to the plaintiffs.]

On the 6th of April, 1836, the plaintiffs addressed a letter to the defendant's agent, remonstrating against his conduct in refusing to send them the iron ordered. The defendant's agent replied, by a letter dated the 8th of April, as follows:—

On 29th February you ask our terms for 10 or 15 tons of rods and shapes. On 2d March we give them to you per mail. On 14th March you again address us upon another subject; but although our proposition, in ordinary course of mail, must have been in your hands 10 to 12 days, yet no allusion was made to it. On 16th, after replying to yours of 14th, we ask if you accede to our proposition of the 2d. After this, we waited for your reply until the 22d, when, not having heard from you, we made such other arrangements as made it impossible for us to fill your orders of the 19th or 21st, both which came together in the same mail on 23d. We did not intend the question proposed to you in ours of 16th as a renewal of our proposals of the 2d ult., nor do we believe that it will bear that construction; but nevertheless we should have filled your order had it been seasonably received.

This correspondence was conducted through the mail; upon the part of the defendant, by his avowed agent, John Thomas, and by the plaintiffs themselves on their part. The plaintiffs resided in the city of Hartford, near the post-office.

The letter written by the defendant on the 16th of March, dated 14th, arrived at Hartford on the 18th of March, about 2 o'clock p. m. The plaintiff's answer to the letter, dated the 19th of March, was post-marked the 20th; and the letter written by the plaintiffs on the 21st of March was post-marked on the day of its date; and both letters arrived at Wareham at the same time, viz., on the 23d of March.

The plaintiffs claimed that during said month of March the price of the article, which was the subject of controversy, was constantly advancing in the market; and that they had sustained loss in their business by the non-compliance of the defendant with his contract.

The defendant introduced a witness to prove that letters mailed at Hartford for Wareham were, by the usual course of mail, sent by Providence, and would reach that place on the evening of the day after leaving Hartford,—but might be sent by Boston; although, when sent by Boston, on the days that both mails went, a letter would be one day longer in reaching Wareham; that a mail was sent every day from Hartford to Boston, and every day but Sunday from Hartford to Providence; that the Providence mail usually left the post-office in Hartford about 5 o'clock every morning, except Sunday, when no mail was sent, and Monday, when it left about 10 o'clock a. m. The mails were, in the course of business, closed one hour before they left the office. Upon the 19th of March, 1836, the Providence mail left the office at 25 minutes past 5 o'clock in the morning, and on the 21st at 6 minutes past ten in the morning. The 20th was Sunday; and letters put into the office on Saturday evening and on Sunday evening would be forwarded by the same mail. The usual course of business at the post-office in Hartford was to stamp or post-mark all letters, not on the day they were forwarded, but the day they were received into the office,—unless received after 9 o'clock in the evening, when they were post-marked as of the succeeding day.

Upon the facts so proved and disclosed in the correspondence, the plaintiffs claimed that the proposal of the defendant, in his letter of the 2d of March, to furnish the plaintiffs with rods, shapes, and band-iron, was renewed by his letter written 16th of March, and dated 14th; and that the plaintiffs, by their answer of the 19th of March, in due time signified their assent to the proposal therein contained; and thus was the contract stated in the declaration completed.

These claims of the plaintiffs were all resisted and denied by the defendant.

The court charged the jury, that in mercantile transactions of this character, affected as they must be by the constant fluctuations of markets, the utmost promptitude must be exacted consistent with a due regard to ordinary business; and that if the letter written by the plaintiffs, accepting the proposal of the defendant relative to said rods, bands, &c., was not delivered into the post-office in Hartford before the day it was post-marked, viz., the 20th of March, it was not sent in such reasonable time as to make their acceptance obligatory upon the defendant.

A verdict was thereupon returned for the defendant; and the plaintiffs moved for a new trial.

BISSELL, J.† * * * The great question in the case is, whether upon these facts there has been such an acceptance of the defendant's offer as that he is bound by it.

The jury were instructed that if the letter written by the plaintiffs, accepting the proposal of the defendant, was not delivered into the post-office at Hartford until the 20th of March, it was not sent in such reasonable time as to make their acceptance obligatory on the defendant.

Several questions, not immediately growing out of the charge, but which, if decided in favor of the defendant, make an end of the case, have been much discussed at the bar.

1. It has been contended that the proposal of the defendant, in his letter of the 2d, was not renewed by his letter of the 16th of March. Upon this point no opinion was given by the judge on the circuit, unless an opinion may be inferred from the ground on which he rested the case in his instructions to the jury. Nor is it essential that a decided opinion on the question should be expressed by this court; because there are other grounds on which we are unanimously of opinion that the ruling of the judge below must be sustained.

Were this, however, a turning point in the case, we should probably be prepared to say that the defendant's letter of the 16th of March does contain a distinct renewal of his former proposal. His language is certainly very strong to show that such was his intention. He says: "Do you accept of our proposal for supplying you with rods, shapes, and band-iron; and if so, what quantity of each shall we send you?" Now we cannot but think that the fair and obvious construction of this language is that the defendant then stood ready to supply the articles upon the terms already specified.⁵³ And such appears to have been his own view of the case, as is manifest from his subsequent letter of the 8th of April.

2. It has been urged, that admitting this letter to contain a renewal of the former proposal, yet by the terms of it, the plaintiffs were bound to signify their acceptance by return of mail. The question, in this aspect of it, is manifestly independent of any mercantile usage. That the defendant had a right to attach this condition to his offer is undeniable. The question is, whether he has done so; and whether such is the true construction of his letter.

In his letter of the 2d of March, the defendant had offered to supply the plaintiffs an assortment of hollow ware at certain prices; and in regard to this offer, in his letter of the 16th, he says: "We shall not consider ourselves holden to the offer made you on the 2d inst., unless you signify your acceptance thereof by return of mail;" and he then puts the inquiry with regard to rods, shapes, and band-iron, that has been already mentioned. Now, it should be borne in mind, that the defendant's proposal, in regard to these articles, had already been before the plaintiffs for at least ten or twelve days; and one claim put forth by them on the trial was, that during the month of March the price of these articles was constantly advancing in the market. The question then arises, whether under these circumstances it was the intention of the defendant to give them further time; and whether such intention can be fairly inferred from the language of his communication. In regard to the hollow ware, there can be no question. The plaintiffs were positively required to signify their acceptance by return of mail. And when, in the same letter and under similar circumstances, they are also required to decide upon the proposal in regard to the rods, &c., it is certainly not easy to see why the defendant should have made, or should have intended to make, a distinction between these classes of articles. Had the judge directed the jury that the defendant was not bound, unless the plaintiffs signified their acceptance by return of mail, we are by no means satisfied that the direction would have been wrong. As, however, he placed the case on grounds more favorable to the plaintiff's claim, a decision upon ⁵³ "We think we may paraphrase the observation of Dr. Paley and say that each letter should be taken in that sense in which the writer apprehended at the time that the recipient understood it. Id. [1 Chit. Con.] 104. Another and important canon of construction is that the writings should be so construed, if possible, as to effectuate the manifest purpose of the parties to come together in an agreement; that such a construction should be adopted, if possible, as to constitute an agreement rather than defeat an agreement. * * * We must not be unmindful of the rule that a written instrument is to be taken most strongly against the writer, but this being a rule of some strictness and rigor, the established doctrine is that it is the last to be resorted to—a rule never to be relied upon except where other rules of construction fail." Pitney, J., in Empire Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Morris, 73 N. J. L. 602, 610 (1905).

this point is unnecessary. Any further discussion of it is therefore waived.

3. We come then to the inquiry, whether the instruction actually given to the jury is correct in point of law. And here it may be remarked, that it is very immaterial when the letter of the plaintiffs was written: until sent, it was entirely in their power and under their control, and was no more an acceptance of the defendant's offer than a bare determination, locked up in their own bosoms and uncommunicated, would have been. And it surely will not be claimed that mere volitions, a mere determination to accept a proposal, constitute a contract. The plaintiffs then did not accept the defendant's proposition until the 20th, and for aught that appears [did not accept] until the evening of that day. That they were bound to accept within a reasonable time was distinctly admitted in the argument; and if not admitted, the position is undeniable. The case of the plaintiffs then comes to this, and this is the precise ground of their claim: That they had a right to hold the defendant's offer under advisement for more than forty-eight hours, and to await the arrival of three mails from New York, advising them of the state of the commodity in the market; and having then determined to accept, the defendant was bound by his offer; and that this constitutes a valid mercantile contract. Now, in regard to such a claim, we can only say, that it appears to us to be in the highest degree unreasonable; and that we know of no principle, of no authority, from which it derives the slightest support.

Indeed, it seems to us to be subversive of the whole law of contracts. For it is most obvious, that, if during the interval the defendant was bound by his offer, there was an entire want of mutuality: the one party was bound, while the other was not. Had the proposition been made at a personal interview between the parties, there can be no pretense that it would have bound the defendant beyond the termination of the interview. * * *

An offer then, made through a letter, is not continued beyond the time that the party has a "fair opportunity" to answer it. This is substantially the doctrine of the charge. And it is not only highly reasonable, but is supported by all the analogies of the law. Once establish the principle that a party to whom an offer is made may hold it under consideration more than forty-eight hours, watching in the mean time the fluctuations of the market, and then bind the other party by his acceptance, and it is believed that you create a shock throughout the commercial community, utterly destructive of all mercantile confidence. No offers would be made by letter. It would be unsafe to make them.

It is only necessary to apply these principles to the case before us; and their application is exceedingly obvious. The proposal of the defendant, which had already been several days before the plaintiffs, was renewed early on the afternoon of the 18th. They show no act done by them signifying their acceptance, until the evening of the 20th. Was this within a reasonable time? Was this the first fair opportunity of manifesting their acceptance? We think this can hardly be claimed. Had the defendant had an agent in Hartford, through whom the offer was made, might the plaintiffs thus have delayed the communication of their acceptance to him? This would not be pretended. And can it vary the principle, that the offer, instead of being thus made, was made through the agency of the post-office? Had the offer of the defendant been promptly accepted, information of the acceptance would have reached the defendant on the evening of the 20th, in due course of mail. He waited until the 22d; and hearing nothing from the plaintiffs, he then virtually retracted his offer, by making such arrangements as made it impossible for him to fill their order. We think he was fully justified in so doing; and that upon every sound principle the rule in this case must be discharged.

New trial not to be granted.

HYDE v. WRENCH.

(Court of Chancery, 1840. 3 Beavan, 334.)

This case came on upon general demurrer to a bill for specific performance, which stated to the effect following:

The defendant being desirous of disposing of an estate, offered, by his agent, to sell it to the plaintiff for £1200, which the plaintiff, by his agent, declined; and on June 6th the defendant wrote to his agent as follows: "I have to notice the refusal of your friend to give me £1200 for my farm; I will only make one more offer, which I shall not alter from—that is, £1000 lodged in the bank until Michaelmas, when title shall be made clear of expenses, land tax, etc. I expect a reply by return, as I have another application." This letter was forwarded to the plaintiff's agent, who immediately called on the defendant; and, previously to accepting the offer, offered to give the defendant £950 for the purchase of the farm, but the defendant wished to have a few days to consider.

On June 11th the defendant wrote to the plaintiff's agent as follows: "I have written to my tenant for an answer to certain inquiries, and the instant I receive his reply will communicate with you, and endeavor to conclude the prospective purchase of my farm. I assure you I am not treating with any other person about said purchase."

The defendant afterward promised he would give an answer about accepting the £950 for the purchase on June 26th; and on the 27th he wrote to the plaintiff's agent, stating he was sorry he could not feel disposed to accept his offer for his farm at Luddenham at present.

This letter being received on June 29th, the plaintiff's agent on that day wrote to the defendant as follows: "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant informing me that you are not disposed to accept the sum of £950 for your farm at Luddenham. This being the case, I at once agree to the terms on which you offered the farm—viz., £1000 through your tenant, Mr. Kent, by your letter of the 6th instant. I shall be obliged by your instructing your solicitor to communicate with me without delay, as to the title, for the reason which I mentioned to you.”

The bill stated that the defendant “returned a verbal answer to the last-mentioned letter, to the effect, he would see his solicitor thereon;” and it charged that the defendant’s offer for sale had not been withdrawn previous to its acceptance.

To this bill, filed by the alleged purchaser for a specific performance, the defendant filed a general demurrer.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS, [LORD LANGDALE]. Under the circumstances stated in this bill, I think there exists no valid binding contract between the parties for the purchase of the property. The defendants offered to sell it for £1000, and if that had been at once unconditionally accepted, there would undoubtedly have been a perfect binding contract; instead of that, the plaintiff made an offer of his own, to purchase the property for £950, and he thereby rejected the offer previously made by the defendant. I think that it was not afterward competent for him to revive the proposal of the defendant, by tendering an acceptance of it; and that, therefore, there exists no obligation of any sort between the parties; the demurrer must be allowed.⁵²

⁵² In Minneapolis, &c. Railway v. Columbus Rolling Mill, 119 U. S. 149 (1886), where defendant offered to sell 2000 to 5000 tons of iron rails and plaintiff first sent an order for 1200 tons and then, when notified that defendant could not book that order at the price of an order for 2000 tons, tried to accept, Gray, J., said:

“The defendant, by the letter of December 8th, offered to sell to the plaintiff two thousand to five thousand tons of iron rail on certain terms specified, and added that if the offer was accepted the defendant would expect to be notified prior to December 20th. This offer, while it remained open, without having been rejected by the plaintiff or revoked by the defendant, would authorize the plaintiff to take at his election any number of tons not less than two thousand nor more than five thousand, on the terms specified. The offer, while unrevoked, might be accepted or rejected by the plaintiff at any time before December 20. Instead of accepting the offer made, the plaintiff on December 16, by telegram and letter, referring to the defendant’s letter of December 8, directed the defendant to enter an order for twelve hundred tons on the same terms. The mention, in both telegram and letter, of the date and the terms of the defendant’s original offer, shows that the plaintiff’s order was not an independent proposal, but an answer to the defendant’s offer, a qualified acceptance of that offer, varying the number of tons, and therefore in law a rejection of the offer. On December 18, the defendant by telegram declined to fulfil the plaintiff’s order. The negotiations between the parties was thus closed, and the plaintiff could not afterwards fall back on the defendant’s original offer.

NEER v. LANG.

(Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1918. 252 Fed. 575, 164 C. C. A. 491.)

Suit by William A. Neer against Frank R. Lang to recover damages in the amount of $17,000 for the breach of an alleged contract to sell plaintiff 20 shares of the capital stock of a corporation known as the Saxon Motor Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

ROGERS, J. The right to maintain this action depends upon whether a contract was ever made as alleged. The plaintiff relies on certain cor-

The plaintiff's attempt to do so, by the telegram of December 19, was therefore ineffectual and created no rights against the defendant."

But a genuine though unsuccessful attempt to accept in writing may not preclude a subsequent valid oral acceptance. "The evidence also warranted the judge in finding as a fact that, in addition to the unsuccessful attempt to accept it in writing, the plaintiff through its president verbally instructed the broker to accept it and ratified his action in accepting it when notified that he had done so. There is nothing inconsistent in the plaintiff's accepting a written offer both by word of mouth and in writing. And if it turns out that, through an unguarded expression in the writing, the writing is not, although it was intended to be, an acceptance, the oral acceptance which is not open to that objection is good. The difficulty with the defendant's argument here is that in it he assumes that, if there is an attempt to make a written acceptance of a written offer, the result is the same as it is when the parties have reduced their agreement into a written contract. That assumption however is a mistake. When one attempts to accept in writing an offer made in writing there is no mutual agreement that certain specific written words shall stand as a statement of the trade ultimately struck between them. The question and the sole question is: Did the person to whom the offer was made accept it? A dozen unsuccessful attempts to accept it do not affect the validity of one which is successful, at any rate where the intention in case of all the attempts was to accept it." Loring, J., in Metropolitan Coal Company v. Boutell Transf. & Towing Co., 196 Mass. 72, 82-3 (1907).

And of course, a mere inquiry as to whether the offeror will insert different terms in his offer is not a conditional acceptance or counter offer. Stevenson v. McLean, 5 Q. B. D. 346 (1880).

"It is certain that an acceptance which varies from the offer will not conclude a contract. Davenport v. Newton, 71 Vt. 11, 21, 42 Atl. 1087. But the reply may go beyond the terms of the proposal without qualifying the acceptance. The addition may be such as fairly to import a request instead of a condition. In determining what one party intended and the other ought to have understood, regard must be had to the situation and purpose of the parties and the subject-matter and course of the negotiations." Munson, J., in Purington v. Grimm, 83 Vt. 466, 469-470 (1910).

In Turner v. McCormick, 56 W. Va. 161 (1904) where the owner of land executed to the plaintiff two options of sale of a vein of coal underlying two separate tracts of land under which the plaintiff was given until a certain time "to accept the coal," the plaintiffs' notice of acceptance read:

"Morgantown, W. Va., Feb. 21, 1902. Mr. William McCormick: I hereby notify you that your coal will be accepted according to terms of the option given to me on same and respectfully request you to make delivery of deed, respondence which passed between defendant and himself, and which he claims constituted a contract, and involves a breach. The plaintiff on October 9, 1915, received the following letter from the defendant:

"Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, Oct. 7, 1915.

"Wm. A. Neer & Co., Detroit—My Dear Mr. Neer: Will you keep me posted on the Saxon Motor common market. Would like to buy 10 or 15 shares at around 300, subject to confirmation, or would sell 20 shares at 400, subject to previous sale.

"Sincerely, [Signed] F. R. Lang, Major, U. S. Army."

with abstract of title, to me, in Morgantown, W. Va., on Saturday, June 28th, 1902, hour and place to be decided later. Yours truly, E. D. Turner."

In holding that the letter constituted an acceptance of the offer of sale, rather than a promise to accept, and that the request that the deed with abstract of title, be delivered at the time and place mentioned, did not make the acceptance conditional, the court reviewed the cases at length, Poffenbarger, P., writing the opinion, and said that the review "seems to establish the following propositions: First, a request for a change or modification of a proposed contract, made before an acceptance thereof, amounts to a rejection of it; second, a mere inquiry as to whether the proposer will alter or modify its terms, made before acceptance or rejection, does not amount to a rejection, and, if the offer be not withdrawn before acceptance made within a reasonable time, the offer becomes a binding contract; third, a request, suggestion, or proposal of alteration or modification, made after unconditional acceptance, and not assented to by the opposite party, does not affect the contract put in force and effect by the acceptance, nor amount to a breach thereof, giving right of rescission; fourth, acceptance of a formal and carefully prepared option of sale of land, within the time by it allowed, and according to its terms, although accompanied by a request for a departure from its terms as to the time and place of performance, is an unconditional acceptance, and converts the option into an executory contract of sale, provided the request be not so worded as to limit or qualify the acceptance."

So a mere suggestion that one ought to change the terms of the proposed contract, even though made before the acceptance, does not amount to a rejection of the offer. Foster v. West Publishing Co., (Okla.) 180 Pac. 1083 (1920). So objections to certain provisions of the offer and an expression of opinion that the offeror should not ask such conditions will not prevent the acceptance from being unqualified if a favor only is being sought. Bleicher v. Miller, 40 Okla. 374 (1914).

"Suppose, in reply to an offer by A, B writes: 'I shall want to consider your offer for more of the time which you have allowed me for that purpose because I am so situated now that I cannot return an immediate answer. However, the situation is such that if you want to settle the matter at once, I will close with you now at 5% less than the price you name.' It seems clear that A could conclude a contract by accepting the lower price, but this reply should not, under ordinary circumstances, be held to terminate the original offer." Herman Oliphant, The Duration and Termination of an Offer, 18 Mich. L. Rev. 201, 209.

"Does a rejection in the ordinary sense of that term always terminate an offer? Suppose the offerer says when making an offer, 'I expect you to reject this offer upon first consideration, but I want you to consider it further because I think you will accept when you have thought about it a while.' The

The plaintiff, upon the receipt of the letter, sent the following telegram to defendant:

"Western Union Telegram.

"10—9—1915.

"To Major F. R. Lang, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas: We accept twenty Saxon at four hundred ship with draft attached and wire when you have done this.

"Wm. A. Neer & Co."

This telegram plaintiff followed with a letter as follows:

"10—9—1915.

"Major F. R. Lang, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas—Dear Sir: Upon receipt of your letter offering us 20 Saxon Motor common at 400, we immediately wired you as follows: 'We accept 20 Saxon at 400 ship with draft attached and wire when you have done this.' We trust we will receive your confirmation on this transaction very soon.

"Very truly yours,

Wm. A. Neer & Co."

The defendant, upon receipt of plaintiff's telegram, sent to plaintiff the following letter:

offeree immediately sends a rejection which the offeror ignores. On further thought, the offeree sends an acceptance. It is believed the courts would hold the offeror bound. He has been taken at his word. His objective will be decisive. Possibly it may be useful to confine the term, rejection, to a meaning more limited than its ordinary one." Id., 209, n.

On "right" to accept offer after submitting counter proposition, see L. R. A. 1915D, 145, note.

A question has been raised, not settled by authority, as to when a rejection by mail or telegram to an offer by the same means of communication takes effect. See Clarence D. Ashley, Must the Rejection of an Offer be Communicated to the Offeror? 12 Yale L. J. 419; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 52. It would seem as if an outright rejection would take effect when mailed or telegraphed, but as if a counter-offer is not a counter-offer and therefore not an effective implied rejection until received. See dictum in Harris v. Scott, 67 N. H. 437, 439 (1893) to the effect that the offeror authorizes the means of communication for an unqualified answer; but under the doctrine of Henthorn v. Fraser, reported ante, p. 106, what the offeror intends is not of primary importance and courts agreeing with that decision conceivably might hold the counter-offer effective as a rejection when mailed though not effective as an offer until received. As Professor Williston has said: "It may seem odd to suggest the possibility that a letter containing a rejection of an offer and also a new offer might become effective as to the rejection immediately, but as to the offer not until communication was complete; but if it is remembered that a letter revoking one offer and accepting another unquestionably takes effect at two different times there will seem less reason for surprise. The acceptance and revocation, however, though in the same letter are two distinct things whereas the counter-offer is itself the rejection." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 52, p. 89, n.

"Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, October 9, 1915.

"Wm. A. Neer & Co., Detroit—Gentlemen: Saxon stock sold before receipt of your telegram. Seems to be much demand for it. Think I may be able to locate ten and possibly twenty-five shares more. What is best offer you would make for this and for how long a period is bid open?

"Very truly,

[Signed] F. R. Lang, Major, U. S. Army."

The statement in the above letter, "Saxon stock sold before receipt of your telegram," plaintiff claims was false, and was made with the purpose of taking advantage of the condition in his letter of October 7th that the offer there of 20 shares at 400 was subject to previous sale. The court below held that the correspondence disclosed no contract and dismissed the complaint.

If a contract exists, it is to be found in the letter of October 7th and the telegram of October 9th. The letter contains an offer to "sell 20 shares at 400, subject to previous sale." The telegram "accepts twenty Saxon at four hundred." If nothing more had been added, a valid contract would have resulted, provided the defendant had not previously sold the shares. But the telegram contained something more, and that was, "Ship with draft attached and wire when you have done this." This imported a new item into the acceptance and prevented a contract from being made. Every agreement is the result of an offer and an acceptance thereof. An offer must not be uncertain or ambiguous, and it was not in this case as respects the 20 shares of Saxon, for it is not impossible for a court to say just what the language used meant. But an acceptance is required to be identical with the offer, or there is no meeting of the minds, and no agreement; and in this case the offer and the acceptance are not identical.

Every trade or business has its usages, and persons who make offers relating thereto assume that all the customary incidents of such callings shall be part of the agreement, and they do not need to be expressly stated in the written or oral offer, as the law implies them. The law implies that the place of delivery of the stock shall be at the place of the seller, nothing appearing to the contrary; that is to say, in this case the place of delivery under the offer as made was Ft. Leavenworth, Kan. But under the acceptance delivery was to be made at Detroit, Mich., where plaintiff resided. The law implies from the terms of the offer that payment was to be made in cash on delivery at Ft. Leavenworth. But the acceptance provided for a payment by draft on delivery at Detroit. The defendant was required to part with possession of his stock before actual payment.

In Cameron v. Wright, 21 App. Div. 395, 47 N. Y. Supp. 571, an offer was made to sell stock at 33 cents on the dollar, subject to the right to sell to other parties. The alleged acceptance was in a telegram reading, "I accept offer; 33 for all your stock; draw three days' sight draft with stock attached." This was held to be a variance from the offer, and the interposition of a term not embraced in the original offer, and therefore not binding. And see Greenwalt v. Este, 40 Kan. 418, 19 Pac. 803; Sharp v. West (D. C.) 150 Fed. 458; Lacey v. Thomas (C. C.) 164 Fed. 623.

As there was no contract, and therefore no right to sue for a breach, the other questions raised need not be considered.

⁵⁴ "The vendee in his letter of acceptance may not attach any condition to such acceptance, even to the extent of undertaking to dictate the place where payment shall be made. If his attempted acceptance is coupled with any condition that varies or adds to the offer to sell, it is not an acceptance, but is in reality a counter proposition." Barnes, J., in Curtis Land & Loan Co. v. Interior Land Co., 137 Wis. 341, 345-6 (1908).

In Seymour v. Armstrong, 62 Kans. 720 (1901), in an attempted acceptance of an offer to supply defendants eggs by the case, plaintiff added: "The eggs are all packed in new No. 2 white wood cases and I will accept fifteen cents each for them or you can return them or new ones in place of them." The court said that this acceptance "affixed conditions not comprehended in the proposal" in that it "required the defendants" to pay for the cases or return them or new ones, whereas by the usages of the business the cases went with the eggs, and hence, the acceptance not being unconditional, there was no contract.

"An acceptance incorporating a term, condition, or reservation not embraced within the terms of the offer is equivalent to a rejection." Aspinall, J., in Stanley v. Gannon, 180 N. Y. Supp. 602, 606 (1919).

"Where an offer is made by one party, and the other annexes a condition to his acceptance, there is no completed contract till the party making the first offer assents to the condition." Allen, J., in Putnam v. Grace, 161 Mass. 237, 245 (1894).

In Corcoran v. White, 107 Ill. 118 (1886) an acceptance of an offer of sale of real property "provided the title is perfect" was held conditional. Compare Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander, [1912] 1 Ch. 284, where an acceptance of an offer of sale of a leasehold house was on condition that the purchaser's solicitors should "approve the title to, and covenants contained in the lease, the title from the freeholder and the form of contract" and where Parker, J., said: "There is some authority for saying that where a purchaser stipulates that his solicitor shall approve the title of the property such stipulation may possibly be construed as a recognition that the title will be examined in the usual way and need not be construed as a condition at all. But such a construction is impossible in this case, for the plaintiff's solicitors have to approve also the freehold title, which cannot be called for on an open contract for the sale of a lease."

"An acceptance which in terms is conditioned on what the law implies is a good acceptance, as it introduces nothing new into the contract. See Anglo-American etc. Co. v. Prentiss, 157 Ill. 506." Rogers, J., in Morse v. Tillotson & Wolcott Co., 253 Fed. 340, 348 (1918). See McCleskey & Whitman v. Howell Cotton Co., 147 Ala. 573 (1906). See also 1 A. L. R. 1508, note.

And it has even been held that adding to an acceptance a demand for some performance to which the acceptor will not be entitled under the contract will not invalidate the acceptance, if it goes only to performance and is not a condition of the acceptance. Horgan v. Russell, 24 No. Dak. 490 (1913).

In Earle v. Angell, 157 Mass. 294 (1892) there was a question whether an oral acceptance did not vary from the oral offer, both occurring on the one occa-

THURBER v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1903. 25 R. I. 60, 54 Atl. 790.)

Assumpsit heard on defendants exceptions.

STINESS, C. J.* The plaintiff gave a mortgage to the defendant for $200, due March 19, 1902. August 1, 1901, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

"Providence, R. I., August 1, 1901.

"Walter Thurber—

"Dear Sir:

"Your mtge. calls for interest less than I generally get, and knowing I can let the money out to better advantage if I could get it in, I am willing to allow you $20 discount, if you can raise the money or find somebody else to take it up this month. I have offered this same com. elsewhere, and give you the same opportunity.

"Very truly,

H. N. Smith."

The plaintiff replied on the 8th day of August, A. D. 1901, by letter: "I would like to accept the offer, and expect to have the money for it in about two weeks."

August 21, 1901, the defendant notified the plaintiff, by letter, that he had sold the mortgage for its face.

August 30, 1901, the plaintiff went to the defendant and offered to pay the $180.00. * * *

Upon these facts the court * * * gave judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $32.00. * * *

The ruling that the plaintiff's letter was not an acceptance was not excepted to by the defendant, being in his favor, and is not before us on exception. It is proper to add, however, for further proceedings in this case, that we think that this ruling was correct. The letter did not accept the offer expressly or impliedly. The words, "I would like to accept," and "expect to have the money for it in about two weeks," imply a willingness to accept, but a doubt as to ability. Suppose, upon the ground of a completed contract for earlier payment, the defendant had sought to foreclose his mortgage or to sue upon the note. The defendant could have urged with much force that he had not accepted the offer, but had simply expressed a desire to do so. An acceptance of an offer must be definite, unambiguous, and unqualified; such as to complete a contract.

In Martin v. Northwestern Co. (C. C.), 22 Fed. 596, an offer of coal upon specified terms was replied to as follows: "Telegram received.

sion, but Holmes, J., said: "But the parties were face to face, and separated seemingly agreed. The jury might well have found, if that was the only question, that the variation, if any, was assented to on the spot" (p. 296).

* Part of the opinion is omitted.

You can consider the coal sold. Will be in Cleveland and arrange particulars next week." This was much more definite than the letter in this case, but it was held that there was no definite contract and acceptance thereof. Brewer, J., said: "It is not 'I accept your offer,' but 'You may consider the coal sold.' It is not, perhaps, a natural expression when a definite acceptance of an offer is intended. It is more equivalent to this: 'There is so little to be settled, and I am so sure that all can be arranged, that you are safe in looking at the sale as closed, and prepare to make your arrangements accordingly.'"

In Potts v. Whitehead, 23 N. J. Eq. 512, to an offer to sell land the reply was: "Have twice attempted the tender of the first payment of $500 upon the agreement made between us on the 7th December last. I will meet you," etc., "when I shall be ready to make tender of the money and execute the proper agreements thereupon." It was held that this letter was not, either in terms or substantially, an acceptance of an offer, and concluded no contract.

In Myers v. Smith, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 614, an offer of malt "delivered on boat" was accepted as "deliverable on boat," and it was held that this was not an acceptance of the offer.

In Havens v. American Co., 11 Ind. App. 315, 39 N. E. 40, the words, "I am prepared to make the arrangement with you," were held not to be an unqualified and unequivocal acceptance.

In Carr v. Duval, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 77, the rule is stated that if it be doubtful whether an agreement has been concluded, or is a mere negotiation, chancery will not decree a specific performance.

In Hutchinson v. Bowker, 5 M. & W. 535, an offer was made of a quantity of good barley, with terms stated. The reply was: "Of such offer we accept, expecting you will give us fine barley and full weight." The jury found that there was a distinction in the trade between good and fine barley, but that it was not applied in the letter in that particular sense. The court held that the meaning was ambiguous, and hence no acceptance. See also, Isham v. Therasson, 53 N. J. Eq. 10; Marschall v. Eisen, 7 N. Y. Misc. 674.

We think the terms of the letter in the case at bar were ambiguous, and so no acceptance, from which it follows that the defendant had the right to revoke his offer, which he did by his notice of sale of the mortgage, and therefore, judgment should have been for the defendant.

Exceptions sustained and case remitted * * * with direction to enter judgment for the defendant.

TINN v. HOFFMAN & CO.

(Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1872. 29 Law Times [N. S.] 271.)

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages in respect of a breach of contract to deliver 800 tons of iron; and by the consent of the parties, and by order of Martin, B., dated May 30th, 1872, the facts were stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer in the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiff, Mr. Joseph Tinn, is an iron manufacturer, carrying on business at the Ashton Row Rolling Mills, near Bristol; and the defendant, who trades under the name and style of Hoffmann & Co., is an iron merchant, carrying on business at Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

2. In the months of November and December, 1871, the following correspondence passed between the plaintiff and the defendant relating to the proposed purchase and sale of certain iron, the particulars of which fully appear in the letters hereinafter set forth:

The plaintiff to the defendant:

22nd Nov., 1871.

Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

"Dear Sirs: Please quote your lowest price for 800 tons No. 4 Cleveland, or other equally good brand, delivered at Portishead at the rate of 200 tons per month, March, April, May, and June, 1872. Payment by four months' acceptance.

Yours truly,

J. Tinn.

3. The defendants' reply:

Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,

24th Nov., 1871.

Joseph Tinn Esq., Bristol:

Dear Sir: We are obliged by your inquiry of the 22d inst., and by the present beg to offer you 800 tons No. 4 forge Middlesbro' pig iron (brand at our option, Cleveland if possible), at 69s. per ton delivered at Portishead, delivery 200 tons per month, March, April, May, and June, 1872, payment by your four months' acceptance from date of arrival.

We shall be very glad if this low offer would induce you to favor us with your order, and waiting your reply by return, we remain, dear sir, yours truly.

A. Hoffmann & Co.

4. The plaintiff to the defendant:

Bristol, 27th, Nov., 1871.

Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

Dear Sirs: The price you ask is high. If I made the quantity 1200 tons, delivery 200 tons per month for the first six months of next year I suppose you would make the price lower? Your reply per return will oblige

J. Tinn.

5. The defendant to the plaintiff in reply:

Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,

28th Nov., 1871.

Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

Dear Sir: In reply to your favor of yesterday, we beg to state that we are willing to make you an offer of further 400 tons No. 4 forge Middlesbro' pig iron, 200 tons in January, 200 tons in February, at the same price we quoted you by ours of the 24th inst., though the rate of freight at the above-named time will doubtless be considerably higher than that of the following months.

Our to-day's market was very firm again, and we feel assured we shall see a further rise ere long.

Kindly let us have your reply by return of post as to whether you accept our offers of together 1200 tons and oblige yours truly,

A. Hoffmann & Co.

6. The plaintiff to the defendant:

Bristol, 28th Nov., 1871.

Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

No. 4 Pig Iron.

Dear Sirs: You can enter me 800 tons on the terms and conditions named in your favor of the 24th inst., but I trust you will enter the other 400, making in all 1200 tons, referred to in my last, at 68s. per ton. Yours faithfully,

Joseph Tinn.

7. The defendants' reply:

Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,

29th Nov., 1871.

Joseph Tinn, Esq.:

Dear Sir: We are obliged by your favor of yesterday, in reply to which we are sorry to state that we are not able to book your esteemed order for 1200 tons No. 4 forge at a lower price than that offered to you by us of yesterday—viz., 69s., and even that offer we can only leave you on hand for reply by to-morrow before twelve o'clock. Waiting your reply, we remain, dear sir, yours truly,

A. Hoffman & Co.

8. On December 1st, 1871, the plaintiff sent a telegram to the defendant, of which the following is a copy:

From Tinn, Ashton.

To Hoffmann & Co., Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

Book other 400 tons pig iron for me, same terms and conditions as before.

And on the same day the plaintiff sent a letter to the defendant, of which the following is a copy:

1st Dec., 1871.

Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

Dear Sirs: I have your favor of the 29th ult. Please enter the remaining 400 tons No. 4 Forge Pig at 69s. ex-ship Portishead, delivery to commence January, 1872, payment by four months' acceptance against delivery. Kindly send me sold note for the 800 and 400 tons, and oblige, yours truly,

J. Tinn.

9. The following correspondence then took place between the plaintiff and the defendants' clerk duly authorized in that behalf.

The defendants' clerk to the plaintiff:

Royal Exchange Building, Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

1st Dec., 1871.

Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

Dear Sir: We have your telegram of this day, "Book other 400 tons Pig iron, same terms and conditions as before," which we note and shall lay before our Mr. Hoffman on his return next week. Yours truly, for A. Hoffman & Co.

C. Jerveland.

10. Memorandum:

2d Dec., 1871.

From A. Hoffmann & Co., Middlesbro'-on-Tees.

To Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

"The contents of your yesterday's favor is noted, and we shall lay same before our principal on his return next week.

11. The defendants to the plaintiff:

The Queen's Hotel, Manchester.

4th Dec., 1871.

Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

Dear Sir: I am in receipt of telegram "Book other 400 tons, same terms and conditions as before," and favor of 1st inst. addressed to my firm, in reply to which I very much regret to state that I am not able to book the 1200 tons in question, as your reply to ours of November 28th and 29th did not reach us within the stipulated time; and as I had other offers for the same lot, I disposed of the latter previous to my leaving Middlesbro' and receiving your decision.

Trusting to be more fortunate in future, I remain, dear sir, yours truly,
A. Hoffman & Co.

12. The plaintiff to the defendant:

5th Dec., 1871.

Messrs. Hoffmann & Co.:

Dear Sirs: I regret you cannot enter me the 400 tons No. 4 Forge Pig on the same terms as the 800 tons. Please send me sold note for 800 tons per return. Yours truly,

J. Tinn.

13. The reply of the defendants:

Royal Exchange Buildings, Middlesbro'-on-Tees,

6th Dec., 1871.

Joseph Tinn, Esq., Bristol:

Dear Sir: Your favor of yesterday to hand, in reply to which we have to state that we cannot send you contract for pig iron, having sold you none.

The quotation for 1200 tons in our respect of 29th ult. was for your acceptance by 12 o'clock the 30th; and failing to receive such we disposed of the iron, being under other offers, as already intimated to you by our Mr. Hoffmann, and it is now utterly impossible for us to book you the quantity you require, or you may rest assured that we willingly would do so. We are, dear sir, yours truly, Pro A. Hoffmann & Co.

C. Jerveland.

14. It is agreed that all the facts and circumstances mentioned in the above correspondence are true, and that the court are to have power to draw all inferences of facts in the same way as a jury might do.

15. The course of post between Bristol and Middlesbrough is one day.

16. The plaintiff contends that he has a binding contract with the defendant whereby the defendants are bound to deliver to him 800 tons of iron. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that there is no such contract, and refuse to deliver any of the said iron.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, first, whether, upon the facts stated and documents set out in the case, there is any binding contract on the part of the defendants to deliver 800 tons of iron to the plaintiff; secondly, whether, upon the facts and documents set out in the case, there is any binding contract on the part of the defendants to deliver any quantity of iron to the plaintiff, and if yea, what quantity and on what terms and conditions.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative on either of these questions, then it has been agreed between the parties in writing in accordance with the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, that the amount of damages for breach of such contract shall be ascertained by reference to an arbitrator to be appointed by the said plaintiff and defendants, or in case of difference by any judge of one of the Superior Courts of Common Law, and judgment for the amount entered up for the plaintiffs with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nol. pros. with costs of defense shall be entered up for the defendants.

A majority of the Court of Exchequer gave judgment for the defendants, whereupon the plaintiff brought error.

HONYMAN, J.⁵⁵ I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and that judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiff in respect of 800 tons. * * * On November 28th, the defendants wrote the following letter, on the construction of which I believe the difference of opinion among the members of the court mainly arises. [Reads letter of that date.] What is the meaning of that letter? It amounts to this: On November 24 we offered you 800 tons for delivery at 69s: we now repeat to you that offer, and in addition to that, we make a further offer of 400 tons more—that is, we renew the offer of November 24th, and we make you a further offer of 400 tons, provided you accept those offers, “by return of post.” That does not mean exclusively a reply by letter by return of post, but you may reply by telegram or by verbal message, or by any means not later than a letter written and sent by return of post would reach us. If that is so, then comes the plaintiff’s letter, written on the same day, November 28th, which crosses the defendants’ letter of the same date, in which the plaintiffs said, “You can enter me 800 tons on the terms and conditions named in your favor of the 24th inst., but I trust you will enter the other 400, making in all 1200 tons, referred to in my last, at 68s. per ton, ex ship Portishead." I cannot agree in the opinion said to have been expressed by my Brothers Pigott and Channell in the court below. As I understand, my Brother Piggott certainly says this is not a clean offer, or a clean acceptance, of 800 tons, but that it is 800 tons on the condition or hope or trust that they would lower the price of the other 400 tons. I cannot accede to that view of the case. I assume that it plainly amounts to this, "I will take your 800 tons on the terms and conditions mentioned in the letter of the 24th inst., but I hope you will let me have the other lot at 68s. per ton; if you choose to do that, well and good." I cannot understand how it can be said that that is not an absolute acceptance of the 800 tons, supposing it was competent to the plaintiff to accept that quantity. In the court below it seems to have been treated as if the offer of November 28th was one offer of 1200 tons. I do not think so. I think it is a repetition of the offer of 800 tons coupled with a further offer of 400 tons, and that it was competent to the plaintiff to accept one and not accept the other. My Brother Bramwell appears to have thought that it was not material to consider whether it was two separate offers of 400 tons and 800 tons, or an offer of 1200 tons, because in either view of the case, the plaintiff could not accept the one and reject the other. If it is to be construed as strictly one offer of 1200 tons, I can understand it, and then of course he could not accept the one and reject the other. But I do not think it is one offer of 1200 tons, nor two offers, one of 400, and the other of 800 tons, but that it is a repetition of the offer of 800 tons, with a further offer of further 400 tons. To say that he could not accept the 400 tons without the 800 tons seems, in my view of the matter, to throw no light on the question whether he might accept the 800 tons without the 400 tons. That being so, it being in my judgment a separate offer of 800 tons, and 400 tons in addition, I should have thought, had the plaintiff's letter of the 28th been written on November 29th that nobody, but for the opinions which have been expressed here today, could have entertained a doubt that it would have been an acceptance. What, then is the effect when the two letters are written on the same day and crossed each other in the post? Does that make any difference? * * * I cannot see why the fact of the letters crossing each other should prevent their making a good contract. If I say I am willing to buy a man's house on certain terms, and he at the same moment says that he is willing to sell it, and these two letters are posted so that they are irrevocable with respect to the writers, why should not that constitute a good contract? The parties are ad idem at one and at the same moment. On these grounds it appears to me that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and ought to be reversed. I speak with some hesitation in this case when I find that the opinion of the majority of my brothers is against me, and also when the question turns entirely on the constrution of a somewhat ambiguously written letter.

BRETT, J. The question is, whether upon a true construction of this correspondence, there is a binding contract between the plaintiff and the defendant for the 800 tons of iron at 69s. It is argued on the one side that such a contract is disclosed because it is said that the defendants' letter of November 24th is an offer for the sale of 800 tons of iron, and this letter of November 28th leaves open the time for accepting that offer of November 24th, and makes a new offer with regard to another 400 tons; and that the defendants' offer of November 24th being thus opened by their letter of the 28th, the plaintiff's letter of the 28th is an acceptance of the defendant's offer of the 24th. On the other side it is argued that the defendants' letter of November 28th is not an opening of their offer of the 24th, but that it is an offer with regard to 1200 tons; and that even if it were a separate offer with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons, still that the true view of the matter is not that it reopens the letter of the 24th, but that it makes a new offer with regard to the 800 tons, and another separate offer, with regard to 400 tons; and that, upon such a view, the renewed offer with regard to 800 tons is not accepted, because the letter of the plaintiff of November 28th was not in answer to that offer, but was a letter crossing it. Now with regard to the construction of the defendant's letter of November 28th, it seems to me that we must consider that the defendant's letter of November 24th is in answer to a request of the plaintiffs of November 22d for an offer with regard to 800 tons, and is therefore an offer by them with regard to 800 tons. That offer left it open to the plaintiff to accept it within a period which is to be computed by the return of post. I agree that the words, "Your reply by return of post" fixes the time for acceptance, and not the manner of accepting. But that time elapsed; there was no acceptance within the limited time. So far from there being an acceptance, it seems to me that the plaintiff's letter of November 27th rejects that offer; it rejects it on the ground that the price is higher than the plaintiff is willing to give. That offer is, therefore, not accepted within the limited time, but is rejected, and it seems to me is at once dead. The letter of the 27th then asks for an offer with respect to 1200 tons, and the letter of November 28th is a letter written "In reply to your favor of yesterday," that is, In reply to your request for an offer with regard to 1200 tons. "I now make you this offer." That seems to me to show that the letter of November 28th of the defendants is an offer with regard to 1200 tons, and not with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons separately. The way in which the offer with regard to the 1200 tons is made is this. "With regard to the first 800 of them, I make you a new offer upon the same terms as I made in the former offer on the 24th. With regard to the remaining 400 tons, I offer you to deliver them at the same price, but at different periods of delivery." I think that the defendants' letter of November 28th, being a letter in answer to a request with regard to 1200 tons, is an offer with regard to 1200 tons, and that no such offer was ever accepted; but even if it could be taken that it was a separate offer with regard to 800 tons and 400 tons, I cannot accede to the view that it reopened the offer of November 24th. That offer was dead, and was no longer binding upon the defendants at all, and therefore it seems to me to be a wrong phrase to say that it reopened the offer of November 24th. The only legal way of construing it is to say that it is a new offer with regard to 800 tons. If it were a separate offer, which I should think it was not, it then would be a new offer with regard to 800 tons, and a separate offer with regard to 400 tons, but, even if it were so, I should think that the new offer with regard to the 800 tons had never been accepted, so as to make a binding contract. The new offer would not, in my opinion, be accepted, by the fact of the plaintiff's letter of November 28th crossing it. If the defendants' letter of November 28th is a new offer of the 800 tons, that could not be accepted by the plaintiff until it came to his knowledge, and his letter of November 28th could only be considered as a cross offer. Put it thus: If I write to a person and say, "If you can give me £6000 for my house, I will sell it you," and on the same day, and before that letter reaches him, he writes to me saying, "If you will sell me your house for £6000 I will buy it," that would be two offers crossing each other, and cross offers are not an acceptance of each other, therefore there will be no offer of either party accepted by the other. That is the case where the contract is to be made by the letters, and by the letters only. I think it would be different if there were already a contract in fact made in words, and then the parties were to write letters to each other, which crossed in the post, those might make a very good memorandum of the contract already made, unless the Statute of Frauds intervened. But where the contract is to be made by the letters themselves, you cannot make it by cross offers, and say that the contract was made by one party accepting the offer which was made to him. It seems to me, therefore, in both views, that the judgment of the court below was right.

BLACKBURN, J. I also think that the judgment should be affirmed.
 * * * If, in answer to that letter of November 28th, written by the defendants to the plaintiff, in which they ask for an answer by return of post, there had been a letter sent saying. "I will accept the 800 tons and not take the 400 tons," and that had been relied upon as a binding contract, and the defendants had resisted that, and said: "We did not offer you 800 tons, we offered you 1200 tons if you would take them, but not 1200 tons that you might split into two quantities, taking the 800 and rejecting the 400 tons," the question would have been raised whether this letter of the defendants, of November 28th, read as it must be read, with the plaintiff's letter of the 27th, was an offer of that sort which my brothers Honyman and Quain think it was, or whether it was,

as the majority of the court have already said, an offer of 1200 tons, and 1200 tons only? I am of opinion that it was an offer of the 1200 tons, and the 1200 tons only. * * * But then there arises another question; on that same November 28th the plaintiff, before he received or knew of the defendants' letter of November 28th, had written a letter which I read to be an offer on his part, "I will take 800 tons, at the price of 69s." That letter crossed the letter of the defendants, and I think my brothers Honyman and Quain, necessarily, as part of their judgment, are of opinion, that that offer crossing the other offer, and being ad idem, according to their construction of the first contract, did make a binding engagement between the parties. It is not necessary in the present case for the Court of Exchequer Chamber to decide that point, and therefore what I am now going to say is not to be considered at all as part of the judgment of the court of error, but as my own individual opinion. When a contract is made between two parties, there is a promise by one, in consideration of the promise made by the other; there are two assenting minds, the parties agreeing in opinion, and one having promised in consideration of the promise of the other—there is an exchange of promises; but I do not think exchanging offers would, upon principle, be at all the same thing. There is, I believe, a total absence of authority on the point.⁵⁶ I do not think, though I am not sure, that the question has ever been raised before. The promise or offer being made on each side in ignorance of the promise or the offer made on the other side, neither of them can be construed as an acceptance of the other.

Judgment of the majority of the court below affirmed.

FARMERS' HANDY WAGON CO. v. NEWCOMB.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1916. 192 Mich. 634, 159 N. W 152.)

The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing silos at Saginaw, and the defendant is a farmer living near Traverse City. On the 8th day of June, 1907, the defendant gave plaintiff a written order for a silo, to be delivered f. o. b. at Saginaw and to be consigned to defendant at Traverse City. The purchase price of the silo was to be $141.21. Below the signature of the defendant to the order was written: "Remarks: This man reserves until Aug. 1, 1907, to reconsider the buying of this silo." On the 14th day of June, 1907, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, accepting the order, and defendant admits receiving the letter. The reason given by defendant for not taking possession of the silo when it was shipped to him is that he canceled the order by a letter written to plaintiff on July 10th. He testified that he mailed the letter to plaintiff's address with postage fully prepaid. Plaintiff denied receiving the letter.

The circuit judge instructed the jury, in substance, that the order, together with the acceptance, made a completed contract, and that upon the shipment of the silo to defendant and its receipt at Traverse City the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff for the agreed purchase price, unless defendant had canceled and retracted the order as he claimed; * * * and that to show a cancellation or retraction of the order it was necessary that the letter of cancellation should not only have been mailed by defendant, but that it should also have been received by, or come to the knowledge of, plaintiff.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant brings the case to this court by writ of error.

PERSON, J.⁵⁷ The trial judge correctly construed the meaning of the underwriting appended to defendant's order. To "reconsider" is defined by Webster as the right "to consider again; review with care, especially with a view to a reversal of previous action; as, to reconsider a determination."

The order with the acceptance by plaintiff became a contract subject to a right, on the part of defendant, to withdraw from it within the time stated. It did not require an express confirmation by defendant.

It was also necessary that notice of the withdrawal or cancellation should have reached plaintiff in order to be effective and sufficient. Anson on Contracts (2d Am. Ed.) 32, 33; 1 Elliott on Contracts, 37, 38; Mechem on Sales, § 258. Placing such a notice in the mails, properly addressed and with postage prepaid, undoubtedly creates a presumption that it is duly received; but the receipt of the notice by plaintiff was denied by such officers and agents of the company as usually received its mail, and whether it was received, if sent, became a question for the jury. * * *

McMANUS v. FORTESCUE, and another.

(Court of Appeal. [1907] 2 K. B. 1.)

Action against an auctioneer for refusing to sign a memorandum of contract of sale. At an auction sale, where the catalogue recited that "each lot will be offered subject to a reserve price," a lot of property was knocked down to the plaintiff for £85, but the auctioneer then discovered or recollected that the reserve in regard to it was £200 and consequently withdrew the lot and refused to sign a memorandum or to accept a deposit from the plaintiff. On appeal from a judgment for defendant.

⁵⁷ Parts of the statement of facts and of the opinion are omitted.

⁵⁸ "Imagine the following case: A, a deaf man, said to B, 'Will you buy my watch for $25?' B replied: 'I will.' A did not hear and asked him to write out the answer. B then wrote, 'No, I will not.' Or suppose this case:

COLLINS, M. R.⁵⁰ * * * The sale took place under conditions of which the second is that each lot would be offered subject to a reserve price, and the fact lies at the root of the discussion, that every bid is made subject to that condition. What, then, is the meaning in such case of the fall of the hammer? Under the authorities that have been cited it appears that it amounts to an acceptance of the offer of the bidder, but that offer was, as I have said, conditional on the reserve price being reached, and a conditional offer cannot be treated as a general and unconditional one. The condition cannot be lost sight of, and a conditional acceptance by the auctioneer of the conditional offer by the bidder cannot amount to a

Jones had a phonograph on his desk. Upon leaving his office, he spoke into it an offer to sell his horse to Brown for $500. Brown coming in soon after, received the offer from the phonograph and spoke into it an acceptance. Upon leaving the office he changed his mind, and meeting Jones on the street before the latter knew what had taken place, said: 'I don't care to buy your horse, and I withdraw the acceptance which I spoke into your phonograph.' Or suppose, after Brown has spoken his acceptance into the machine, he changes his mind and smashes the machine.

"There would seem to be a contract in all three cases, and this appears to be the legitimate conclusion to be drawn from most of the decisions.

"If one sends to a man on the opposite side of the river a letter containing a proposal calling for a counter promise, and says, 'signify your acceptance by lighting a fire,' and the offeree does so in such a manner as unequivocally to indicate an intention to accept, surely a contract arises. This would be so even though a fog prevents the fire from being seen." Ashley on Contracts, pp. 37-38. But Professor Ashley was in favor of finding contracts from any overt acts evidencing intention, but of protecting the other party by requiring compliance with conditions precedent as to notice, non-interference with acceptance, etc. In the phonograph smashing case, for instance, he finds a violation of a condition precedent that the acceptance shall not be interfered with by the acceptor and concludes: "Thus, although the original offeror would be bound in contract, he would not have to perform his part because of the non-happening of a condition precedent. Whether he could hold the acceptor without performing himself, depends entirely upon the character of the contract. In any case it could certainly be enforced by him according to its terms." Id., p. 39.

On the fog illustration, compare Bai v. Van Staden, 20 So. African Law J. 407, where an attempt was made by an offeree to accept by mail an offer by mail when he knew that the letter of acceptance could not go through on time because of war conditions which blocked the mails and it was held that the contract was not completed by the mailing, though ordinarily it would have been.

binding contract to sell, unless some custom is proved that it shall be so treated, and of that there was no evidence. No authority has been cited to shew that the fall of the hammer could do away with a condition expressly stipulated for the conditions of the sale. * * *

EBEN D. JORDAN v. ELIZABETH DOBBINS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1877. 122 Mass. 168, 23 Am. St. Rep. 305.)

Contract upon the following guaranty: "For value received, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the undersigned does hereby guaranty to Jordan, Marsh & Co. the prompt payment by George E. Moore to Jordan, Marsh & Co., at maturity, of all sums of money and debts which he may hereafter owe Jordan, Marsh & Co., for merchandise, which they may from time to time sell to him, whether such debts be on book account, by note, draft or otherwise, and also any and all renewals of any such debt. The undersigned shall not be compelled to pay on this guaranty a sum exceeding $1000, but this guaranty shall be a continuing guaranty, and apply to and be available to said Jordan, Marsh & Co., for all sales of merchandise they may make to said George E. Moore until written notice shall have been given by the undersigned to said Jordan, Marsh & Co. and received by them, that it shall not apply to future purchases. Notice of the acceptance of this guaranty and of sale under the same, and demand upon said George E. Moore for payment, and notice to me of non-payment, is hereby waived. In witness whereof I, the undersigned, have hereunto set my hand and seal this twenty-eighth day of February, A. D. 1873. William Dobbins. (Seal.)" Annexed to the declaration was an account of goods sold to Moore.

The case was submitted to the Superior Court, and, after judgment for the plaintiffs, to this court, on appeal, on an agreed statement of facts in substance as follows:

The plaintiffs are partners under the firm name of Jordan, Marsh & Co., and the defendant is the duly appointed administratrix of the estate of William Dobbins.

William Dobbins, on February 28th, 1873, executed and delivered to the plaintiffs the above written contract of guaranty. The plaintiffs thereafter, relying on this contract, sold to said Moore the goods mentioned in the account annexed to the declaration, at the times and for the prices given in said account, all of the goods having been sold and delivered to Moore between January 16th and May 28th, 1874. All the amounts claimed were due from Moore, and payment was duly demanded of him and of the defendant before the date of the writ: Other goods had been sold by the plaintiffs to Moore between the date of the guaranty and the first date mentioned in the account, but these had been paid for.

William Dobbins died on August 6th, 1873, and the defendant was appointed administratrix of his estate on September 2d, 1873. The plaintiffs had no notice of his death until after the last of the goods mentioned in the account had been sold to Moore.

If upon these facts the defendant was liable, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed; otherwise judgment for the defendant.

MORTON, J. An agreement to guarantee the payment by another of goods to be sold in the future, not founded upon any present consideration passing to the guarantor, is a contract of a peculiar character. Until it is acted upon, it imposes no obligation and creates no liability of the guarantor. After it is acted upon, the sale of the goods upon the credit of the guaranty is the only consideration for the conditional promise of the guarantor to pay for them.

The agreement which the guarantor makes with the person receiving the guaranty is not that I now become liable to you for anything, but that if you sell goods to a third person, I will then become liable to pay for them if such third person does not. It is of the nature of an authority to sell goods upon the credit of the guarantor, rather than of a contract which cannot be rescinded except by mutual consent. Thus such a guaranty is revocable by the guarantor at any time before it is acted upon.

In Offord v. Davis, 12 C. B. (N. S.) 748, the guaranty was of the due payment for the space of twelve months of bills to be discounted, and the court held that the guarantor might revoke it at any time within the twelve months, and that the plaintiff could not recover for bills discounted after such revocation. The ground of the decision was that the defendant's promise by itself created no obligation, but was in the nature of a proposal which might be revoked at any time before it was acted on.⁶⁰

⁶⁰ Offord v. Davies (1862), cited supra, was an action upon a guarantee addressed to the plaintiff, and signed by the defendants, as follows:

"We, the undersigned, in consideration of your discounting, at our request, bills of exchange for Messrs. Davies & Co., of Newton, Montgomeryshire, drapers, hereby jointly and severally guaranty for the space of twelve calendar months the due payment of all such bills of exchange, to the extent of £600. And we further jointly and severally undertake, to make good any loss or expenses you may sustain or incur in consequence of advancing Messrs. Davies & Co. such moneys."

Erle, C. J., for the court said: "The demurrer [to the plea] raises the question whether the defendants had a right to revoke the promise. We are of opinion that they had, and that consequently the plea is good.

"This promise by itself creates no obligation. It is in effect conditioned to be binding if the plaintiff acts upon it, either to the benefit of the defendants,

Such being the nature of a guaranty, we are of opinion that the death of the guarantor operates as a revocation of it, and that the person holding it cannot recover against his executor or administrator for goods sold after the death. Death terminates the power of the deceased to act, and revokes any authority or license he may have given, if it has not been executed or acted upon. His estate is held upon any contract upon which a liability exists at the time of his death, although it may depend upon future contingencies. But it is not held for a liability which is created after his death, by the exercise of a power or authority which he might at any time revoke.

Applying these principles to the case at bar, it follows that the defendant is entitled to judgment. The guaranty is carefully drawn, but it is in its nature nothing more than a simple guaranty for a proposed sale of goods. The provision, that it shall continue until written notice is given by the guarantor that it shall not apply to future purchases, affects the mode in which the guarantor might exercise his right to revoke it, but it cannot prevent its revocation by his death. The fact that the instrument is under seal cannot change its nature or construction. No liability existed under it against the guarantor at the time of his death, but the goods for which the plaintiffs seek to recover were all sold afterward.

We are not impressed by the plaintiff's argument that it is inequitable to throw the loss upon them. It is no hardship to require traders, whose business it is to deal in goods, to exercise diligence so far as to ascer-or to the detriment of himself. But, until the condition has been at least in part fulfilled, the defendants have the power of revoking it: In the case of a simple guarantee for a proposed loan, the right of revocation before the proposal has been acted on did not appear to be disputed. Then, are the rights of the parties affected either by the promise being expressed to be for twelve months, or by the fact that some discounts had been made before that now in question, and repaid? We think not.

"The promise to repay for twelve months creates no additional liability on the guarantor, but, on the contrary, fixes a limit in time beyond which his liability cannot extend. And, with respect to other discounts, which had been repaid, we consider each discount as a separate transaction, creating a liability on the defendant till it is repaid, and, after repayment, leaving the promise to have the same operation that it had before any discount was made, and no more." See Grob v. Gross, 83 N. J. L. 430 (1912).

If, however, the guaranty is not an offer of a series of contracts and revocable so far as not already accepted, but is an offer of one bilateral contract, acceptance makes it irrevocable. See Lascelles v. Clark, 204 Mass. 362 (1910). So if it is an offer of one unilateral contract. In Lloyd's v. Harper, 16 Ch. D. 290, at 319-320 (1880) Lush, L. J., speaks of (1) the unilateral contract guarantee where the doing of the act, as employing the person whose fidelity is guaranteed, or granting the lease to the lessee, the performance of whose covenants is guaranteed, completes the contract, and (2) the guarantee that is divisible in nature, accepted from time to time and revocable at any time in so far as not accepted, as where it is given to secure the balance of a running account at a banker's or a balance of a running account for goods supplied.

tain whether a person upon whose credit they are selling is living.⁶¹

The decision in Bradbury v. Morgan, 1 H. & C. 249, upon which the plaintiffs rely, was rested upon reasoning which appears to us to be unsatisfactory and inconsistent with the opinion of the same court a year before, in Westhead v. Sproson, 6 H. & N. 728, and with the decision in Offord v. Davies, ubi supra, at the argument of which Bradbury v. Morgan was cited; and it has not since been treated as settling the law of Eng-

⁶¹ While the common law rule is that the death of the offeror or that of the offeree will terminate the offer, those who favor the objective rather than the subjective test of a contract, which is the up-to-date view, believe that not until notice of the death should the offer terminate. See Herman Oliphant, The Duration and Termination of an Offer, 18 Mich. L. Rev. 201. As the writer cited said of the case of the death of the offeror (Id. p. 210): "The courts say that the reason the offer is terminated by the death of the offeror is obvious. A contract cannot be made with a dead man. If an actual concurrence of wills is necessary for the formation of a contract, this is true, since in our law the persona of the deceased is not continued. But no concurrence of wills is necessary. The offeror by his offer aroused a reasonable expectation in the mind of the offeree upon which, by hypothesis, he has reasonably acted. As between the gratuitous takers of the offeror's property and the offeree, it is perfectly clear which should suffer the consequences of the casualty of the offeror's death." In a footnote he added: "It is believed that one adopting a subjective analysis would be troubled to find grounds for holding a contract to have been formed by an acceptance subsequent to death when the offeror had expressly stated that his death was not to terminate the offer."

Insanity occurring after an offer presents even more difficulty. Subsequent known insanity of the offeror, and similarly of the offeree, would of course terminate the offer. In Beach v. The First Methodist Episcopal Church, 96 Ill. 177 (1880), the action was brought for the balance of a subscription promised for the erection of a church. The subscriber became, and was adjudged, insane before the church acted on the faith of the subscription, and Dickey, C. J., for the court, said:

"The subscription made by Dr. Beach was, in its nature, a mere offer to pay that amount of money to the church upon the condition therein expressed.

"There is nothing in the record tending to show that the church, in this case, took any action, upon the faith of this subscription, until after Dr. Beach was adjudged insane, or that the church paid money or incurred any liability. His insanity, by operation of law, was a revocation of the offer. In Pratt, Administratrix, etc., v. The Trustees of the Baptist Society of Elgin, 93 Ill. 475, this court said, in relation to such a subscription: 'The promise, in such case, stands as a mere offer, and may, by necessary implication, be revoked at any time before it is acted upon. It is the expending of money, etc., or incurring of legal liability on the faith of a promise, which gives the right of action, and without which there is no right of action. Until acted upon, there is no mutuality, and, being only an offer, and susceptible of revocation at any time before being acted upon, it follows that the death of the promisor, before the offer is acted upon, is a revocation of the offer. * * * The continuance of an offer is in the nature of its constant repetition, which, of course, necessarily requires some one capable of making a repetition. Obviously this can no more be done by a dead man than a contract can, in the first instance, be made by a dead man.'

"The ground upon which the court rested its judgment in the Pratt Case was land. Harris v. Fawcett, L. R. 15 Eq. 311, and L. R. 9 Ch. 866. The reasons of the similar decision in Bank of South Carolina v. Knotts, 10 Rich. 543, are open to the same objections.

Judgment for the defendant.

CHARLES A. BISHOP v. FRANK H. EATON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1894. 161 Mass. 496, 37 N. E. 665.)

Contract, on a guaranty. Writ dated February 2d, 1892. Trial in the Superior Court without a jury, before Braley, J., who found the following facts:

The plaintiff in 1886 was a resident of Sycamore in the State of Illinois, and was to some extent connected in business with Harry H. Eaton, a brother of the defendant. In December, 1886, the defendant in a letter to the plaintiff said, "If Harry needs more money, let him have it, or assist him to get it, and I will see that it is paid."

On January 7th, 1887, Harry Eaton gave his promissory note for two hundred dollars to one Stark, payable in one year. The plaintiff signed the note as surety, relying on the letter of the defendant, and looked to the defendant solely for reimbursement, if called upon to pay the note. Shortly afterward the plaintiff wrote to the defendant a letter stating that the note had been given and its amount, and deposited the letter in the mail at Sycamore, postage prepaid, and properly addressed the want of capacity on the part of the promisor to continue his promise or offer. The insanity of Dr. Beach rendered him, in law, as incapable of making a contract or of continuing or repeating an offer to the church as if he had been actually dead."

Where the insanity is not known, the solution under the cases depends on whether an insane person's contract is valid, if fair to him, voidable, or void. That it is voidable by the insane person seems to be the more common American doctrine, but there is considerable to be said for the English law as summarized by Lopes, L. J., in The Imperial Loan Company v. Stone, [1892] 1 Q. B. 599, 602-603, as follows: "A contract made by a person of unsound mind is not voidable at that person's option if the other party to the contract believed at the time he made the contract that the person with whom he was dealing was of sound mind. In order to avoid a fair contract on the ground of insanity, the mental incapacity of the one must be known to the other of the contracting parties. A defendant who seeks to avoid a contract on the ground of his insanity must plead and prove not merely his incapacity, but also the plaintiff's knowledge of that fact, and unless he proves these two things he cannot succeed." For an English criticism of the doctrine of Imperial Loan Co. v. Stone, see W. H. G. Cook, Mental Deficiency and the English Law of Contract, 21 Col. L. Rev. 424.

to the defendant at his home in Nova Scotia. The letter, according to the testimony of the defendant, was never received by him. At the maturity of the note the time for its payment was extended for a year, but whether with the knowledge or consent of the defendant was in dispute. In August, 1889, in an interview between them, the plaintiff asked the defendant to take up the note still outstanding; and pay it, to which the defendant replied: "Try to get Harry to pay it. If he don't, I will. It shall not cost you anything."

On October 1st, 1891, the plaintiff paid the note, and thereafter made no effort to collect it from Harry Eaton, the maker. The defendant testified that he had no notice of the payment of the note by the plaintiff until December 22d, 1891. * * *

The judge * * * ruled, as matter of law upon the findings of fact, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and ordered judgment for him; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

KNOWLTON, J.⁶⁸ * * * The defendant requested many rulings in regard to the law applicable to contracts of guaranty, most of which it becomes necessary to consider. The language relied on was an offer to guarantee, which the plaintiff might or might not accept. Without acceptance of it there was no contract, because the offer was conditional and there was no consideration for the promise. But this was not a proposition which was to become a contract only upon the giving of a promise for the promise, and it was not necessary that the plaintiff should accept it in words, or promise to do anything before acting upon it. It was an offer which was to become effective as a contract upon the doing of the act referred to. It was an offer to be bound in consideration of an act to be done, and in such a case the doing of the act constitutes the acceptance of the offer and furnishes the consideration. Ordinarily there is no occasion to notify the offerer of the acceptance of such an offer, for the doing of the act is a sufficient acceptance, and the promisor knows that he is bound when he sees that action has been taken on the faith of his offer. But if the act is of such a kind that knowledge of it will not quickly come to the promisor, the promisee is bound to give him notice of his acceptance within a reasonable time after doing that which constitutes the acceptance. In such a case it is implied in the offer that, to complete the contract, notice shall be given with due diligence, so that the promisor may know that a contract has been made. But where the promise is in consideration of an act to be done, it becomes binding upon the doing of the act so far that the promisee cannot be affected by a subsequent withdrawal of it, if within a reasonable time afterward he notifies the promisor. In accordance with these principles, it has been held in cases like the present, where the guarantor would not know of himself, from the nature of the transaction, whether the offer has been accepted or not, that he is not bound without notice of the acceptance, seasonably given after the performance which constitutes the consideration. Babcock v. Bryant, 12 Pick, 133; Whiting v. Stacy, 15 Gray 270; Schlessinger v. Dickinson, 5 Allen 47.

In the present case the plaintiff seasonably mailed a letter to the defendant, informing him of what he had done in compliance with the defendant's request, but the defendant testified that he never received it, and there is no finding that it ever reached him. The judge ruled, as matter of law, that upon the facts found, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the question is thus presented whether the defendant was bound by the acceptance when the letter was properly mailed, although he never received it.

When an offer of guaranty of this kind is made, the implication is that notice of the act which constitutes an acceptance of it shall be given in a reasonable way. What kind of a notice is required depends upon the nature of the transaction, the situation of the parties, and the inferences fairly to be drawn from their previous dealings, if any, in regard to the matter. If they are so situated that communication by letter is naturally to be expected, then the deposit of a letter in the mail is all that is necessary. If that is done which is fairly to be contemplated from their relations to the subject-matter and from their course of dealing, the rights of the parties are fixed, and a failure actually to receive the notice will not affect the obligation of the guarantor.

The plaintiff in the case now before us resided in Illinois, and the defendant in Nova Scotia. The offer was made by letter, and the defendant must have contemplated that information in regard to the plaintiff's acceptance or rejection of it would be by letter. It would be a harsh rule which would subject the plaintiff to the risk of the defendant's failure to receive the letter giving notice of his action on the faith of the offer. We are of opinion that the plaintiff, after assisting Harry to get the money, did all that he was required to do when he seasonably sent the defendant the letter by mail informing him of what had been done.

How far such considerations are applicable to the case of an ordinary contract made by letter, about which some of the early decisions are conflicting, we need not now consider.

The plaintiff was not called upon under his contract to attempt to collect the money from the maker of the note, and it is no defense that he did not promptly notify the defendant of the maker's default, at least in the absence of evidence that the defendant was injured by the delay. This rule in cases like the present was established in Massachusetts v. Vinal v. Richardson, 13 Allen 521, after much consideration, and it is well founded in principle and strongly supported by authority.

We find one error in the rulings which require us to grant a new trial. It appears from the bill of exceptions that when the note became due the time for the payment of it was extended without the consent of the defendant. The defendant is thereby discharged from his liability, unless he subsequently assented to the extension and ratified it. Chace v. Brooks, 5 Cush. 43; Carkin v. Savory, 14 Gray 528. The court should therefore have ruled substantially in accordance with the defendant's eighth request, instead of finding for the plaintiff, as matter of law, on the facts reported. Whether the judge would have found a ratification on the evidence if he had considered it, we have no means of knowing.

*Exceptions sustained.*⁶⁸

BIGGERS et al. v. OWEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1887. 79 Ga. 658, 5 S. E. 193.)

BLANDFORD, J. McMichael and Owens brought their action of assumpsit against B. A. Biggers, P. J. Biggers, Jr., and T. J. Pearce (the plaintiff in error here) in the City Court of Columbus, to recover a reward of $500, which they alleged had been offered by the defendants. The offer of reward was printed as an advertisement in a newspaper in Columbus, as follows:—

"We will pay $500, the above reward, for the delivery to the sheriff of Muscogee County of the party or parties, with evidence to convict, who administered the poison in the meal which proved fatal to J. W. Biggers and J. F. Burgess and wife on the 11th of November."

Signed B. A. Biggers, P. J. Biggers, Jr., T. J. Pearce.

Upon the trial of the case, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount of the reward, $500.

It appeared from the evidence that when this reward was offered, the plaintiff arrested a certain woman, and delivered her to the sheriff of Muscogee county; that a committing trial was had before a justice of the peace and the woman discharged for the want of sufficient evidence to commit. The reward was then withdrawn; but McMichael testifies that after it was withdrawn, Pearce told him to go on, that he would pay ⁶⁸ In Black, Starr & Frost v. Grabow, 216 Mass. 516, 518 (1914), Rugg, C. J., said:

"Although it may be that there is no universal doctrine in this commonwealth that "acceptance of an offer must be communicated in order to make a valid simple contract" (Lennox v. Murphy, 171 Mass. 370, 373, 50 N. E. 644), yet it is true that where a guaranty is in the nature of an offer and not pursuant to some previous understanding or arrangement, and no consideration is acknowledged in the instrument and none moves directly to the guarantor, and the circumstances of the parties and the transaction are not such as to indicate that knowledge of acceptance quickly will come to the guarantor, notice of acceptance must be given within a reasonable time in order that the guarantor may be held."

him what his services were worth. After this, a warrant was sued out for the same woman by Mr. Pearce. McMichael, being a bailiff in the court, executed the warrant and arrested her. She was indicted for the poisoning, was tried and convicted. The judge in the court below charged the jury that if this reward was offered, and the plaintiffs thereupon furnished evidence going to show that this woman was guilty of the crime, they were entitled to recover for the amount of the reward. The court was requested to charge that if, after this reward was offered, it was withdrawn before the plaintiffs performed the services contemplated by the reward, then no recovery could be had, under the declaration in this case. The court refused to give this in charge as requested, but charged to the contrary.

We think the court erred in declining to charge as requested, and in charging as he did. An offer of reward is nothing more than a proposition; it is an offer to the public; and until some one complies with the terms or conditions of that offer, it may be withdrawn. This is well-settled law, as to which there can be no dispute, and counsel in this case did not contend otherwise. When this offer of reward was withdrawn, and Pearce afterwards told McMichael to go on with the case, that he would pay him for his services, Pearce did not thereby become liable to pay him the amount of this reward, but only to pay him for the value of his services. And this is not an action upon a quantum meruit to recover the value of such services; but is an action to recover specifically the amount of this reward, $500. There was no evidence introduced in the court below to show what the value of the services were, and the record does not distinctly show what services were performed.

The court having erred in failing to charge as requested, and in charging the jury as above set out, we consider it unnecessary to say more about the case; and we therefore reverse the judgment.

⁶⁴ "Suppose for example, the following case:

"A desires to have his safe moved from his old office to a new one. He asks B to do this act, and says he will pay him $25. When the safe has been carried to the door of the new building, A appears and tells B that he withdraws his offer, directing him to leave the safe there. Nevertheless B proceeds and completes the moving. Under such circumstances how can a contract be found, or how can A be held to any liability?

"Or suppose another case:

"A merchant is anxious to have a cart-load of goods placed upon an outgoing steamer, and there is barely time to accomplish this. He asks a cartman to take the goods to the steamer and offers $25 for the act. The cartman loads the goods, and proceeds towards the wharf. On the road, another merchant hails him and offers $100 for the immediate cartage of his goods. The cartman thereupon places the first merchant's goods in a safe place and proceeds to carry the second load. As the cartman has never obligated himself to take the first load, he cannot be held liable for failure to perform, and the first merchant suffers his loss without remedy.

BRACKENBURY et al. v. HODGKIN et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1917. 116 Me. 399, 102 Atl. 106.)

Suit by Joseph A. Brackenbury and another against Sarah D. P. Hodgkin and Walter C. Hodgkin. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed, and decree affirmed as to Walter C. Hodgkin.

CORNISH, C. J.⁶⁵ The defendant Mrs. Sarah D. P. Hodgkin on the 8th day of February, 1915, was the owner of certain real estate—her home farm, situated in the outskirts of Lewiston. She was a widow and was living alone. She was the mother of six adult children, five sons, one of whom, Walter, is the codefendant, and one daughter, who is the coplaintiff. The plaintiffs were then residing in Independence, Mo. Many letters had passed between mother and daughter concerning the daughter and her husband returning to the old home and taking care of the mother, and finally on February 8, 1915, the mother sent a letter to the daughter and her husband which is the foundation of this bill in equity. In this

"In each of these cases it is assumed as a fact that the offer calls for an act. But as in the safe case the offer is revoked before the consideration is furnished, that is, before the act requested is completed, and as in the cartage case the offeree ceases performance, there can be no contract in either". Ashley on Contracts, pp. 78-80. See Clarence D. Ashley, Offers Calling For a Consideration Other Than a Counter Promise, 23 Harv. L. Rev. 159.

Compare 1 Williston on Contracts, §§ 60 and 60a. See also Henry W. Balantine, Acceptance of Offers for Unilateral Contracts by Partial Performance of Service Requested, 5 Minn. L. Rev. 94, and the articles mentioned in the next paragraph.

"The recognition of merely objective test implied-in-fact contracts throws the light of understanding on many otherwise dark decisions, even if it does not lead to sympathetic appreciation of them. It may even supply the proper solution of the troublesome problem of what shall be the effect of an attempted revocation of an offer of unilateral contract where the notice of revocation comes after the offeree has started to accept and while he is still continuing to perform the acts of acceptance. See Williston's Wald's Pollock on Contracts, 34, note 39; McGovney, 'Irrevocable Offers,' 27 Harv. L. Rev. 644, 654-663; Wormser, 'The True Conception of Unilateral Contracts,' 26 Yale L. J. 136; Corbin, 'Offer and Acceptance and Some of the Resulting Legal Relations,' 26 Yale L. J. 169, 195-196. The case of an attempted revocation of an offer to an indefinite number of persons by advertisement in the newspapers is, perhaps, one which must be handled, as Sir Frederick Pollock says it was in Shuey v. United States, 92 U. S. 73 (1875) by judicial legislation (Williston's Wald's Pollock on Contracts, 23), but the case of an offer to a known person or to known persons might well be disposed of, without violation of principle, by permitting the offer of unilateral contract to be revoked prior to substantially complete performance of the acts called for and yet preventing real hardship to the offeree, in cases where an adequate quasi-contractual obligation cannot be found, by enforcing an implied-in-fact contract to compensate the offeree for what he has done for the offeror at the latter's request." letter she made a definite proposal, the substance of which was that if the Brackenburys would move to Lewiston, and maintain and care for Mrs. Hodgkin on the home place during her life, and pay the moving expenses, they were to have the use and income of the premises, together with the use of the household goods, with certain exceptions, Mrs. Hodgkin to have what rooms she might need. The letter closed, by way of post-script, with the words, "you to have the place when I have passed away."

Relying upon this offer, which was neither withdrawn nor modified, and in acceptance thereof, the plaintiffs moved from Missouri to Maine late in April, 1915, went upon the premises described and entered into the performance of the contract. Trouble developed after a few weeks, and the relations between the parties grew most disagreeable. The mother brought two suits against her son-in-law on trifling matters, and finally ordered the plaintiffs from the place, but they refused to leave. Then on November 7, 1916, she executed and delivered to her son, Walter C. Hodgkin, a deed of the premises, reserving a life estate in herself. Walter, however, was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, but took the deed with full knowledge of the agreement between the parties and for the sole purpose of evicting the plaintiffs. On the very day the deed was executed he served a notice to quit upon Mr. Brackenbury, as preliminary to an action of forcible entry and detainer which was brought on November 13, 1916. This bill in equity was brought by the plaintiffs to secure a reconveyance of the farm from Walter to his mother, to restrain and enjoin Walter from further prosecuting his action of forcible entry and detainer, and to obtain an adjudication that the mother holds the legal title impressed with a trust in favor of the plaintiffs in accordance with their contract.

The sitting justice made an elaborate and carefully considered finding of facts and signed a decree, sustaining the bill with costs against Walter C. Hodgkin, and granting the relief prayed for. The case is before the law court on the defendants' appeal from this decree.

Four main issues are raised.

1. As to the completion and existence of a valid contract.

A legal and binding contract is clearly proven. The offer on the part of the mother was in writing, and its terms cannot successfully be disputed. There was no need that it be accepted in words, nor that a counter promise on the part of the plaintiffs be made. The offer was the basis, not of a bilateral contract, requiring a reciprocal promise, a promise for a promise, but of a unilateral contract requiring an act for a promise. "In the latter case the only acceptance of the offer that is necessary is the performance of the act. In other words, the promise becomes binding when the act is performed." 6 R. C. L. 607. This is elementary law.

The plaintiffs here accepted the offer by moving from Missouri to the mother's farm in Lewiston and entering upon the performance of the specified acts, and they have continued performance since that time so far as they have been permitted by the mother to do so. The existence of a completed and valid contract is clear. * * *

The plaintiffs are entitled to the remedy here sought, and the entry must be:

SHUEY v. UNITED STATES.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1875. 92 U. S. 73, 23 L. Ed. 697.)

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

Henry B. Ste. Marie filed his petition in the Court of Claims to recover the sum of $15,000, being the balance alleged to be due him of the reward of $25,000 offered by the Secretary of War, on April 20th, 1865, for the apprehension of John H. Surratt, one of Booth's alleged accomplices in the murder of President Lincoln.

The court below found the facts as follows:

⁶⁶ Professor Corbin has suggested in 27 Yale L. J. 384-385, that the court in the principal case probably viewed the defendant's offer as "I promise to convey my land to you in return for your moving to Maine and on condition that you support me during my life" and on that assumption agrees with it. But was that the court's theory?

"The contract at the date of its making was unilateral, a mere offer [to pay 30 days after the completion by plaintiff of a double track street railway to a certain point for which plaintiff would have to secure a franchise] that if subsequently accepted and acted upon by the other party to it would ripen into a binding enforceable obligation. When the respondent purchased and paid upwards of $1,500 for a franchise it had acted upon the contract, and it would be manifestly unjust thereafter to permit the offer that had been made to be withdrawn. The promised consideration had then been partly performed, and the contract had taken on a bilateral character. * * * The notice of withdrawal from the contract was ineffectual. * * * Again, it came too late, after the obligations of the parties had become fixed. * * * The consideration for appellants' agreement was fully performed when the road was completed." Gray, C., in Los Angeles Traction Co. v. Wilshire, 135 Cal. 654, 658 (1902).

"It is true as a general proposition that a party making an offer of a reward may withdraw it before it is accepted. But persons offering rewards must be held to the exercise of good faith and cannot arbitrarily withdraw their offers for the purpose of defeating payment, when to do so would result in the perpetration of a fraud upon those who in good faith attempted to perform the service for which the reward was offered." Barnes, J., in Zwoianek v. Baker Mfg. Co., 150 Wis. 517, 525 (1912). In that case the plaintiff had done all the work required of him in the time specified and only needed to remain in the defendant's employ to January 1 to meet all the terms of the unilateral contract offer of reward. The defendant discharged him on Dec. 30 and the evidence would have supported a finding by the jury that the sole object of the discharge of plaintiff was to prevent him from receiving the reward.

1. On April 20th, 1865, the Secretary of War issued, and caused to be published in the public newspapers and otherwise, a proclamation, whereby he announced that there would be paid by the War Department "for the apprehension of John H. Surratt, one of Booth's accomplices," $25,000 reward, and also that "liberal rewards will be paid for any information that shall conduce to the arrest of either of the above-named criminals or their accomplices;" and such proclamation was not limited in terms to any specific period, and it was signed "Edward M. Stanton, Secretary of War." On November 24th, 1865, the President caused to be published his order revoking the reward offered for the arrest of John H. Surratt. 13 Stat. 778.

2. In April, 1866, John H. Surratt was a zouave in the military service of the Papal Government, and the claimant was also a zouave in the same service. During that month he communicated to Mr. King, the American Minister at Rome, the fact that he had discovered and identified Surratt, who had confessed to him his participation in the plot against the life of President Lincoln. The claimant also subsequently communicated further information to the same effect, and kept watch, at the request of the American Minister, over Surratt. Thereupon certain diplomatic correspondence passed between the Government of the United States and the Papal Government relative to the arrest and extradition of Surratt; and on November 6th, 1866, the Papal Government, at the request of the United States, ordered the arrest of Surratt, and that he be brought to Rome, he then being at Veroli. Under this order of the Papal Government, Surratt was arrested; but, at the moment of leaving prison at Veroli, he escaped from the guard having him in custody, and, crossing the frontier of the Papal territory, embarked at Naples, and escaped to Alexandria in Egypt. Immediately after his escape, and both before and after his embarkation at Naples, the American Minister at Rome, being informed of the escape by the Papal Government, took measures to trace and rearrest him, which was done in Alexandria. From that place he was subsequently conveyed by the American Government to the United States; but the American Minister, having previously procured the discharge of the claimant from the Papal military service, sent him forward to Alexandria to identify Surratt. At the time of the first interview between the claimant and the American Minister, and at all subsequent times until the final capture of Surratt, they were ignorant of the fact that the reward offered by the Secretary of War for his arrest had been revoked by the President. The discovery and arrest of Surratt were due entirely to the disclosures made by the claimant to the American Minister at Rome; but the arrest was not made by the claimant, either at Veroli, or subsequently at Alexandria.

3. There has been paid to the claimant by the defendants, under the Act of July 27th, 1868 (15 Stat. 234 § 3), the sum of $10,000. Such payment was made by a draft on the Treasury payable to the order of the claimant, which draft was by him duly indorsed.

The court found as a matter of law that the claimant's service, as set forth in the foregoing findings, did not constitute an arrest of Surratt within the meaning of the proclamation, but was merely the giving of information which conduced to the arrest. For such information the remuneration allowed to him under the Act of Congress was a full satisfaction, and discharges the defendants from all liability.

The petition was dismissed accordingly, whereupon an appeal was taken to this court.

Ste. Marie having died pendente lite, his executor was substituted in his stead.

STRONG, J. We agree with the Court of Claims, that the service rendered by the plaintiff's testator was, not the apprehension of John H. Surratt, for which the War Department had offered a reward of $25,000, but giving information that conduced to the arrest. These are quite distinct things, though one may have been a consequence of the other. The proclamation of the Secretary of War, treated them as different; and, while a reward of $25,000 was offered for the apprehension, the offer for information was only a "liberal reward." The findings of the Court of Claims also exhibit a clear distinction between making the arrest and giving the information that led to it. It is found as a fact, that the arrest was not made by the claimant, though the discovery and arrest were due entirely to the disclosures made by him. The plain meaning of this is, that Surratt's apprehension was a consequence of the disclosures made. But the consequence of a man's act are not his acts. Between the consequence and the disclosure that leads to it there may be, and in this case there were, intermediate agencies. Other persons than the claimant made the arrest—persons who were not his agents, and who themselves were entitled to the proffered reward for his arrest, if any persons were. We think, therefore, that at most the claimant was entitled to the "liberal reward" promised for information conducing to the arrest; and that reward he has received.⁶⁷

⁶⁷ While it is clear that to earn a reward one must do the precise thing called for, it is frequently a matter of some difficulty to determine just what is called for. Interpretations vary widely. In Juniata County v. McDonald, 122 Pa. St. 115 (1888), for instance, where the reward was for the capture and delivery of a criminal to jail, the court said:

"A mere reading of this paper settles the whole controversy. The reward was not offered for information as to the prisoner's whereabouts, but for his capture and delivery. How, then, could one be entitled to that reward who neither captured nor delivered him? Admitting, then, that the plaintiff gave the sheriff accurate information as to where the culprit could be found, and that he went with him and acted as one of his posse, yet on that officer fell the duty of arrest and the plaintiff was relieved of all responsibility."

In Smith v. State, 38 Nev. 477 (1915), on the other hand, an offer for the

But, if this were not so, the judgment given by the Court of Claims is correct.

The offer of a reward for the apprehension of Surratt was revoked on November 24th, 1865; and notice of the revocation was published. It is not to be doubted that the offer was revocable at any time before it was accepted, and before anything had been done in reliance upon it. There was no contract until its terms were complied with. Like any other offer of a contract, it might, therefore, be withdrawn before rights had accrued under it; and it was withdrawn through the same channel in which it was made.⁶⁶ The same notoriety was given to the revocation that was given to the offer; and the findings of fact do not show that any information was given by the claimant, or that he did anything to entitle him to the reward offered, until five months after the offer had been withdrawn. True, it is found that then, and at all times until the arrest was actually made, he was ignorant of the withdrawal; but that is an immaterial fact. The offer of the reward not having been made to him directly, but by means of a published proclamation, he should have known that it could be revoked in the manner in which it was made.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁶⁷

arrest and conviction of the persons who committed a certain murder was deemed earned by members of a posse who killed the Indians guilty of the crime.

⁶⁶ See Sullivan v. Phillips, 178 Ind. 164 (1912).

"In other words, the proposal is treated as subject to a tacit condition that it may be revoked by an announcement made by the same means. This may be a convenient rule and may perhaps be supported as a fair inference of fact from the habits of the newspaper-reading part of mankind; yet it seems a rather strong piece of judicial legislation." Pollock on Contracts, 8 ed., p. 23.

"Suppose A makes an offer to B, saying that it is to remain open for two weeks, but is to end at once if A's factory is destroyed by fire within the two weeks. Suppose the factory burns within the period limited and A thereafter, accepts, not knowing that it has burned. No contract arises, not because the offer has been revoked, but because it has lapsed upon the happening of this contingency. The contingency qualified the expectation. When one reads an offer of a reward in a newspaper, the expectation aroused is similarly qualified. It is a matter of common experience that, after offers of this kind have been made in this way the offerers publish their change of mind in the same manner. 'As a fair inference of fact from the habits of the newspaper reading part of mankind,' it can be said that unless the expectation aroused by an offer of a reward so communicated is thus limited and qualified, it is not a reasonable expectation [Author's note: For the same reason, the contingency has not happened unless the second publication is substantially as widespread as was the publication of the reward]. The second publication does not need to be relied upon as a revocation. The expectation is contingent and this publication is the contingency." Herman Oliphant, The Duration and Termination of an Offer, 18 Mich. L. Rev. 201, 206.

⁶⁷ "A person may, doubtless, publicly offer a reward by oral statement as well as by hand bill, poster or newspaper. The latter mode has the advantage of being likely to make the offer more generally known, but it is no more

FORTUNE SYMMES v. JOHN B. FRAZIER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1810. 6 Mass. 344, 4 Am. Dec. 142.)

This was an action of assumpsit, with divers counts, to recover the sum of two hundred dollars, or a part thereof, as a compensation for finding, and causing to be restored, a large sum of money in bank bills, which the defendant had lost from his pocket.

A trial was had upon the general issue, at the last November term, before Parker, J., from whose report it appears that the defendant, having lost from his pocket a large number of bank bills, contained in a paper wrapper, amounting to more than fifteen hundred dollars, published an advertisement in the Boston Gazette, in which he described, as nearly as he could the money lost, and offered a reward of two hundred dollars to any person who should find and restore the same. The plaintiff having seen the advertisement, and having observed an unusual number of bank bills in the possession of a man whom he suspected to have stolen or found them, gave notice to the defendant, who, in consequence of the information so given, and by the plaintiff's aid and assistance, recovered more than one thousand dollars of the sum lost, and took the promissory note of the man in whose hands the money was found, for the part which was not restored, except fifty or sixty dollars' worth of furniture, which he also received from the original finder.

It was insisted in the defense, that, as the whole sum lost was not recovered, the plaintiff had not brought himself within the terms of the promise, and therefore, was not entitled to the reward, or any part of it; but, that, if he was entitled to any thing, it could only be upon the count for a quantum meruit; and, it appearing in the case that he had received five dollars from the defendant, that he had been sufficiently paid for his time and services; and therefore, that the verdict ought to be against him even upon this count.

But the judge ruled, and so instructed the jury, that the fair construction of the advertisement was, that the loser would pay two hundred dollars for the whole sum lost, and a ratable proportion for any part that should be recovered; and he further stated to the jury that, upon the count for a quantum meruit, they might consider the advertisement as evidence of the plaintiff's acknowledgment that the sum of two hundred dollars was a reasonable compensation for finding and restoring the whole, and might adopt it as a rule for ascertaining the reasonable compensation for the part which was actually restored.

Upon this direction, a verdict was accordingly returned for the plaintiff. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict for the misdirection of the judge. Upon this motion, the cause stood over to this term, and was now submitted without argument.

binding than a public offer, orally made." Worden, J., in Hayden v. Songer, 56 Ind. 42, 46 (1877).

PARKER, J.⁷⁰ * * * An offer of a reward might undoubtedly be so expressed as to exclude any apportionment; for the owner of the property may prescribe his terms for the restoration of it, he having a right to reclaim it, wherever found. But where a compensation is offered in general terms, like those in the present case, (viz., two hundred dollars for the finding and restoring of a lost parcel containing bank bills,) it is consistent with honesty and fair dealings, and with the interest of the loser himself, and not inconsistent with any principle of law, that a proportion of the reward should be recovered, according to the sum actually restored. The direction at the trial, was, therefore, right. * * *

PER CURIAM. Let judgment be entered on the verdict.⁷¹

WILLIAMS v. CARWARDINE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1833. 4 Barnwell & Adolphus, 621.)

Assumpsit to recover £20, which the defendant promised to pay to any person who should give such information as might lead to a discovery of the murder of Walter Carwardine. Plea, general issue. At the trial before Parke, J., at the last spring assizes for the county of Hereford, the following appeared to be the facts of the case: One Walter Carwardine, the brother of the defendant, was seen on the evening of March 24th, 1831, at a public-house at Hereford, and was not heard of again till his body was found on April 12th in the river Wye, about two miles from the city. An inquest was held on the body on April 13th and the following days till the 19th; and it appearing that the plaintiff was at a house with the deceased on the night he was supposed to have been murdered, she was examined before the magistrates, but did not then give any information which led to the apprehension of the real offender. On April 25th the defendant caused a hand-bill to be published, stating that whoever would give such information as should lead to a discovery of the murderer of Walter Carwardine should, on conviction, receive a reward of £20; and any person concerned therein, or privy thereto (except the party who actually committed the offense), should be entitled to such reward, and every exertion used to procure a pardon; and it then added, that information was to be given, and application for the above reward was to be made to Mr. William Carwardine, Holmer, near Hereford. Two persons were tried for the murder at the summer assizes 1831, but acquitted. Soon after this, the plaintiff was severely beaten and bruised by one Williams, and on August 23d, 1831, believing she had not long to live, and to ease her conscience, she made a voluntary statement, containing information which led to the subsequent conviction of Williams. Upon this evidence it was contended, that as the plaintiff was not induced by the reward promised by the defendant to give evidence, the law would not imply a contract by the defendant to pay her the £20. The learned judge was of opinion, that the plaintiff, having given the information which led to the conviction of the murderer, had performed the condition on which the £20 was to become payable, and was therefore entitled to recover it; and he directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, but desired them to find specially whether she was induced to give the information by the offer of the promised reward. The jury found that she was not induced by the offer of the reward, but by other motives.

Curwood now moved for a new trial.

DENMAN, C. J. The plaintiff, by having given information which led to the conviction of the murderer of Walter Carwardine, has brought herself within the terms of the advertisement, and therefore is entitled to recover.

LITLEDALE, J. The advertisement amounts to a general promise, to give a sum of money to any person who shall give information which might lead to the discovery of the offender. The plaintiff gave that information.

PARKE, J. There was a contract with any person who performed the condition mentioned in the advertisement.

PATTISON, J. I am of the same opinion. We cannot go into the plaintiff's motives.

*Rule refused.*⁷⁸

In Dawkins v. Sappington, 26 Ind. 199 (1866), Frazer, J. said of the return of a stolen horse by plaintiff in ignorance of defendant's offer of a reward, for which reward plaintiff was suing:

"If the offer was made in good faith, why should the defendant inquire whether the plaintiff knew that it had been made? Would the benefit to him be diminished by the discovery that the plaintiff, instead of acting from mercenary motives, had been impelled solely by a desire to prevent the larceny from being profitable to the person who had committed it? Is it not well that

BROADNAX v. LEDBETTER.

Action by S. H. Broadnax against A. L. Ledbetter to recover a reward for the recapture and return to jail of an escaped prisoner. The defendant interposed demurrers on the ground that the petition stated no cause of action, because it was not alleged that the plaintiff had knowledge or notice of the reward when the escaped prisoner was captured and returned to jail by the plaintiff. These demurrers were by the court sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered dismissing plaintiff's case, with a judgment against him for all costs, etc. From the judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Questions certified by the Court of Appeals to the Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS, J.⁷³ This case is sent up by the Court of Civil Appeals for the third district upon the following certificate: * * *

"We propound the following question: Was notice or knowledge to plaintiff of the existence of the reward when the recapture was made essential to his right to recover?"

Upon the question stated there is a conflict among the authorities in other states. All that have been cited or found by us have received due consideration, and our conclusion is that those holding the affirmative are correct. The liability for a reward of this kind must be created, if at all, by contract. There is no rule of law which imposes it except that which enforces contracts voluntarily entered into. A mere offer or promise to pay does not give rise to a contract. That requires the assent or meeting of two minds, and therefore is not complete until the offer is accepted. Such an offer as that alleged may be accepted by any one who performs the service called for when the acceptor knows that it has been made and acts in performance of it, but not otherwise. He may do such things as are specified in the offer, but, in so doing, does not act in performance of it, and therefore does not accept it, when he is ignorant of its having been made. There is no such mutual agreement of minds as is essential to a contract. The offer is made to any one who will accept it by performing the specified acts, and it only becomes binding when another mind has embraced and accepted it. The mere doing of the specified things without reference to the offer is not the consideration for which it calls. This is the theory of the authorities which we regard as sound.

anyone who has an opportunity to prevent the success of a crime, may know that by doing so he not only performs a virtuous service, but also entitles himself to whatever reward has been offered therefor to the public?" See also Sullivan v. Phillips, 178 Ind. 164 (1912).

On knowledge, of offer of reward as prerequisite to right to reward, see 1 Ann. Cas. 392, note.

⁷⁴ In Fitch and Jones v. Snedaker, 38 N. Y. 248, 251-252 (1868), Woodruff, J. said:

"To the existence of a contract there must be mutual assent, or in another form offer and consent to the offer. The motive inducing consent may be immaterial, but the consent is vital. Without that there is no contract. How, then, can there be consent or assent to that of which the party has never heard? * * * An offer cannot become a contract unless acted upon or assented to. Such is the elementary rule in defining what is essential to a contract."

In Sheldon v. George, 132 N. Y., Appellate Division 470 (1909), plaintiff sued to recover $100 reward offered by defendant for the return of a pair of diamond earrings lost from defendant's store. Defendant alleged in effect that the two diamond earrings were stolen from him by one Katz, who thereafter sold the diamonds which were in said earrings to plaintiff. That after plaintiff had been informed that the diamonds so purchased were stolen and were the property of defendant, and he had been requested to surrender them to defendant and had refused to do so, he having been informed that defendant was about to institute legal proceedings to discover the whereabouts of the diamonds, delivered them to defendant, at the same time denying that the diamonds were the property of defendant, and denying that he could identify them. He left them in defendant's possession without waiving any rights he might have as a purchaser thereof. Robson, J., for the court said:

"To establish his contract with defendant by which the latter agreed to pay him the offered reward, he (the plaintiff) must necessarily prove a return of the diamonds to defendant voluntarily on his part, and in reliance upon the terms upon which the reward was offered. If the plaintiff returned the diamonds under compulsion, or even if he did so without knowledge of the offer, then no contract exists, and no liability of defendant to pay him the reward is created by the simple fact that defendant received the diamonds from plaintiff. Vitty v. Eley, 51 App. Div. 44, 64 N. Y. Supp. 397. As was said in the case last cited, the contract element would be destroyed if the service for which the reward was offered was not voluntary on the part of the one claiming it. * * * From the whole evidence, even accepting plaintiff's own version of the transactions, I think the conclusion is inevitable that plaintiff returned the diamonds, not with the intention of complying with defendant's offer of the reward, but solely to escape the trouble promised him if the threatened legal proceedings were begun, and with the further expressed intention of claiming the diamonds as his own by purchase, provided defendant failed to establish conclusively the identity of those returned with those he had lost. * * * The diamonds were returned as a result of compulsion, rather than voluntarily. The subsequent admission of defendant's title to them did not in any way change the character of the original act in returning them. The return was a fixed fact at the first interview. That return did not entitle plaintiff to the reward."

In Vitty v. Ely, cited in the passage last quoted, defendant offered a reward of $25 for the arrest and conviction of the party or parties who broke into and stole property from a school house. Plaintiff gave information which led to the arrest and conviction of a crony of his. The trial court found that he gave it

Some of the authorities taking the opposite view seem to think that the principles of contracts do not control the question, and in one of them, at least, it is said that "the sum offered is but a boon, gratuity, or bounty, generally offered in a spirit of liberality, and not as a mere price, or a just equivalent simply for the favor or service requested, to be agreed or assented to by the person performing it, but, when performed by him, as justly and legally entitling him to a fulfillment of the promise, without any regard whatever to the motive or inducement which prompted him to perform it." Eagle v. Smith, 4 Houst. (Del.) 293. But the law does not force persons to bestow boons, gratuities, or bounties merely because they have promised to do so. They must be legally bound before that can be done. It may be true that the motive of the performer in rendering service is not of controlling effect, as is said in some of the authorities above cited in pointing out the misapprehension of the case of Williams v. Carwardine, 6 English Ruling Cases, 133, into which some of the courts have fallen. But this does not reach the question whether or not a contractual obligation is essential.

Other authorities say that it is immaterial to the offerer that the person doing that which the offer calls for did not know of its existence; that the services are as valuable to him when rendered without as when rendered with knowledge. Dawkins v. Sappington, 26 Ind. 199; Auditor v. Ballard, 9 Bush. (Ky.) 572, 15 Am. Rep. 728. But the value to the offerer of the acts done by the other party is not the test. They may in supposable cases be of no value to him, or may be no more valuable to him than to the person doing them. He is responsible, if at all, because, by his promise, he has induced another to do the specified things. Unless because he feared he might be arrested for complicity with his crony, or without expectation of obtaining the reward. Judgment for defendant was affirmed. Spring, J., for the court, said: "As I have suggested, it [the right to a reward] is a contract obligation. This being so, it must be the voluntary giving up of the information by the person. If cork-screwed out of him by threats inducing fear of prosecution, I take it no recovery could be had. * * * The authorities hold that the information must be imparted with a view to obtaining the reward."

Compare Markillie v. Markillie, 115 Mich. 658 (1898), where heirs at law attacked a conveyance by husband to wife as procured when the husband was mentally incompetent by undue influence and without consideration. On the consideration point, Grant, C. J., for the court, assumed that it was shown that the grantor told the grantee that he would convey the land to her if she would marry him, but said: "Whatever Mr. Markillie said to her, she has disposed of the question of a valid antenuptial contract by her own testimony, for she says that she did not rely upon any such promise in getting married: 'I married him for a companion, so that I might have some place to stay, and that he might have some place to stay. I had a home as well as I have now. One would assist in taking care of the other.' The promise to convey was not, therefore, the consideration for the marriage contract." A decree setting aside the deed was affirmed on the ground that the grantor was incompetent to convey.

so induced, the other is in no worse position than if no reward had been offered. The acting upon this inducement is what supplies, at once, the mutual assent and the contemplated consideration. Without the legal obligation thus arising from contract there is nothing which the law enforces.

Reasons have also been put forward of a supposed public policy, assuming that persons will be stimulated by the enforcement of offers of rewards in such cases to aid in the detection of crime and the arrest and punishment of criminals. But, aside from the fact that the principles of law to be laid down cannot on any sound system of reasoning be restricted to offers made for such purposes, it is difficult to see how the activities of people can be excited by offers of rewards of which they know nothing. If this reason had foundation in fact, it would hardly justify the courts in requiring private citizens to minister to the supposed public policy by paying rewards merely because they have made offers to pay upon which no one has acted. Courts can only enforce liabilities which have in some way been fixed by the law. While we have seen no such distinction suggested, it may well be supposed that a person might become legally entitled to a reward for arresting a criminal, although he knew nothing of its having been offered, where it is or was offered in accordance with law by the government. A legal right might in such a case be given by law without the aid of contract.⁷⁵ But the liability of the individual citizen must arise from a contract binding him to pay.⁷⁶

The question is answerable in the affirmative.

WATTERS v. LINCOLN.

(Supreme Court of South Dakota, 1912. 29 S. D. 98, 135 N. W. 712.)

Action by G. M. Watters against A. D. Lincoln. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McCoy, P. J.⁷⁷ It appears from the record that at all times material to the issues defendant resided at Seattle, in the state of Washington, and that plaintiff resided at Redfield, Spink county, this state. Defendant was the owner of two quarter sections of land in Spink county. On the 17th day of August, 1910, defendant wrote plaintiff a letter, offering to sell to him the said quarter sections of land upon certain specified terms at any time on or before September 5th following. This letter was received by plaintiff in due course of mail some three or four days later. On the evening or night of August 26, 1910, plaintiff by a night telegraph letter or message wired to defendant his acceptance of the said offer of defendant contained in said letter of the 17th, which night message was delivered to defendant on the morning of the 27th day of August. Defendant on receipt of this message immediately wired back to plaintiff: "Twenty-four hours too late. Land sold." On the 26th day of August, about 11 a m., defendant received a telegram from Lyons & Schoniger Land Company of Redfield, defendant's agents, informing him that they had sold defendant's said land, and on the same day accepted said sale by Lyon & Schoniger Company by mailing to them a letter of acceptance and also mailed a letter to plaintiff informing him of the sale of said land, which letter to plaintiff was postmarked at Seattle at 6 p. m. August 26th, and was received by plaintiff on August 29th. It appears from the evidence that plaintiff knew at the time of receiving said offer and prior thereto that defendant was offering said land for sale, through others. It also appears from the evidence that plaintiff was informed personally and received knowledge on the 26th day of August prior to sending his night message of acceptance that said land had been sold by defendant, was so informed by one Elwell who farmed said land. Plaintiff brought suit to compel specific performance of the alleged contract to sell said land mentioned in said letter of defendant to plaintiff dated August 17, 1910. Defendant answered, alleging that he had sold said land prior to the acceptance by plaintiff of the offer to sell contained in said letter of August 17th, and that plaintiff had knowledge thereof. Findings and judgment were made and rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals, alleging insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and judgment, and that the findings and judgment are against the law. We are of the opinion that the evidence fully sustains the findings and judgment, and that the same are not against the law.

⁷⁵ Some of the cases do distinguish between a reward offered by private parties and one offered under legislative authority on the ground that contract principles do not necessarily apply to the latter. See Smith v. State, 38 Nev. 477 (1915) where because the reward was offered by the state the court held that it was earned by persons who when they complied with the conditions, had no knowledge that the reward had been offered.

⁷⁷ The quotations in the opinion have been abbreviated.

Pomeroy in his work on Contracts says: "Before specific performance of a contract can be compelled by decree of a court, a contract must be actually concluded between the parties, for otherwise there are no rights upon which the equitable remedy can operate. * * * And, if it is left doubtful from all the evidence in the case whether a contract was concluded or not, equity will not grant specific relief. * * * The offer is, while it remains such, completely under the control of the person who makes it. As the offer is not in any sense binding, the person who makes it may at any time before a valid acceptance has changed its character withdraw it, and thus put an end to the negotiation. * * * No formal notice is necessary to constitute a withdrawal. It is sufficient that the person making the offer does some act inconsistent with it, as, for example, sells the property in question to another purchaser, and that the person to whom the offer was made has knowledge of such act. Indeed, it appears that a sale of the property to a third person would of itself be a withdrawal, although made without the knowledge of the originally intended vendee."⁷⁸ Pomeroy on Contracts, subject, Specific Performance, §§ 58, 59, 60, 61.

"* * * But an offer cannot be withdrawn by a mere determination to withdraw it. The fact of withdrawal must, on obvious principles, be communicated to the other party. No formal notice is required, however. It is sufficient if the person to whom the offer was made has actual knowledge that the other person has done some act inconsistent with the continuance of the offer. The fact that the offer names a certain period within which acceptance may be made merely limits the time that the offer shall remain in force, and does not affect the right of withdrawal within such time, unless a consideration moves from the person to whom the offer is made so as to constitute a valid option, or the offer is made in the form of a promise under seal. Withdrawal may be effected by implication, as well as by express declaration that the offer is withdrawn. Thus an offer to sell is withdrawn where the owner of the land sells it to third parties before the person to whom the offer was made signifies his acceptance." 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. pp. 593-595. Dickenson v. Dodds, 2 Ch. D. 463;⁷⁹ Coleman v. Applegarth, 68 Md. 29, 11 Atl. 284, 6 Am. St. Rep. 417. In this last-cited case the court approved this language, quoted from Dickenson v. Dodds, an English case: "If the rule of law is that a mere offer to sell property, which can be withdrawn at any time, and which is made dependent on the acceptance of the person to whom it is made, is a mere nudum pactum, how is it possible that the person to whom the offer has been made can by acceptance make a binding contract after he knows that the person who has made the offer has sold the property to some one else? It is admitted law that, if a man who makes an offer dies, the offer cannot be accepted after he is dead, and parting with the property has very much the same effect as the death of the owner, for it makes the performance of the offer impossible. I am clearly of the opinion that, just as when a man who has made an offer dies before it is accepted, it is impossible that it can then be accepted; so, when once the person to whom the offer was made knows that the property has been sold to some one else, it is too late for him to accept the offer, and on that ground I am clearly of the opinion that there was no binding contract for the sale of this property by Dodds v. Dickenson. In this case the plaintiff admits that, at the time he proffered to Applegarth acceptance of the previous offer to sell at the price named, he was aware of the fact that the property had been sold to Bradley. It was therefore ⁷⁸ But see Threlkeld v. Inglett, 289 Ill. 90 (1919).

⁷⁹ Dickinson v. Dodds was followed in England in Cartwright v. Hoogstoel, 105 L. T. 628 (1912), where the court said that the acceptance came too late because "the defendant had by conduct brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff effectually withdrawn the offer before acceptance" (p. 631).

too late for him to attempt to accept the offer and there was not, and could not be made by such proffered acceptance, any binding contract of sale of the property." In the case of Frank v. Stratford-Hancock, 13 Wyo. 37, 77 Pac. 134, 67 L. R. A. 571, 110 Am. St. Rep. 963, the Supreme Court of Wyoming said: "* * * The sale and conveyance of the property to Mrs. McKenzie, which does not appear to have been otherwise than in good faith and for a valuable consideration and which was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff before any attempted acceptance of the option, amounted to a sufficient revocation."²⁰

Section 1215, Civ. Code, provides that: "A proposal may be revoked at any time before its acceptance is communicated to the proposer, but not afterwards." By section 1216 the provisions of section 1212 are made applicable to the communication of notice of revocation of a proposal. The provisions of section 1212 as applied to notice of revocation would be that revocation would be deemed to be fully communicated between the parties as soon as the party making the revocation places his notice of revocation in the course of transmission to the person to whom the offer was made. Hence it would necessarily follow that any acceptance of the offer made after the person making the offer had deposited in the post office the letter containing notice of revocation would be ineffectual for the purpose of concluding the contract. We are aware that a different rule exists in many other jurisdictions, but this statute law of this state establishes the rule in this jurisdiction.²¹

The letter of defendant to plaintiff of August 26, 1910, informing plaintiff that said land had been sold, was a revocation of the offer made to plaintiff and notice thereof. The said letter of defendant was post-marked at Seattle August 26th at 6 o'clock p. m. Plaintiff by his testimony does not inform us of the hour or time on the 26th day of August when he delivered the telegram of acceptance to the telegraph company for transmission; but says: "I sent a night message on the 26th of August." The burden in this case was upon plaintiff, and we cannot say from this testimony that the telegram of acceptance was put in course of transmission prior to 6 o'clock p. m. of August 26th, but the natural inference is that it was not. Where it is left doubtful from all the evidence whether a contract was concluded or not, equity will not grant specific relief. Pomeroy on Contracts, § 59.

We are also of the opinion that plaintiff should not be permitted to recover in this action for the reason that prior to the time he sent his night message of acceptance he was aware of the fact that defendant had sold and disposed of the land in question, thereby making it impossible for defendant to make a sale thereof to plaintiff. Plaintiff knew prior to the time defendant made the offer to him that defendant had other agents who were endeavoring to make a sale of said land. This clearly appears from the letter of plaintiff to defendant of August 12th. Plaintiff was informed during the day of August 26th that the land had been sold. He was so informed by the tenant who farmed the land. Information from such a source is more than common rumor. It was at least sufficient to put plaintiff upon inquiry. Either of the grounds (1) that the notice of revocation of defendant's offer was communicated to plaintiff, in the manner provided by law, before the acceptance thereof was communicated to defendant (2) that plaintiff was aware of the sale of said lands by defendant prior to his attempted acceptance, is sufficient to preclude plaintiff from the relief sought by this action.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

PERRY v. SUFFIELDS, LTD.

(Court of Appeal. [1916] 2 Ch. 187.)

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M. R.^{} This is an appeal from the decision of Sargent, J., who has granted a decree for specific performance in the usual common form. But it is said that there was no concluded contract, because though there were two letters which in form are absolutely complete, yet the court is entitled to go into subsequent matters between the parties and to say that they throw a light back on those letters and make them merely a part of negotiations which never ripened into a concluded contract. Now let us see what the letters are. "Stannards" was a public house which was owned by Perry in this sense, that he was actually owner of two-thirds of the freehold, and he was in possession by his son of the entire property, carrying it on as a licensed public-house. The defendants are a limited company. On February 23rd, 1915, according to the minutes of the board, "It was resolved to make Mr. G. Perry an offer in writing of £7000 for freehold premises known as 'Stannards' Rugby." That resolution was given effect to by the following letter written by the secretary of the company, Mr. Alfred Wright, on that same date: "At a meeting of directors held to-day, I was instructed to write and offer you seven thousand pounds for freehold premises, good-will and possession." That letter was answered by the plaintiff, on March 3, who wrote to Mr. Wright: "I am obliged for your offer of seven thousand pounds for above in your letter of February 23rd last. Please note I now accept same, viz. £7000." That letter was brought before the Board on March 8 and then the company decided in what way they would raise the purchase money, namely, by loan from their bank. Now is it possible to doubt that those two letters amount to a concluded contract? In Hussey v. Horne-Payne, 4 App. Cas. 311, which was decided on demurrer it appeared on the allegations in the statement of claim that there were, prior to the date of the two letters, which were relied upon as satisfying the Statute of Frauds, certain terms which had been discussed and had not been settled between the parties. In those circumstances the House of Lords held that it was a fallacy to say that the letters concluded the whole agreement, because it appeared from the allegations in the statement or claim itself that there were terms, namely, that the purchase-money should be paid by installments, the amount of such installments, and the periods at which they should be payable, which had not been settled between the parties at that date. We are not troubled with that here. It is said, however, that the agreement is silent as to the date for completion. It is the first time that I have heard that a contract is not complete, so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, unless the date fixed for completion is prescribed. It is part of the common law applicable to cases of this kind that the fixing of the date of completion is a matter which arises after the title has been accepted, or rather after the inquiry as to title. Then, it is said there is no stipulation as to the payment of a deposit. Again I say I have never heard that there may not be a perfectly good contract satisfying the provisions of the Statute of Frauds although there is no provision for payment by installments. Then it is said that the plaintiff would have liked to have a deposit. I daresay he would, but that is quite a different matter. Mere arrangements which in the ordinary course of business are left to the legal advisers to settle, such as the date for completion, are subsequent matters which do not prevent the two letters constituting a concluded agreement.

Counsel for the appellant has referred to what Kay, J., said in Bristol, Cardiff, and Swansea Aerated Bread Co. v. Maggs, 44 Ch. D. 616, and also to what North, J., said in Bellamy v. Debbenham, 45 Ch. D., 481; and as the point does not seem ever to have come before the Court of Appeal, I think it right to say, for myself, that I agree with the criticism of North, J., in Bellamy v. Debbenham, supra, upon the observations of Kay, J. in Bristol, Cardiff, and Swansea Aerated Bread Co. v. Maggs, supra, and I absolutely accept his decision in Bellamy v. Debbenham, the effect of which is, I think, accurately stated in the head-note: "Though, when a contract is contained in letters, the whole correspondence should be looked at, yet if once a definite offer has been made, and it has been accepted without qualification, and it appears that the letters of offer and acceptance contained all the terms agreed on between the parties,"—that means, of course agreed on at the date of the offer and acceptance—"the complete contract thus arrived at cannot be affected by subsequent negotiation. When once it is shewn that there is a complete contract, further negotiations between the parties cannot, without the consent of both, get rid of the contract already arrived at."

Now Sargant, J. refers to a passage in Fry on Specific Performance, par. 551: "The effect of subsequent letters may perhaps be thus stated. If the subsequent letters lead to the conclusion that at the date of the letters relied on as the memoranda of the contract there was no contract in fact, then the plaintiff must fail; if, on the other hand, the whole evidence shows that at that date there was a consensus between the parties upon the terms expressed in the letters relied upon, then the subsequent correspondence, unless amounting to a new contract or an agreement for rescission, can have no effect upon the existence of the contract." Then, after referring to Bristol, Cardiff and Swansea Aerated Bread Co. v. Maggs and saying that Kay, J.'s proposition seems worthy of further discussion, the learned author proceeds to deal with Bellamy v. Debenham in par. 553. He says: "In Bellamy v. Debenham, North, J., discussed the language used by Kay, J., in Bristol, &c., Bread Co. v. Maggs, and said 'In my opinion, subsequent negotiations first commenced on new points after a complete contract in itself had been signed, cannot be regarded as constituting part of the negotiations going on at the time when it was signed.'⁸⁸ This seems to be good law. It would seem clear that if the letters of proposal and acceptance in fact contain all the terms agreed on at the time, and were written with the intent of binding the writers, this complete contract could not be affected by subsequent negotiations not resulting in a new contract."

That is really the view taken by Sargant, J. It seems to me perfectly in accordance with good law, and there is nothing in the present case to induce me to think that there ought to be any variation of the rights of the parties as expressed in those two letters of formal offer and acceptance.

The parties rights were for all purposes sufficiently settled by the two letters of offer and acceptance. In my opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

⁸⁸ "The question therefore, is whether subsequent negotiations can be looked at merely for the purpose of preventing that which would otherwise be a complete contract from being so. In my opinion, when once it is shewn that there is a complete contract, it is impossible that further negotiations between the parties can, without the consent of both, get rid of what I may call the crystallized contract already arrived at, and as, in the present case, contained in the letters. Of course it may be an open question whether the terms of the contract really were all settled and the fact that further negotiations took place, as well as the language of those negotiations, may be very important as throwing light upon the state of things at the time when the alleged contract was signed by the party to be charged. The question is really one of fact; and if, in considering that question of fact, one should come to the conclusion that negotiations which subsequently took place related to new matter, started for the first time after the contract was complete, in my opinion they would have no weight in preventing full effect being given to the written contract previously existing." North, J., in Bellamy v. Debenham, L. R. 45 Ch. D. 481, 493-494 (1890).

BOLTON, PARTNERS, v. LAMBERT.

(Court of Appeal, 1887. 41 Ch. Div. 295.)

The plaintiffs, Bolton Partners (Ltd.), were a limited company incorporated under the Companies Acts, and were owners of a factory and hereditaments at Lavenham, Suffolk, known as the Lavenham Sugar Works, for the residue of a term of ten years from the 25th of March, 1884.

On the 8th of December, 1886, the defendant, A. J. Lambert, wrote to P. A. Scratchley, who was then acting as managing director of the company in the absence of the chairman, a letter in which he said:

"Re Lavenham Sugar Works.

"I beg to make you an offer for the above-mentioned works, and at the same time allow me to call your attention to the following facts, which are matters too important to be overlooked on either side."

He then stated several particulars in which expense must be incurred by the purchaser, and proceeded as follows:

"As it is absolutely necessary to commence the new works almost immediately, I propose to take the factory over from the 25th of March, 1887, possession to be given on the 1st of January, 1887, to enable me to get the necessary alterations completed, and also to get the new machinery fixed. Taking into consideration all the facts which I have brought under your notice, I think a fair annual rental to offer you for the use of the factory (including depreciation of the buildings, plant, and machinery) would be £3500, the lease to be the remainder of your term, and subject to the conditions therein described. But as the wall requires repairs, and the machinery, which is now dismantled, will require to be re-started, an allowance of £500 should be made from the first quarter's rent, thus reducing the rent for the first year to £3000, which should be paid on the usual quarter days."

Scratchley wrote to the defendant on the 9th of December acknowledging the receipt of his letter, and saying that he would refer the matter to the directors.

Scratchley was a member of the works committee, which was appointed by the board of directors. On the 13th of December, 1886, a meeting of the works committee was held at which it was resolved that the defendant's offer should be accepted, and that a letter should be written to him accordingly, and that the company's solicitor should be instructed to prepare the necessary documents. It was admitted that the works committee had no power to accept the defendant's offer, or to bind the company by a sale of its property. On the same day, Scratchley wrote the defendant a letter in which he informed him that the directors accepted the offer contained in his letter of the 9th of December and that the company's solicitor had been instructed to prepare the necessary documents.

On the 17th of December the plaintiff's solicitor sent the defendant a draft agreement containing certain stipulations not mentioned in the defendant's offer, and in particular a stipulation as to a guarantee for rent. To these the defendant objected. After some correspondence the defendant, on the 13th January, 1887, wrote to the plaintiffs withdrawing his offer on the ground that he had been misled by the statements that had been made to him as to the value of the property.

On the 17th of January, 1887, the writ in this action was issued by direction of the board of directors. The plaintiffs claimed specific performance of the agreement contained in the letters before stated.

On the 28th day of January the board of directors held a meeting at which they confirmed the minutes of the meeting of the works committee on the 13th December, 1886; and Scratchley's letter of the same date was also read and confirmed.

The defendant denied that there had been any complete contract; and contended that after the defendant had repudiated his offer it was too late for the company to ratify Scratchley's letter of acceptance. He also alleged that he had been induced to make the offer by misrepresentation.

The action came on before Mr. Justice Kekewich on the 19th of December, 1888.

COTTON, L. J.⁸⁴ This is an appeal by the defendant against a judgment of Mr. Justice Kekewich decreeing specific performance of a contract to take a lease. The contract was entered into by certain letters but it is unnecessary to refer to the whole correspondence, as the transaction really begins and ends with the two letters of December the 8th and December the 13th, 1886 respectively. Taking those two letters alone, in my opinion they constitute a contract. The letter of the 8th of December, written by the defendant to Scratchley, a director of the plaintiff company, contained an offer by the defendant to take a lease from the plaintiff company on the terms therein mentioned, and the letter of the 13th of December, written by Scratchley to the defendant, is in terms an acceptance of that offer. It was urged that the acceptance was subject to the preparation by the company's solicitor "of the necessary documents." In my opinion, the principle which governs this point is correctly stated by the late Master of the Rolls in Crossley v. Maycock, L. R. 18 Eq. 181: "If there is a simple acceptance of an offer to purchase, accompanied by a statement that the acceptor desires that the arrangement should be put into some more formal terms, the mere reference to such a proposal will not prevent the court from enforcing the final agreement so arrived at. But if the agreement is made subject to certain conditions then specified or to be specified by the party making it, or by his solicitor, then, until those conditions are accepted, there is no final agreement such as the court will enforce." It is said that the reference to the preparation of necessary documents shewed that the acceptance was not intended to be a simple acceptance, because if there was a full and complete acceptance no documents would have been necessary. But persons often very unnecessarily desire that what has been agreed on should be drawn up in a formal way by solicitors, and in my opinion that was all that was intended by this reference.⁸⁵ It was urged also that there was more than ⁸⁵ See Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander, [1912] 1 Ch. 284.

In Sanders v. Pottlitzer Bros. Fruit Co., 144 N. Y. 209 (1894), the parties by correspondence and telegrams agreed upon all the terms of the contract. The last two telegrams consisted of one from the plaintiffs saying, "Will accept conditions. If satisfactory will forward contract," and the reply by defendant, "All right, send contract." When the contract was sent by the plaintiffs, defendant sought to make certain burdensome modifications and, as plaintiffs would not consent, defendant refused to perform. O'Brien, J., for the court, said: "The writings and telegrams that passed between the parties contain all the elements of a complete contract. * * * It is true, as found by the learned referee, that the parties intended that the agreement should be formally expressed in a single paper which, when signed, should be the evidence of what had already been agreed upon. But neither party was entitled to insert in the paper any material condition not referred to in the correspondence, and if it was inserted without the consent of the other party it was unauthorized. Hence the defendant, by insisting upon further material conditions not expressed or implied in the correspondence, defeated the intention to reduce the agreement to the form of a single paper signed by both parties. The plaintiffs then had the right to fall back upon their written proposition as originally made and the subsequent letters and telegrams, and if they constituted a contract of themselves the absence of the formal agreement contemplated was not under the circumstances material."

"When the parties intend that a mere verbal agreement shall be finally reduced to writing as the evidence of the terms of the contract, it may be true that nothing is binding upon either party until the writing is executed. But here the contract was already in writing, and it was none the less obligatory upon both parties because they intended that it should be put into another form, especially when their intention is made impossible by the act of one or the other of the parties by insisting upon the insertion of conditions and provisions not contemplated or embraced in the correspondence. Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Brown v. Norton, 50 Hun, 248; Pratt v. H. R. R. Co., 21 N. Y. 308. * * *

"In this case it is apparent that the minds of the parties met through the correspondence upon all the terms as well as the subject-matter of the contract, and that the subsequent failure to reduce this contract to the precise form intended, for the reason stated, did not affect the obligations of either party, which had already attached, and they may now resort to the primary evidence of their mutual stipulations."

In U. S. v. J. P. Carlin Const. Co., 224 Fed. 859 (1915) also, "the court intimated that a contract looking toward a formal instrument might not be binding in any case where the negotiations were wholly oral. The only reason for such a distinction is that the parties are more likely to want a formal document where the contract has been verbal; and so it might be said that in such a case there is a presumption that the formal instrument was intended as a condition." 15 Col. L. Rev. 701-702.

that in this case, and that on the letters themselves, it could not be said that there was a completed contract, but that matters with reference to the machinery remained to be settled before the final agreement. [The Lord Justice read the passage in the defendant's letter of the 8th of December with reference to the machinery, and continued:] In my opinion that was merely the reasoning put forth by the defendant to show why

In Drummond v. Crane, 159 Mass. 577 (1893), where the defendants' intestate agreed in writing to enter into a formal contract with terms set out, but died before doing so, in sustaining a recovery for breach of contract, Holmes, J., said of the fact that the contract sued upon contemplated another more formal contract that "That is merely an additional wheel in the machinery" (p. 579).

In Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v. Alexander, supra, Parker, J. said: "It appears to be well settled by the authorities that if the documents or letters relied on as constituting a contract contemplate the execution of a further contract between the parties, it is a question of construction whether the execution of the further contract is a condition or term of the bargain or whether it is a mere expression of the desire of the parties as to the manner in which the transaction already agreed to will in fact go through. In the former case there is no enforceable contract either because the condition is unfulfilled or because the law does not recognize a contract to enter into a contract. In the latter case there is a binding contract and the reference to the more formal document may be ignored. The fact that the reference to the more formal document is in words which according to their natural construction import a condition is generally if not invariably conclusive against the reference being treated as the expression of a mere desire. North v. Percival [1898] 2 Ch. 123, appears to be an exception to this rule, but I doubt whether that case was correctly decided. See the earlier decision of Sir George Jessel in Winn v. Bull, 7 Ch. D. 29, 32." See also, Coope v. Rideout [1920] 2 Ch. 411.

In Mississippi and Dominion Steamship Co. v. Swift, 86 Me. 248, 258-259 (1894), Emery, J. said:

"If the party sought to be charged intended to close a contract prior to the formal signing of a written draft, or if he signified such an intention to the other party, he will be bound by the contract actually made, though the signing of the written draft be omitted. If on the other hand, such party neither had nor signified such an intention to close the contract until it was fully expressed in a written instrument and attested by signature, then he will not be bound until the signatures are affixed. The expression of the idea may be attempted in other words: if the written draft is viewed by the parties merely as a convenient memorial, or record of their previous contract, its absence does not affect the binding force of the contract; if, however, it is viewed as consummation of the negotiation, there is no contract until the written draft is finally signed.

"In determining which view is entertained in any particular case, several circumstances may be helpful, as: whether the contract is of that class which are usually found to be in writing; whether it is of such nature as to need a formal writing for its full expression; whether it has few or many details; whether the amount involved is large or small; whether it is a common or unusual contract; whether the negotiations themselves indicate that a written draft is contemplated as the final conclusion of the negotiations. If a written draft is proposed, suggested or referred to, during the negotiations, it is some evidence that the parties intended it to be the final closing of the contract."

"Whether correspondence with the purpose of entering into a contract is he did not offer a larger rent, and does not prevent his offer from being a simple unqualified one.

Then it was said that other terms were introduced by subsequent letters, and the case of Hussey v. Horne-Payne, 4 App. Cas. 311 was relied on as shewing that in such circumstances there was no concluded contract. But the judgment of Lord Cairns in that case shows that it was not because the subsequent letters raised a doubt, that it was held that the two original letters did not form a complete agreement, but because the two original letters of themselves contained terms which raised the doubt.

That case therefore is not applicable, and in my opinion there was a binding contract constituted by these two letters alone.

But then it is said that on the 13th of January, 1887, the defendant entirely withdrew the offer he had made. Of course the withdrawal could not be effective, if it were made after the contract had become complete. As soon as an offer has been accepted, the contract is complete. But it is said that there could be a withdrawal by the defendant on the 13th of January on this ground, that the offer of the defendant had been accepted by Scratchley, a director of the plaintiff company, who was not authorized to bind the company by acceptance of the offer, and therefore that until the company ratified Scratchley's letter there was no acceptance on behalf of the company binding on the company, and therefore the defendant could withdraw his offer. Is that so? The rule as to ratification by a principal of acts done by an assumed agent is that the ratification is thrown back to the date of the act done, and that the agent is put in the merely preliminary negotiation or the contract itself must be determined by the language used and the circumstances known to both parties under which the communications in writing were had. If it is plain from the language used that some term which either party desires to be in the contract is not included or definitely expressed in the correspondence relied upon, no contract is made. If it is plain from the language that either party wishes or contemplates that another person, not a party to the correspondence, shall be a party to the contract, a correspondence as to the terms of such a tripartite agreement between two cannot be a completed contract between the two. It is as essential that all the parties intended shall be bound as it is that all the terms intended should be definitely agreed upon." Taft, J., in Strobbridge Lithographing Co. v. Randall, 73 Fed. 619, 622 (1896).

As to parties signing, see also Herndon v. Meadows, (W. Va.) 103 S. El. 404, 405 (1920), where Ritz, J., said:

"There is no doubt but that, where a contract in writing is executed by only one of the parties, and the other party waives the execution by accepting performance, or by doing something under the contract which shows that the parties did not contemplate execution as a prerequisite to a valid contract, it will be binding; but where a contract is reduced to writing, and the subject-matter is such that people do not ordinarily contract in regard to it without expressing their agreements in a writing, and the paper on its face indicates that it is the intention that all of the parties shall execute it, and nothing is done under the contract to indicate that the parties intend their agreements to be binding whether the writing is signed or not, it will be held that there is no completed contract, unless all of the parties thereto execute the same."

same position as if he had had authority to do the act at the time the act was done by him. Various cases have been referred to as laying down this principle, but there is no case exactly like the present one.

The rule as to ratification is of course subject to the same exceptions. An estate once vested cannot be divested, nor can an act lawful at the time of its performance be rendered unlawful, by the application of the doctrine of ratification. The case of Walter v. James, L. R. 6 Ex. 124, was relied on by the appellant, but in that case there was an agreement between the assumed agent of the defendant and the plaintiff to cancel what had been done before any ratification by the defendant; in the present case there was no agreement made between Scratchley and the defendant that what had been done by Scratchley should be considered as null and void. * * *

I think the proper view is that the acceptance by Scratchley did constitute a contract, subject to its being shewn that Scratchley had authority to bind the company. If that were not shown there would be no contract on the part of the company, but when and as soon as authority was given to Scratchley to bind the company the authority was thrown back to the time when the act was done by Scratchley, and prevented the defendant withdrawing his offer, because it was then no longer an offer, but a binding contract.

This point therefore must also be decided against the appellant. Another point was raised as to misrepresentation, but, having regard to the evidence, in my opinion that has not been made out. The appeal therefore fails.

LINDLEY, L. J. * * * It is impossible to read the two letters [of Dec. 8 and Dec. 13] otherwise than as amounting to a clear offer and an acceptance. * * *. The question is what is the consequence of the withdrawal of the offer after acceptance by the assumed agent but before the authority of the agent had been ratified. Is the withdrawal in time? It is said on the one hand that the ordinary principle of law applies, viz., that an offer may be withdrawn before acceptance. That proposition is of course true. But the question is—acceptance by whom? It is not a question whether a mere offer can be withdrawn, but the question is whether, when there has been in fact an acceptance which is in form an acceptance by a principal through his agent, though the person assuming to act as agent has not then been so authorized, there can or cannot be a withdrawal of the offer before the ratification of the acceptance? I can find no authority in the books to warrant the contention that an offer made, and in fact accepted by the principal, through an agent or otherwise, can be withdrawn. The true view on the contrary appears to be that the doctrine as to the retrospective action of ratification is applicable.

If we look at Mr. Brice's argument [for appellant] closely, it will be found to turn on this—that the acceptance was a nullity and unless we are prepared to say that the acceptance of the agent was absolutely a nullity, Mr. Brice's contention cannot be accepted. That the acceptance by the assumed agent cannot be treated as going for nothing is apparent from the case of Walter v. James, L. R. 6 Ex. 124. I see no reason to take this case out of the application of the general principle as to ratification. The appeal fails therefore on all points.

LOPES, L. J. An important point is raised with regard to the withdrawal of the offer before ratification in this case.

If there had been no withdrawal of the offer this case would have been simple. The ratification by the plaintiffs would have related back to the time of the acceptance of the defendant's offer by Scratchley, and the plaintiffs would have adopted a contract made on their behalf.

It is said that there was no contract which could be ratified, because Scratchley at the time he accepted the defendant's offer had no authority to act for the plaintiffs. Directly Scratchley on behalf and in the name of the plaintiffs accepted the defendant's offer I think there was a contract made by Scratchley assuming to act for the plaintiffs, subject to proof by the plaintiffs that Scratchley had that authority.

The plaintiffs subsequently did adopt the contract, and thereby recognized the authority of their agent Scratchley. Directly they did so the doctrine of ratification applied and gave the same effect to the contract made by Scratchley as it would have had if Scratchley had been clothed with a precedent authority to make it.

If Scratchley had acted under a precedent authority the withdrawal of the offer by the defendant would have been inoperative, and it is equally inoperative where the plaintiffs have ratified and adopted the contract of the agent. To hold otherwise would be to deprive the doctrine of ratification of its retrospective effect. To use the words of Baron Martin in Brook v. Hook, L. R. 6 Ex. 96, the ratification would not be "dragged back as it were, and made equipollent to a prior command."

I have nothing to add with regard to the other points raised. I agree with what has been said on these points. The appeal must be dismissed.⁸⁶

⁸⁶North, J. as trial judge in In re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines, Ltd., 45 Ch. D. 16, 21 (1890), said of the Bolton Partners v. Lambert holding as to ratification: "It comes to this, that if an offer to purchase is made to a person who professes to be the agent for a principal, but who has no authority to accept it, the person making the offer will be in a worse position as regards withdrawing it than if it had been made to the principal; and the acceptance of the unauthorized agent in the meantime will bind the purchaser to his principal, but will not in any way bind the principal to the purchaser."

In Fleming v. Bank of New Zealand [1900] A. C. 577, 587, Lord Lindley said of Bolton Partners v. Lambert with reference to ratification: "The decision referred to presents difficulties; and their Lordships reserve their liberty to reconsider it if on some future occasion it should become necessary to do so."

In Kline Bros. & Co. v. Royal Ins. Co., Limited, 192 Fed. 378, 386-387 (1911) Learned Hand, J., said:

"The facts, therefore, raise two questions: First, whether a third party who has made a contract with an unauthorized agent on behalf of his principal is bound before the principal has ratified. * * * Upon the first question, there is no doubt some division of authority. In England the law now is that the third party may not withdraw, provided the principal ratifies the contract in season. Bolton Partners v. Lambert, 41 Ch. D. 295; Re Tiedemann [1899] 2 Q. B. D. 66. * * * On the other hand, in Wisconsin (Dodge v. Hopkins, 14 Wis. 630; Atlee v. Bartholomew et al., 69 Wis. 43, 33 N. W. 110, 5 Am. St. Rep. 103), and apparently in Illinois (Cowan v. Curran, 216 Ill. 598, 75 N. E. 322), the whole unauthorized contract seems to amount only to an offer by the third person, which must be accepted de novo by the principal, a rule certainly at variance with the well-established law that an uncommunicated ratification by the principal will bind him. The English case proceeds on the civil law maxim, "Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur," though it by no means follows, because a ratification relates back when once a valid contract is made, that the third party is bound meanwhile, and may not withdraw while the principal remains unbound. Now, relation back is in the sense here used a fiction, and certainly should not be extended to cover unjust cases, of which this is one, as I shall show. In so far as by the maxim it is only meant to say that a ratification carries with it by implication the intention of the principal that the contract shall in fact date from the time when it was made between the agent and the third party, it is unobjectionable in principle, and accords with the facts; but, if taken in the sense that the law will regard both parties as bound from the date of the contract, it merely misstates the facts, because, by hypothesis, the principal is not bound before ratification. All that the law can do is to hold the third party bound from the outset, and that by the mere force of authority. It certainly serves no useful purpose to cloak that authority in a phrase which misstates the truth in Latin, unless it accords with the principles of the law of contracts, or at least produces just results at the expense of those principles.

"Upon principle the doctrine does not appear to be correct, and it has been criticised by text-writers. Wambaugh, 9 Harv. L. R. 60; 31 Cyc. 1291. * * * The result is unfair to the third party, since it permits the principal to speculate on the value of the contract, while he himself remains unbound. If it proves advantageous, he may ratify. If not, he may repudiate. There is no just ground for giving him such an advantage over the third party merely because of an unknown defect in the agent's powers. In view of the dearth of authority in this country and especially of any decisions binding upon me, I do not think that I should follow the rule in Bolton v. Lambert, supra, but rather what I cannot but believe to be the result necessary under the principles of the laws of contract."

In Breithaupt v. Thurmond, 3 Rich. L. (S. C.) 216, 219, (1832) O'Neill, J., said: "I am not disposed to question that the agreement made with the de-

Rugg, J.⁸⁷ The plaintiff in common with several others, in response to an advertisement issued by the schoolhouse commissioners of Boston, submitted a bid for the erection of a certain schoolhouse, transmitting with it a check to the order of defendant for $2,000. The city claims the right to hold this money upon these facts: The bid contained the provision that the plaintiff "proposes and agrees that if, within 20 days after the day named below for leaving the proposal, notice that this proposal will be accepted for the city shall be mailed to him at the address given below or shall be delivered to him, he will at 11 o'clock a. m. of some day of the six week days next after such mailing or delivery * * * deliver * * * a contract and bond for doing the work properly executed in the form annexed, * * * and also agrees that the certified check payable to the city left herewith is the property of the city, and the amount thereof is the amount of damages which the city will sustain by failure to carry out the proposal, but if this proposal is not accepted or if notice is mailed and delivered and the undersigned executes and delivers said contract and bond the check or its amount is to be paid to him on receipt therefor."

The bid of the lowest bidder was accepted, but he declined to execute a contract, and the city forfeited his check. Thereupon, the proposal of the plaintiff, being the next lowest, was accepted by letter mailed within the time limited in the bid, and it refused to execute a contract. The proposal of the next lowest bidder was then accepted, but he refused to execute the contract, and his check was taken by the city. Between these three bids and the next lowest was a gap of about $24,000, and his proposal being accepted, he executed a contract. The plaintiff did not attempt to withdraw its proposal until after it had been accepted by the school-house commission.

1. It is urged that the acceptance of one bid by the city constituted a rejection of all the other bids, and that hence the attempted acceptance of the plaintiff's bid was of no effect. Undoubtedly an advertisement and proposal might be so framed as to sustain such contention. But that is not the effect of the acts of the defendant and the statute under which they were performed. The terms of the proposal as to the time during which it was to remain open indicate that the city intended to reserve to itself time to make at least three attempts to hold bidders before its rights should have expired. St. 1890, p. 370, c. 418, required the execution of the defendant by B. McKennie, as the agent of C. Breithaupt, trustee, would not have been binding on either party until ratified and confirmed by Breithaupt. If, therefore, Breithaupt had refused to comply with the contract, or if, before he had assented to it, defendant had refused to abide by it, he could not have been compelled to do so. But after the plaintiff assents to the contract and offers to perform everything which his supposed agent has undertaken he shall do, it is too late for the defendant to disclaim the contract on the ground that it was originally not binding on the plaintiff."

tion of a formal written contract in addition to the acceptance of the proposal. The acceptance of the bid by the schoolhouse commissioners did not of itself constitute a formal contract. The city could not be bound under the statute until the formal contract was executed. Edge Moor Bridge Works v. Bristol, 170 Mass. 528, 49 N. E. 918.⁶⁶ The only way in which the city could secure a binding agreement for the construction of its building was through such a written contract. But it is plain that the statute contemplated some obligation on the part of the bidders, even though there was none on the part of the city. St. 1890, c. 418, § 5, provides that "every proposal * * * shall be accompanied by a suitable bond, certified check or certificate of deposit for the faithful performance of such proposal. * * *" This section must be given a reasonable

In Edge Moor Bridge Works v. County of Bristol, 170 Mass. 528 (1898) the county commissioners advertised for proposals on a new bridge as per specifications and form of contract supplied by the commissioners, the advertisement stating that "An agreement for five thousand dollars ($5000) liquidated damages will be required for the faithful performance of the contract, with sureties to be residents of or qualified to do business in the State of Massachusetts and satisfactory to said county commissioners." The plaintiff put in a proposal, and at a meeting of the county commissioners a vote was passed and entered upon the records of the commissioners as follows: "Voted, That the cumulative bid of Edge Moor Bridge Works is accepted and that the contract thereon be awarded to said party." A copy of the vote was mailed to the plaintiff by the clerk of the commissioners. The plaintiff at once sent a letter to the commissioners accepting the award and offered to execute the contract and tendered the agreement as to liquidated damages with a corporation qualified to do business in Massachusetts as surety; but the commissioners refused to execute the contract. It was held that the vote awarding the contract to the plaintiff was but a step in the negotiation, showing merely an intention at the time to execute a contract in the future and not even constituting a preliminary agreement that a formal contract should be executed in the future. That holding was deemed confirmed by the state statute requiring all contracts made by county commissioners for the construction of public works to be in writing, which statute, the court thought, made it "open to doubt whether it would now be in the power of county commissioners to bind a county by a preliminary agreement to enter into a future contract for the construction of a public work," though the court did not determine that question. With the Edge Moor Bridge Works case should be contrasted U. S. v. Purcell Envelope Co., 249 U. S. 313 (1919). There the company, whose bid to supply envelopes for the Post Office Department was accepted by departmental order, actually signed the contract submitted by the Postmaster General with a surety company of unquestioned responsibility as surety, but the Postmaster General failed to sign it. The court found for the plaintiff, resting its decision on the holding in Garfield v. U. S., 93 U. S. 242 (1876), that a proposal in accordance with an advertisement of the Post Office Department and the acceptance by it of the proposal "created a contract of the same force and effect as if a formal contract had been written out and signed by the parties."

effect. It would be a nullity if it should be held that the bidder was at liberty to withdraw without any liability at any time before the formal contract, which alone could bind the city, should be executed. The reasonable construction is to hold that the bidder is bound to stand by his proposal, at least after its acceptance, and to the extent of his bond or deposit, but no further. If the case was free from statutory regulation, and it did not appear that a more formal contract was contemplated, the mere acceptance of the proposal would constitute a contract, and neither party could refuse to carry it out without becoming liable to all the damage sustained. Beach & Clarridge Co. v. American Steam Gauge & Valve Mfg. Co., 202 Mass. 177, 88 N. E. 924. The legislature, perhaps in recognition of the hardship, which might follow requiring the bidder to be bound though the city was not, restricted the liability of the former to the extent of the deposit. From this interpretation of the statute it follows that an acceptance of the proposal of one bidder did not constitute a binding contract even on the part of the bidder to execute a formal contract, but only to forfeit his deposit if he failed to do so. The proposal stated that the bid should remain open a definite number of days, not until some one of the bids should be accepted. The acceptance of a bid was only one step toward the execution of the contract. The bidder first accepted might be unable to secure the required bond for the performance of the contract. The mayor might for some just reason refuse to approve the contract, or some other cause might intervene to prompt the execution of a final contract. The tenor of the proposal, which was upon a blank furnished by the defendant, read in the light of the statute, indicates an intent that the city reserves all its rights under all the bids until a contract shall have been formally executed and delivered, and to hold all the bidders to the terms of their proposals until it has either rejected all of them as provided in St. 1890, c. 418, § 4, or become bound by the execution of a contract with one, or the time limited for acceptance has expired. Hence the acceptance of a bid without the execution of a contract cannot be regarded as an unequivocal and definite determination on the part of the city to consider no other proposal. So long as the time limited for the deposit to remain had not expired and no formal contract had been executed, the city was at liberty to accept any proposal, and require the bidder to respond either by signing the contract or sustaining the loss of the deposit. Gibson v. Owens, 115 Mo. 258, 21 S. W. 1107.

2. It is next argued by the plaintiff that, the city's acceptance of the bid being made subject to the approval of the mayor, there was not an unconditional acceptance of the terms of the offer. An offer must be accepted in the terms in which it is made, in order to become binding, and a conditional acceptance or one that varies from the offer in any substantial respect is in effect a rejection and amounts to a new proposition. The phrase in the acceptance by the schoolhouse commissioners, which is relied on as rendering it conditional, was simply a reference to the statute under which the matter was proceeding. It was by implication a part of the invitation for proposal and also of the bid which the plaintiff had submitted. It added no new term to the proposal or to the contract. It did not vary in any respect the offer, and was therefore an unconditional and valid acceptance of it. * * *

4. It is next suggested by the plaintiff that there is no mutuality of obligation imposed by the acceptance of the proposal before the execution of the contract, the city not being bound thereby, and that hence there can be no obligation resting on the bidder. But as has been before pointed out, St. 1890, c. 418, in its several sections, was imported by implication into the transaction. Its terms, in conjunction with the proposal, in substance exonerated the city from any liability until the contract should be executed, but imposed a liability upon the bidders to respond to the extent of the deposit if they failed to stand by their proposal. It cannot be doubted that such a regulation of the conduct of business of municipalities is within the power of the legislature.

5. The final contention of the plaintiff is that the deposit was a penalty, and hence cannot be enforced. The terms of the agreement indicate an intent to treat the deposit as liquidated damages, and this appears to be the purpose of the statute. The amount of the check must be regarded as liquidated damages. It was in fact much smaller than the loss sustained by the city, for by the failure of the plaintiff to take the contract it was awarded to another bidder for a sum about $24,000 larger. The plaintiff refused to sign the contract except for an additional price of $21,000. Therefore no reason appears why the intent of the parties as manifested by their written communication and the purpose of the statute should not be carried out. *Guerin v. THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. WITHAM.

In October, 1871, the plaintiffs advertised for tenders for the supply of goods (among other things iron) to be delivered at their station at Doncaster, according to a certain specification. The defendant sent in a tender, as follows:

"I, the undersigned, hereby undertake to supply the Great Northern Railway Company, for twelve months from November 1st, 1871, to October 31st, 1872, with such quantities of each or any of the several articles named in the attached specification as the company's store-keeper may order from time to time, at the price set opposite each article respectively, and agree to abide by the conditions stated on the other side.

"(Signed) SAMUEL WITHAM."

The company's officer wrote in reply, as follows:

"MR. S. WITHAM:

"SIR: I am instructed to inform you that my directors have accepted your tender, dated, etc., to supply this company at Doncaster Station any quantity they may order during the period ending October 31st, 1872, of the descriptions of iron mentioned on the enclosed list, at the prices specified therein. The terms of the contract must be strictly adhered to. Requesting an acknowledgment of the receipt of this letter.

"(Signed) S. FITCH,
"Assistant Secretary."

To this the defendant replied:

"I beg to own receipt of your favor of 20th instant, accepting my tender for bars, for which I am obliged. Your specifications shall receive my best attention.

S. WITHAM."

Several orders for iron were given by the company, which were from time to time duly executed by the defendant; but ultimately the defendant refused to supply any more, whereupon this action was brought.

A verdict having been found for the plaintiffs, Digby Seymour, Q. C., moved to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the contract was void for want of mutuality.

KEATING, J.† * * * Some orders were given by the company, which were duly executed. But the order now in question was not executed; the defendant seeking to excuse himself from the performance of his agreement, because it was unilateral, the company not being bound to give the order. The ground upon which it was put by Mr. Seymour was, that there was no consideration for the defendant's promise to supply the goods; in other words, that, inasmuch as there was no obligation on the company to give an order, there was no consideration moving from the company, and therefore no obligation on the defendant to supply the goods. * * * If before the order was given the defendant had given notice to the company that he would not perform the agreement, it might be that he would have been justified in so doing. But here the company had given the order, and had consequently done something which amounted to a consideration for the defendant's promise. I see no ground for doubting that the verdict for the plaintiffs ought to stand.

† Parts of the opinions are omitted.

BRETT, J. * * * This action is brought for the defendant's refusal to deliver goods ordered by the company; and the objection to the plaintiffs' right to recover is, that the contract is unilateral. I do not, however, understand what objection that is to a contract. Many contracts are obnoxious to the same complaint. If I say to another, "If you will go to York, I will give you £100," that is in a certain sense a unilateral contract. He has not promised to go to York. But if he goes, it cannot be doubted that he will be entitled to receive the £100. His going to York at my request is a sufficient consideration for my promise. So, if one says to another, "If you will give me an order for iron, or other goods, I will supply it at a given price;" if the order is given, there is a complete contract which the seller is bound to perform. There is in such a case ample consideration for the promise. So, here, the company having given the defendant an order at his request, his acceptance of the order would bind them. * * * This is matter of every day's practice; and I think it would be wrong to countenance the notion that a man who tenders for the supply of goods in this way is not bound to deliver them when an order is given. I agree that this judgment does not decide the question whether the defendant might have absolved himself from the further performance of the contract by giving notice.

*Rule refused.

 "One knows that these tenders are very often in a form under which the purchasing body is not bound to give the tenderer any order at all; in other words, the contractor offers to supply goods at a price, and if the purchasing body chooses to give him an order for goods during the stipulated time, then he is under an obligation to supply the goods in accordance with the order; but apart from that nobody is bound." Atkin, J., in Percival, Llm. v. London County Council Asylums, etc. Com., 87 L. J. K. B. 677, 678-679 (1918). See Queen v. Demers, [1900] A. C. 103.

But in re The Gloucester Municipal Election Petition, [1901] 1 K. B. 683, Darling, J. construed a similar tender and the letter of acceptance of it as being a contract. The tender was made to the city and Darling, J. said:

"The advertisement issued by the council on December 5th, 1899 amounted to this, that the council agreed to receive tenders for the goods of specified kinds which they might want during the period of twelve months, and it concludes with the words, 'the lowest or any other tender will not necessarily be accepted.' Then on December 13th the respondent writes the letter already referred to, which amounts to a statement that he would supply the goods required during the period of twelve months, as ordered, at the prices specified. This is answered by the letter of December 22, by which the committee intimate that they will accept the respondent's tender for the articles which they may want during the period of twelve months at the prices specified in the tender. I think there is a good obligation to order from the respondent such of the goods included in his tender as the council might require during the period of twelve months, for I do not think that the council would have been justified in treating the respondent's tender as a mere price list, and ordering the goods which they required from any one whom they might choose. The conclusion at which I have arrived, therefore, is that there was a contract, because there was an obligation on both sides."

M. KELLER v. R. YBARRU.

(Supreme Court of California, 1853. 3 Cal. 147.)

This action was brought upon an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, which set forth, that about the 15th of June, 1852, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a contract, whereby the defendant agreed with the plaintiff to sell, and pick from the vines, and deliver to plaintiff, at the vineyard of the defendant, so many of the grapes then growing in said vineyard, as plaintiff should wish to take the present year, the plaintiff to have the first grapes that were ripe, for which plaintiff agreed to pay defendants ten cents per pound, cash, on delivery; and plaintiff avers, that on the 19th August, 1852, he notified the defendant that he wished to take of said grapes 1900 pounds, and tendered the defendant $190 in payment therefor, and requested the defendant to pick and deliver the said quantity to the plaintiff; but that defendant refused to deliver the same or any part thereof.

The defendant denied all the allegations of the bill, and the cause was tried by a jury, who were instructed by the court that the contract set up in the plaintiff's bill was void, for want of a binding consideration on the part of the plaintiff, which plaintiff excepted to, and judgment being rendered for the defendant, the plaintiff took this appeal.

HEYDENFELDT, J. When the agreement, which is the subject of this action was first entered into, it amounted to a mere offer on the part of the defendant, which the plaintiff had the right to accept or reject, and the defendant to retract, at any time before actual acceptance. When, however, the plaintiff named the amount of grapes which he would take under the offer of the defendant, the contract was complete, and both parties were bound by it. The court below, therefore erred in deciding for the defendant, and judgment is reversed, with costs.

THE CHICAGO & GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. DANE.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1870. 43 N. Y. 240.)

This is an appeal from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Compare these cases with Jordan v. Patterson, 67 Conn. 473 (1896) where between Feb. 10, 1892 and March 16, 1892, plaintiffs sent to defendants 14 separate orders for goods, each order numbered and signed, and where on March 16, 1892 defendants wrote plaintiffs, "We are in receipt of the following contracts for which we thank you," describing the 14 orders by their numbers and amounts, and it was held that the letter of March 16 accepted all the orders as one contract, and with Peoria Mfg. Co. v. Bain Mfg. Co., 76 Mo. App. 76, where an order for twine and another for rope were given on the same day and accepted in one letter, and where instructions not to send the twine were held not to relieve the seller from his obligation to send the rope.

Court in the first judicial district, affirming a judgment for the defendant upon the report of a referee.

This action was brought to recover damages on an alleged contract of the defendant to carry and transport a quantity of railroad iron from New York to Chicago for the plaintiffs. The only evidence of the contract were the letters quoted in the opinion of the court.

GROVER, J. Whether the letter of the defendants to plaintiff, and the answer of plaintiff thereto (leaving the question of revenue stamps out of view), proved a legal contract for the transportation of iron by the defendants for the plaintiff from New York to Chicago upon the terms therein specified, depends upon the question whether the plaintiff became thereby bound to furnish any iron to the defendants for such transportation, as there was no pretense of any consideration for the promise of the defendants to transport the iron, except the mutual promise of the plaintiff to furnish it for that purpose, and to pay the specified price for the service. Unless, therefore, there was a valid undertaking by the plaintiff so to furnish the iron, the promise of the defendants was a mere nude pact, for the breach of which no action can be maintained. The material part of the defendants' letter affecting this question is as follows: "We hereby agree to receive in this port (New York), either from yard or vessel, and transport to Chicago, by canal and rail or the lakes, for and on account of the Chicago & Great Eastern Railway Company, not exceeding 6000 tons gross (2240 pounds) in and during the months of April, May, June, July, and August, 1864, upon the terms and for the price hereinafter specified." This letter was forwarded by the defendants to the plaintiff April 15th, 1864. On April 16th the plaintiff answered this letter, the material part of which was as follows: "In behalf of this company I assent to your agreement, and will be bound by its terms." We have seen that the inquiry is, whether this bound the plaintiff to furnish any iron for transportation. It is manifest that the word "agree" in the letter of the defendants was used as synonymous with the word "offer," and that the letter was a mere proposition to the plaintiff for a contract to transport for it any quantity of iron upon the terms specified, not exceeding 6000 tons, and that it was so understood by the plaintiff. The plaintiff was at liberty to accept this proposition for any specified quantity not beyond that limited; and had it done so, a contract mutually obligatory would have resulted therefrom, for the breach of which by either party the other could have maintained an action for the recovery of the damages thereby sustained. This mutual obligation of the parties to perform the contract would have constituted a consideration for the promise of each. But the plaintiff did not so accept. Upon the receipt of the defendants' offer to transport not to exceed 6000 tons upon the terms specified, it merely accepted such offer, and agreed to be bound by its terms. This amounted to nothing more than the acceptance of an option by the plaintiff for the transportation of such quantity of iron by the defendants as it chose; and had there been a consideration given to the defendants for such option, the defendants would have been bound to transport for the plaintiff such iron as it required within the time and quantity specified, the plaintiff having its election not to require the transportation of any. But there was no consideration received by the defendants for giving any such option to the plaintiff. There being no consideration for the promise of the defendants, except this acceptance by the plaintiff, and that not binding it to furnish any iron for transportation unless it chose, it follows that there was no consideration for any promise of the defendants, and that the breach of such promise furnishes no foundation for an action. The counsel for the defendants insists that the contract may be upheld for the reason that at the time the letters were written the defendants were engaged in transporting iron for the plaintiff. But this had no connection with the letters any more than if the defendants were at the time employed in any other service for the plaintiff. Nor does the fact that the defendants, after the letters were written, transported iron for the plaintiff at all aid in upholding the contract. This did not oblige the plaintiff to furnish any additional quantity, and consequently constituted no consideration for a promise to transport any such. The counsel for the appellant further insists that the letter of defendant was a continuing offer, and that the request of the plaintiff, in August, to receive and transport a specified quantity of iron was an acceptance of such offer, and that the promises then became mutually obligatory, if not so before. This position cannot be maintained. Upon receipt of the defendants' letter, the plaintiff was bound to accept in a reasonable time and give notice thereof, or the defendant was no longer bound by the offer. The judgment appealed from must be affirmed with costs.

Assuming that the seller would have been bound to accept a proper bid, the court held that the bid in question was not one because "whether it was a tender at all depended entirely not upon the construction of the letter, but upon whether other people tendered." *Lindley, M. SAMUEL P. WHITE, Respondent, v. JOHN W. CORLIES and JONATHAN N. TIFT, Appellants.

Appeal from judgment of the General Term of the first judicial district, affirming a judgment entered upon a verdict for plaintiff.

The action was for an alleged breach of contract.

The plaintiff was a builder, with his place of business in Fortieth Street, New York City.

The defendants were merchants at 32 Dey Street.

In September, 1865, the defendants furnished the plaintiff with specifications, for fitting up a suite of offices at 57 Broadway, and requested him to make an estimate of the cost of doing the work.

On September 28th the plaintiff left his estimate with the defendants, and they were to consider upon it, and inform the plaintiff of their conclusions.

On the same day the defendants made a change in their specifications, and sent a copy of the same, so changed, to the plaintiff for his assent under his estimate, which he assented to by signing the same and returning it to the defendants.

On the day following the defendants' book-keeper wrote the plaintiff the following note:

"New York, September 29.

"Upon an agreement to finish the fitting up of offices 57 Broadway in two weeks from date, you can begin at once.

"The writer will call again, probably between 5 and 6 this p. m.

"W. H. R.,

"For J. W. Corlies & Co., 32 Dey Street."

No reply to this note was ever made by the plaintiff; and on the next day the same was countermanded by a second note from the defendants.

Immediately on receipt of the note of September 29th, and before the countermand was forwarded, the plaintiff commenced a performance by the purchase of lumber and beginning work thereon.

And after receiving the countermand, the plaintiff brought this action for damages for a breach of contract.

The court charged the jury as follows: "From the contents of this note which the plaintiff received, was it his duty to go down to Dey Street (meaning to give notice of assent), before commencing the work?

"In my opinion it was not. He had a right to act upon this note and commence the job, and that was a binding contract between the parties."

To this defendants excepted.

FOLGER, J. We do not think that the jury found, or that the testimony shows, that there was any agreement between the parties, before the written communication of the defendants of September 30th was received by the plaintiff. This note did not make an agreement. It was a proposition, and must have been accepted by the plaintiff before either party was bound, in contract, to the other. The only overt action which is claimed by the plaintiff as indicating on his part an acceptance of the offer, was the purchase of the stuff necessary for the work, and commencing work, as we understand the testimony, upon that stuff.

We understand the rule to be, that where an offer is made by one party to another when they are not together, the acceptance of it by that other must be manifested by some appropriate act. It does not need that the acceptance shall come to the knowledge of the one making the offer before he shall be bound. But though the manifestation need not be brought to his knowledge before he becomes bound, he is not bound, if that manifestation is not put in a proper way to be in the usual course of events, in some reasonable time communicated to him. Thus a letter received by mail containing a proposal may be answered by letter by mail, containing the acceptance. And in general, as soon as the answering letter is mailed, the contract is concluded. Though one party does not know of the acceptance, the manifestation thereof is put in the proper way of reaching him.

In the case in hand, the plaintiff determined to accept. But a mental determination not indicated by speech, or put in course of indication by act to the other party, is not an acceptance which will bind the other. Nor does an act, which, in itself, is no indication of an acceptance, become such, because accompanied by an unevinced mental determination. Where the act uninterpreted by concurrent evidence of the mental purpose accompanying it, is as well referable to one state of facts as another, it is no indication to the other party of an acceptance, and does not operate to hold him to his offer.

Conceding that the testimony shows, that the plaintiff did resolve to accept this offer, he did no act which indicated an acceptance of it to the defendants. He, a carpenter and builder, purchased stuff for the work. But it was stuff as fit for any other like work. He began work upon the stuff, but as he would have done for any other like work. There was nothing in his thought formed but not uttered, or in his acts that indicated or set in motion an indication to the defendants of his acceptance of their offer, or which could necessarily result therein.

But the charge of the learned judge was fairly to be understood by the jury as laying down the rule to them, that the plaintiff need not indicate to the defendants his acceptance of their offer; and that the purchase of stuff and working on it after receiving the note, made a binding contract between the parties. In this we think the learned judge fell into error.

*Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.*⁹²

⁹² The difficulty was not that plaintiff did not sign an agreement but that

CARNIG v. CARR.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1897. 167 Mass. 544, 46 N. E. 117, 35 L. R. A. 512, 57 Am. St. Rep. 488.)

Action by Callenkiar S. Carnig against Martin W. Carr for breach of an oral contract for "permanent employment." There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Overruled.

MORTON, J.²² There was evidence tending to show that the defendant agreed that if the plaintiff would give up his business, which was that of an enameler, and enter his service in the same occupation, he would furnish him with permanent employment at stipulated wages; that the plaintiff gave up his business, and entered defendant's employment, and continued therein several months, receiving wages at the rate agreed, when defendant suspended his employment, and finally ceased altogether to employ him, though he has work of the kind which the plaintiff was to do. The defendant contends that the contract is too indefinite to be capable of enforcement; that it is within the statute of frauds; that the conduct of acceptance was not exhibited to the defendants. See note to Spencer v. Spencer, ante, p. 46.

"It will be observed that the appellee did not sign the contract and hence it is contended that the contract is not mutual. It appears, however, that the contract was delivered by Morris Sellers, appellant, to appellee, on the day it was executed, and appellee accepted the contract and agreed to its terms and conditions. The acceptance of the contract by appellee assenting to its terms, holding it and acting upon it as a valid instrument, may be regarded as equivalent to its formal execution on his part, as held by this court in Johnson v. Dodge, 17 Ill. 433 and Vogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339." Craig, J., in Sellers v. Greer, 172 Ill. 549, 552 (1898). See Louisville, etc. Co. v. Coyle, 123 Ky. 854 (1906).

"If one person makes a proposition to another and without any formal acceptance the latter proceeds to avail himself of the proposition, that will be a virtual acceptance, and he will be as fully bound as if he had in terms, accepted the offer. Or if a contract is entered into and the terms agreed upon, and it is understood that it shall be in writing, and the parties perform the agreement, or one of them, without the objection of the other, enters upon the performance of the agreement, the contract, unless of the character required by the statute to be in writing, will be as binding as if reduced to writing as agreed. The writing gives no additional force or validity, except in cases arising under the statute of frauds. It is not the agreement, but the evidence of its terms and conditions." Walker, J., in Miller v. McManis, 57 Ill. 126, 130-131 (1870).

In McKell v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 175 Fed. 321 (1910) where an acceptance by letter of an offer was conditional as to certain points and was not replied to, but the parties proceeded for years on the theory that a contract was formed, Severens, J., said of the insistence of counsel that there never was a contract: "But it is a sufficient answer to this that the parties proceeded with their contract as if these supposed conditions were a part of it, and this was as effectually an acceptance as if they had been formally a part of it." (p. 328).

plaintiffs agreement to give up his business was unlawful; and that, therefore, the contract is void for want of consideration; and that the action cannot be maintained on the declaration.

To ascertain what the parties intended by "permanent employment," it is necessary to consider the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract, its subject, the situation and relation of the parties, and the sense in which, taking these things into account, the words would be commonly understood; for it fairly may be assumed that the parties used and understood them in that sense. Navigation Co. v. Moore, 2 Whart. 491. Looking at the matter in that way, we think that the words would be commonly understood as meaning that so long as the defendant was engaged in enameling, and had work which the plaintiff could do, and desired to do, and so long as the plaintiff was able to do his work satisfactorily, the defendant would employ him, and that in that sense the employment would be permanent; that is, the plaintiff would be under no necessity of looking for work elsewhere, but could rely on the arrangement thus made. So construed, the contract would be capable of enforcement, and there would be no want of mutuality because the plaintiff might not have bound himself to continue in the defendant's employment. The construction contended for by the defendant, namely, that it was for him to say whether he needed the plaintiff's services or not, would put the plaintiff entirely at the defendant's mercy, and, in view of the fact that the plaintiff was to give up his business to enter the defendant's employment, would be such an agreement as he could not necessarily have been expected to make. See Russell v. Allerton, 108 N. Y. 288, 15 N. E. 391. On the other hand, it would be equally unreasonable to hold that the defendant could have intended to bind himself to employ the plaintiff so long as they both lived, regardless of his continuing in the enameling business, or of the plaintiff's rendering satisfactory service. The plaintiff does not, indeed, contend for such a construction. If it is difficult, as the defendant insists that it is, to lay down a rule for estimating the damages arising from the breach of such a contract as we have construed this to be, the difficulty is no greater than exists in many other cases, and does not present an insuperable objection to recovery.

The construction which we have given to the contract disposes of the defense of the statute of frauds. It has been repeatedly held that, if an agreement whose performance would otherwise extend beyond a year may be completely performed within a year on the happening of some contingency, it is not within the statute of frauds. Peters v. Inhabitants of Westborough, 19 Pick. 364; Lyon v. King, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 411; Doyle v. Dixon, 97 Mass. 208; Worthy v. Jones, 11 Gray 168; Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 279; Bartlett v. Mystic River Corp., 151 Mass. 435, 24 N. E. 780; McGregor v. McGregor, 21 Q. B. Div. 424. In this case we say nothing of other contingencies. The contract would have been completely performed if the defendant had ceased to carry on business within a year.

The contract did not impose an unlimited restraint upon the plaintiff, but, at the most, only restrained him from engaging in business so long as he continued in the employment of the defendant. There was nothing unlawful or against public policy in such a contract. Machine Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73. * * *

THE OAKBANK OIL COMPANY, Ltd., Pursuers, (Appellants) v.
LOVE & STEWART, Ltd., Defenders (Respondents).

(House of Lords. [1918] S. C. (H. L.) 54.)

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD CHANCELLOR [FINLAY]. * * * The question is a very short one, and it turns substantially upon the letter of the 29th July, 1914. At the top of the letter is printed in red ink this: "All offers over a period are subject to stoppages through strikes, lockouts, &c., and the right to cancel is reserved in the event of any of the countries from which our supplies are drawn becoming engaged in war." Then the letter proceeds: "Dear Sirs:—We hereby offer to undertake to supply all your requirements in pit-props in accordance with your schedule class No. 12, from No. 41 to 61 inclusive, for 12 months from 1st July, 1914 to 30 June, 1915, at the annexed prices, and hope to be favoured with your acceptance." That was accepted by a letter of the same date signed by the managing director of the pursuers: "I beg to inform you that your offer for the various article specified, as per enclosed schedule, has been accepted." Your Lordships have been referred to a facsimile of the letter from which it appears that the headnote is in red ink and is printed in a reasonably conspicuous position upon the form of the letter. The question is whether that red ink note is to be regarded as forming part of the contract or not. It seems to me clear that it must be so regarded. It is a letter, no doubt, but the parties were in the habit of writing letters upon business, and, for convenience, they appear to have had this headnote relating to the case of strikes and the case of war. The case of strikes is, unfortunately, so common that everyone would expect to find a provision made for what was to happen in case an occurrence of that kind took place. The case of war is also provided for by this note. It is said that the pursuers did not, nor did any of the directors or officials read this clause—that their own attention was not directed to it, and that the attention of none of the higher officers of the company was called to it. That, to my mind, is utterly immaterial. The question is whether the red ink note was put in such type and in such a position that it must be regarded reasonably as forming part of the terms which were offered by those who wrote the letter. It seems to me quite clear that this red ink note did form part of these terms. Many cases have been put. The case may be suggested of a postscript which had not been added at the end of the letter but was written in at the top of the page on which the letter begins with "Dear Sirs," so that there you would have, "P. S.:—It will of course be remembered that this is subject to the strike clause in the form with which you are familiar," or something of that kind. But here, for convenience, they had this printed clause in red ink, and it seems to me that it is quite impossible to divorce the letter, which is said to begin with the words, "Dear Sirs," and end with the words, "Yours truly," from the clause which is printed in such a way as to call attention to it, and which purports to qualify the terms of the letter. It appears to me that the cases with regard to tickets on railways, which are merely vouchers for payment of a fare, have no application, and it is impossible to read the contract here apart from the red ink note. If that red ink note forms part of the contract, then the decision of the majority of the Inner House was right. They reversed the decision of the Lord Ordinary, and in my opinion they were right. This appeal, therefore, fails.

⁹⁴ On vagueness and uncertainty of promises, see Shaw v. Woodbury Glass Works, 52 N. J. L. 7 (1889) where a promise of "a place" in the works "made to a workman, when there were different places and the rate of wages was not fixed, was held to be merely a negotiation in contemplation of a bargain. The opinion quoted Lord Wensleydale in Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cas., 238, 268 (1857), that "An agreement to be finally settled, must comprise all the terms which the parties intended to introduce into the agreement. An agreement to enter into an agreement, to be afterwards settled between the parties, is a contradiction in terms. It is absurd to say that a man enters into an agreement till the terms of that agreement are settled. Until those terms are settled, he is perfectly at liberty to retire from the bargain."

⁸⁵ "It is insisted by appellants that the words, 'All sales subject to strikes and accidents,' printed at the top of their letter-heads, must be considered in determining what the contract was, and that said words constituted an express condition that became a part of the contract between them and appellees. We do not so understand the case. Under date of March 1st, 1889, appellees invited appellants to make them an offer of sale of a specified quantity of sheet iron, to be delivered in certain designated months. On March 4th appellants made them an offer, as requested. On March 9, in their letter of that date, appellees declined to accept the offer received, and at the same time they submitted for consideration an offer of their own,—an offer of purchase. This offer contained all the elements and terms of a precise and complete contract, and lacked only the assent thereto of the persons to whom it was addressed to make it such a contract. The offer was to buy a certain quantity of sheet-iron, of certain sizes, to be delivered in Chicago in specified quantities at designated times, and to pay therefor certain prices at certain stated times, and appellees concluded their proposal by saying, 'If you accept our offer you may enter us

v. PATRICK M'MANAMY and others.

(High Court of Justice in Ireland, King's Bench Division. [1916] 2 Ir. Rep. 161.)

for March shipment 250 bundles,' etc. The offer was absolute and positive, and without any conditions, qualifications or exceptions whatever. On March 11, appellants wrote to appellees: 'Your favor of March 9 at hand. We accept your offer.' And they thereupon proceeded to restate in their letter the terms of the proposal made to them. These two letters made the contract between the parties. The two preceding letters seem to us to be wholly immaterial. The mere fact that appellants wrote their acceptance on a blank form for letters, at the top of which were printed the words, 'All sales subject to strikes and accidents,' no more made those words a part of the contract than they made the other words there printed, 'Summers Bros. & Co. Manufacturers of Box-annealed Common and Refined Sheet-Iron,' a part of the contract. The offer was absolute. The written acceptance which they themselves wrote was just as absolute. The printed words were not in the body of the letter or referred to therein. The fact that they were printed at the head of their letter-heads would not have the effect of preventing appellants from entering into an unconditional contract of sale.

"In American Express Co. v. Pickney, 29 Ill. 392, this court said: 'In a case where the agreement is partly written and in part printed, the preference is always given to the written part.' In that case the printed matter was in the body of the instrument, incorporated and mingled with the written matter. It would seem there is more reason and occasion for applying the principle of law there invoked in a case where, as here, the words in print are separate and apart from the writing that appears upon the paper, and in a place where one would not be likely to look for limitations upon that which is written. People ex rel. v. Dulaney, 96 Ill. 503, is to the same effect as the case above cited.

"When an instrument is in part written and in part printed, and these parts are apparently inconsistent, or there is a reasonable doubt upon the sense and meaning of the whole, the words in writing will control, because they are the immediate language and terms selected by the parties themselves for the expression of their meaning. (Alsagu v. St. Katherine's Dock Co., 14 M. & W. 796, and Robertson & Thomasson v. French, 4 East, 360, both cases cited with approval in Express Co. case, supra.) In the case at bar it is inconsistent that the contract should be both an absolute contract and a conditional contract. The terms of payment in this contract were sixty days' time or two per cent discount for cash in ten days. Suppose the words, 'All sales not paid for on delivery to draw interest,' had been printed on the letter-head; can there be any doubt that the written terms would have controlled the printed words? Here there was a written provision that the iron was to be delivered free on board the cars at Chicago. Suppose it had been printed on the letter-head that the manufacturers would not be responsible for iron after a delivery to a common carrier; would not the written provision have governed the contract?

"Upon the whole, we are inclined to the opinion that the mere fact that the words in question were printed in the caption of the paper on which appellants wrote their unqualified acceptance of the contract proposed by appellees, did not have the effect of reading them into the agreement thereby consummated;

CHERRY, L. C. J.⁹⁶ * * * The action was brought on foot of a guarantee by the defendant to the Bank of Ireland of the debts and liabilities to the Bank of the Boyle Co-operative Society, Ltd. The guarantee is in the ordinary form. It is dated the 7th April, 1911, and signed by all the defendants. Although the document is dated on that day, it was not, as a matter of fact, signed by many of the defendants until long afterwards. Some of the signatures were obtained as late as the year 1913. The whole transaction was indeed, a very strange one. It appears that there was an earlier guarantee to the bank for £500; that a man named Ahern, who was manager of the Co-operative Society, asked the local bank manager to increase the amount to £1000 which he agreed to do, provided additional names were put to a new contract. The guarantee for £1000 now sued upon was then prepared by the bank's solicitor, and given to Ahern, who took the document away with him, and kept it and appellants understood that some sort of an agreement was brought to a completion by their act, for in their letter they wrote: "We also enter your order for 250 bundles, etc., March shipment." Baker, J., in Summers v. Hibbard & Co., 153 Ill. 102, 108-110 (1894).

In Poel v. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co., 216 N. Y. 310, 322-323 (1915) Seabury, J., for the court, said:

"Under well-established rules the instrument is to be construed as a whole, and effect is to be given to every word or expression contained in it where there is no irreconcilable conflict. Barhydt v. Ellis, 45 N. Y. 107; Kratzenstein v. Western Assurance Co., 116 N. Y. 54, 57, 22 N. E. 221, 5 L. R. A. 799. * * * This rule is applied with greater liberality where it appears that the printed matter is in obscure type or placed where it would not be likely to be seen or where the printed matter was evidently not intended to be incorporated in the contract. In such cases the printed matter has been accorded little influence in changing the clear and explicit language of a contract. Sturtevant Co. v. Fireproof Film Co., 216 N. Y. 199, 110 N. E. 440; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 327, 14 Sup. Ct. 94, 37 L. Ed. 1093; Summers v. Hibbard, 153 Ill. 102, 38 N. E. 899, 46 Am. St. Rep. 872; R. J. Menz Lumber Co. v. McNeeley, 58 Wash 223, 108 Pac. 621, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007. When the printed matter is not evidently intended to be incorporated in the contract and the understanding of the parties is doubtful, it is to be determined, as similar issues are determined, as a question of fact in the light of the surrounding circumstances. Sturtevant Co. v. Fireproof Film Co., supra; Clark v. Woodruff, 83 N. Y. 518, 522.

"In the present case the printed clauses are to the left of the signature of the defendant. They are printed in clear type, under a caption printed in type larger than the other type, which caption plainly reads: "Conditions on which the above order is given." The printed clauses are at least as plain and, as prominently displayed upon the face of the order [for the goods] as the written matter contained therein. They are not in conflict with that which is written. Under these circumstances they must be deemed to be a part of the order, and cannot be eliminated therefrom by the court upon an inference as to the intention of the parties which is not reflected in the order or in any evidence that was received upon the trial."

at the office of the society, where nearly all the defendants signed, their signatures being witnessed by Ahern.

At the trial Ahern swore that he explained the nature of the document to all the defendants whose signatures he witnessed, and that they all knew the purport of what they were signing. These defendants, on the other hand, positively denied this, and swore that they signed the document without being aware of its nature, and believing it to be of an entirely different character. Most of them swore that they were under the impression when signing the guarantee, that it was a receipt for manure supplied to them. Others said that they thought that it was a receipt of a dividend, while others said that they thought that it was for milk supplied.

MADDEN, J., at the trial, submitted to the jury a series of questions, as to the knowledge and belief of each of the defendants, according to the evidence given by each of them as to his state of mind when signing the guarantee. The jury found in answer to these questions that in the case of all the defendants, save one, the document was signed by them in the honest belief that it was one of an entirely different character from what it really was, and that it was signed by them without negligence on their part. The jury also found that none of the defendants, except Healy, knew that the document was a guarantee of any debt which the society owed to other persons. But upon one question (No. 7)—“Were the signatures of the defendants obtained by the fraudulent representations of Ahern that the document in question was one which did not involve them in any liability to the plaintiffs in respect of any money due or to become due by the creamery to the plaintiffs?” they disagreed. Upon the findings in answer to the other questions I have mentioned, however, the judge gave judgment for all the defendants (except Healy) as against the plaintiffs; and the question now is, was he right in so doing?

The principle of law which the learned judge evidently had in his mind when framing the questions for the jury, was that laid down by Byles, J., in delivering the judgment of the court in the well known case of Foster v. McKinnon, L. R. 4 C P. 704, namely this:—That where a party signs a document under a fundamental mistake as to its nature and character, and that mistake is not due to negligence on his part, he is not bound by his signature, upon the ground that there is, in reality, no contract at all binding him on his part. It is true that in Foster v. McKinnon, and I think also in nearly all the cases which have followed it, the cause of the error has been fraud on the part of some person, but this is due to the fact that such error as to the nature of the document can scarcely ever exist without fraud on somebody's part. The principle of the cases is not, however, that fraud vitiates consent, but rather that there is an entire absence of consent. That the mind of the party who signs under a fundamental error does not go with the act of signing, and that there is consequently no contract at all in fact. The defendant, if he succeeds, does so upon the issue non est factum, not upon the issue of fraud, though fraud, as I have said, is usually present, and is generally found by the jury to have existed. * * *

For these reasons I am of the opinion that the learned judge at the trial was right in giving judgments for the defendants upon the answers to the first six questions, notwithstanding the disagreement of the jury upon the question as to the fraudulent representations by Ahern; and that unless we set aside these findings in favour of the defendants the judgment in their favour should be allowed to stand. * * * On all the grounds therefore, I am of the opinion that the verdict and judgment should stand, and that the application for a new trial should be refused.⁹⁷

⁹⁷In Ford v. Stier, [1896] P. 1, a marriage was annulled where the petitioner, at the time of the marriage a girl of 17, went through the ceremony thinking it was a betrothal and never lived with the respondent.

In New York the negligence of a party in failing to read a paper which he signs will not preclude him from attacking it for fraud. Wilcox v. American Telegraph & Telephone Co., 176 N. Y. 115 (1903). But in Wisconsin, if the party was inexcusably ignorant of the contents of the paper which he signed, as where he did not read what was in plain sight because he was "too busy," although a stranger was asking him to sign, the court will not afford him relief even if there is some evidence of false representations. Standard Mfg. Co. v. Slot, 121 Wis. 14 (1904).

But where there is no fraud, the fact that the party, though able to read and write, and though not prevented from reading, chooses not to read (Chicago Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Hamler, 215 Ill. 525 (1905) or the fact that he does not know how to read the language in which the contract is written, but chooses not to seek the assistance of some one capable of reading it to him or translating it for him (Albrecht v. Milwaukee Superior Ry. Co., 87 Wis. 105 (1894)) will not prevent the contract from being valid.

So too "A contract entered into without full understanding of its terms can be ratified thereafter so as to make it binding upon the parties the same as if it was fully understood before its execution. Phelps v. Pratt, 225 Ill. 85; Hare on Contracts, 299." Carter, C. J., in Anderson v. Anderson, 251 Ill. 415, 420 (1911).

In a few jurisdictions in the absence of statute, and in a few others because of statutes, mistake of law is treated in the same way as mistake of fact, but in most jurisdictions mistakes of law, though with growing exceptions to the rule, are not a ground for relief.

"If all contracts made in ignorance of the law were to be held invalid, there would be no certainty in business, and no security in titles. All rights of property would be endangered; and the most important encouragements for industry and enterprise would be taken away. It is indispensable, therefore, that the obligation of contracts should be maintained, unless there is some stronger reason for annulling them than a mere mistake of the law. Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 407." Davis, J., in Jordan v. Stevens, 51 Me. 78, 80 (1863). The court there concedes that the distinction between mistakes of law and mistakes of fact is one of policy rather than of principle but says that "and yet it may not be the less necessary to maintain and observe it." (Id.) But in that case for other reasons relief was given.

BOULTON v. JONES.

(Court of Exchequer, 1857. 2 Hurlstone & Norman, 564.)

Action for goods sold. Plea.—Never indebted.

At the trial before the Assessor of the Court of Passage at Liverpool, it appeared that the plaintiff had been foreman and manager to one Brocklehurst, a pipe hose manufacturer, with whom the defendants had been in the habit of dealing, and with whom they had a running account. On the morning of January 13th, 1857, the plaintiff bought Brocklehurst's stock, fixtures, and business, and paid for them. In the afternoon of the same day, the defendant's servant brought a written order, addressed to Brocklehurst, for three 50-foot leather hose 2½ in. The goods were supplied by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's bookkeeper struck out the name of Brocklehurst and inserted the name of the plaintiff in the order. An invoice was afterward sent in by the plaintiff to the defendants, who said they knew nothing of him. Upon these facts, the jury, under direction of the Assessor, found a verdict for the plaintiff, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them.

POLLOCK, C. B. * * * It is a rule of law, that if a person intends to contract with A., B. cannot give himself any right under it. Here the order in writing was given to Brocklehurst. Possibly Brocklehurst might have accepted the act of the plaintiff in supplying the goods, and maintained an action for their price. But since the plaintiff has chosen to sue, the only course the defendants could take was to plead that there was no contract with him.

BRAMWELL, B. The admitted facts are, that the defendants sent to a shop an order for goods, supposing they were dealing with Brocklehurst. The plaintiff, who supplied the goods, did not deceive them. If the plaintiff were now at liberty to sue the defendants, they would be deprived of their right of set-off as against Brocklehurst. When a contract is made, in which the personalty of the contracting party is or may be of importance, as a contract with a man to write a book, or the like, or where there might be a set-off, no other person can interpose and adopt the contract. As to the difficulty that the defendants need not pay anybody, I do not see why they should, unless they have made a contract either express or implied. I decide the case on the ground that the defendants did not know that the plaintiff was the person who supplied the goods, and that allowing the plaintiff to treat the contract as made with him would be a prejudice to the defendants.

of the plaintiff, it may be that the defendants were not in a situation to return the goods.

PHILLIP v. GALLANT.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1875. 62 N. Y. 256.)

This action was brought upon an alleged contract between David Phillip, plaintiff's assignor, and defendant, for the completion of a house by Phillip, for the defendant. The making of the contract was denied. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the General Term. Defendant appealed.

CHURCH, CH. J.¹⁰⁰ The appellant insists that she is not bound by the contract of twenty-second of February, in respect to completing the building, for the reason that she supposed it contained a provision requiring the plaintiff's assignor to remedy defects which she alleged had occurred in the work done under previous contracts, and that she never agreed to the terms of this contract.

The referee, in his original report, found that the defendant, who does not understand English perfectly, was informed by one Trudo, who was present at the time, that by this new agreement David Phillip was bound to repair the defects she claimed existed in regard to the work already performed, which she believed, but that such statement by Trudo ⁹⁹ "It is the case of a country merchant, sending an order for goods to a person supposed to be in business; but in consequence of a change, the order is executed by another person. Upon this alone, the defendant would not have been bound, because he had made no proposal to the plaintiff, and he had a right to decide for himself with whom he would deal. But on being notified of this change, he assents to it and ratifies it; such ratification relates to the original order, and gives it the same effect, as if originally addressed to him. The letter accompanying the invoice, addressed to the defendant by the plaintiff, distinctly informed the defendant of the execution of the order by the plaintiff, and of his forwarding of the goods by the railroad to Greenfield. The receipt of the goods at Greenfield pursuant to this notice, and payment of the freight, are decisive proof of the assent of the defendant to the change in the execution of the order, and a ratification of the act of the plaintiff." "It is well understood that one may accept delivery of and make use of a newspaper, just as he may of other things, under such circumstances as to make a contract implied in fact." Dibell, J., in Legal News Pub. Co. v. George C. Knispel Cigar Co., 142 Minn. 413, 415 (1919).

Whether a paid for offer or "option" may be assigned to a third person depends upon whether it is personal in its nature or not, a question of construction. See Rease v. Kittle, 56 W. Va. 269, for a decision against the right to assign.

was made without the knowledge or consent of said Phillip or of the person who drew the agreement, and was not heard by either of them; that the agreement was read over twice carefully and distinctly to the defendant; that the same was executed in good faith and without fraud on the part of Phillip, and as he believed, contained the entire agreement between the parties. In a supplementary report the referee found that Trudo was nominally a clerk in the office of the person who drew the agreement, but that he occupied a separate office and did business for himself, and was not present at the request of the said person; that the defendant was informed that Phillip was only bound to do what he had agreed to do by that agreement; that while it was being read over Trudo explained it to the defendant in French, and told her that all the work would have to be done in a workmanlike manner, including what had been done, and that the defendant believed from Trudo's interpretation that the prior defective work would have to be made good. The referee did not consider the character or quality of work previously done, but held that this contract superseded the prior contracts, and that no claims could be made under them.

It is not claimed that there was a mutual mistake of the parties, so as to lay the foundation for a reformation, but that the defendant is not bound because she believed it obligated the other party to repair defects in previous work. The plaintiff was guilty of no deception in respect to the provisions of the contract; entire good faith on his part, and on the part of Mr. Barnard, who drew the contract, is found. It does not appear from the facts found but that she knew and understood what the provisions of the contract were, and the legal presumption is that she did. It does not appear but that she understood it herself as it was read, and if not, but that Trudo correctly stated the actual provisions of the contract. All that can be claimed from the facts found is, that Trudo construed the contract as imposing an obligation upon Phillip, to repair defects in previous work, and upon his opinion she believed it. The plaintiff was in no sense responsible for his misconstruction; indeed, it must be presumed to have been innocently made by Trudo. She adopted his opinion without calling the attention of the plaintiff to the subject. The point made by the appellant that she never made this contract cannot be sustained. The contract is in writing; it was read to her carefully; she was told that it contained the whole agreement on the subject. It would be a dangerous precedent to hold that under such circumstances a party was not bound. None of the authorities cited justify such a rule. By signing the agreement upon the construction of her adviser, without calling the attention of the other party or the scrivener to such construction, and thus inducing such party to execute the contract upon the supposition that it contained the true agreement, and that the defendant understood and assented to it, and especially as he proceeded to and did perform the contract upon such supposition, the defendant not notifying him of the claim that she construed it differently from what its language imported, she is precluded and foreclosed from insisting that it is not her contract. In the recent case of Smith v. Hughes, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597, cited by the learned counsel for the defendant, Blackburn, J., lays down the correct rule, which is, I think, applicable to this case. He says: "If, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would believe that he was assenting to the terms proposed by the other party, and that other party upon that belief enters into the contract with him, the man thus conducting himself would be equally bound as if he had intended to agree to the other party's terms."

The plaintiff's assignor had every reason to believe that the defendant understood the contract as he did. She acted in a way to induce that belief, and upon that belief thus induced, he executed and performed the contract, and she is bound by it. There are many cases where a party is thus bound, although not knowing or intending to agree to the terms. A familiar instance is in the case of bills of lading and the like, containing terms which the shipper does not read but by accepting which he induces the carrier to believe that they are assented to. The general rule that a party is not bound by the terms of a contract which he does not assent to is well established; but under circumstances like those developed in this case the party is bound, because he is deemed to have assented to the terms, and also because he has so acted as to induce the other party to enter into the contract and is therefore precluded from asserting that he did not assent. * * *

¹⁰¹In Bonelli v. Burton, 61 Ore. 429, 123 Pac. 37 (1912), the plaintiff and one Barber who spoke different languages and were obliged to rely upon an interpreter entered into a contract for the sale by plaintiff to Barber of certain land of which plaintiff did not know the value but Barber, a real estate agent did. Barber secured an interpreter, agreeing to pay him money, but there was no evidence that plaintiff knew that the interpreter was to receive compensation from Barber. The interpreter made false representations to plaintiff as to the number of acres of land contracted for and plaintiff believing him signed a contract to sell to Barber for $1140 his interest in the land, when in fact it was worth not less than $3000. Barber assigned his interest in the contract to defendant Burton who performed and got the deed but was not a bona fide purchaser. It was held that Barber had made the interpreter his agent in the negotiations to an extent that made him liable for the interpreter's misrepresentations and that plaintiff was entitled to have the contract and the deed cancelled on repaying the $1140 and interest and to have a reconveyance from defendant Burton, which was accordingly decreed. Moore, J., for the court said:

"When two parties, who speak different languages and cannot understand each other, voluntarily agree upon a third person to translate for them, they make the interpreter their agent, so that each has a right to rely on the communica-

RAFFLES v. WICHELHAUS.

(Court of Exchequer, 1864. 2 Hurlstone & Coltman 906.)

Declaration. For that it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants, to wit, at Liverpool, that the plaintiff should sell to the defendants, and the defendants buy of the plaintiff, certain goods, to wit, 125 bales of Surat cotton, guaranteed middling fair merchant's Dhollorah, to arrive ex Peerless from Bombay; and that the cotton should be taken from the quay, and that the defendants would pay the plaintiff for the same at a certain rate, to wit, at the rate of 17¼d. per pound, within a certain time then agreed upon after the arrival of the said goods in England. Averments: that the said goods did arrive by the said ship from Bombay in England, to wit, at Liverpool, and the plaintiff was then and there ready and willing and offered to deliver the said goods to the defendants, etc. Breach: that the defendants refused to accept the said goods or pay the plaintiff for them.

Plea. That the said ship mentioned in the said agreement was meant and intended by the defendants to be the ship called the Peerless, which sailed from Bombay, to wit, in October; and that the plaintiff was not ready and willing, and did not offer, to deliver to the defendants any bales of cotton which arrived by the last-mentioned ship, but instead thereof was only ready and willing, and offered to deliver to the defendants 125 bales of Surat cotton which arrived by another and different ship, which was also called the Peerless, and which sailed from Bombay, to wit, in December.

Demurrer, and joinder therein.

Milward in support of the demurrer. The contract was for the sale of a number of bales of cotton of a particular description, which the plaintiff was ready to deliver. It is immaterial by what ship the cotton was to arrive, so that it was a ship called the Peerless. The words "to arrive ex Peerless," only mean that if the vessel is lost on the voyage, the contract is to be at an end. [Pollock, C. B. It would be a question for the jury whether both parties meant the same ship called the Peerless.] That would be so if the contract was for the sale of a ship called the tion made to him by the other party through his representative. Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 483, 489, 56 Am. Rep. 901; Miller v. Lathrop, 50 Minn. 91, 93, 52 N. W. 274. An interpreter selected by adverse parties, who speak different languages and cannot understand each other, being the agent of both, his representations, made in their presence and hearing, in communicating to one what purport to be the expressions of the other, related in the regular course and prior to the termination of the business, are chargeable to each; and the other is entitled to rely on such representations."

Yet "Courts are always open to receive and enforce equitable considerations; and even in cases of unilateral mistakes, it has been held that the contract would not be enforced when it would be harsh to do so." Morris, J., in Buck v. Equitable Life Assn. Society, 96 Wash. 683, 688 (1917).

Peerless; but it is for the sale of cotton on board a ship of that name. [Pollock, C. B. The defendant only bought that cotton which was to arrive by a particular ship. It may as well be said, that if there is a contract for the purchase of certain goods in warehouse A., that is satisfied by the delivery of goods of the same description in warehouse B.] In that case there would be goods in both warehouses; here it does not appear that the plaintiff had any goods on board the other Peerless. [Martin, B. It is imposing on the defendant a contract different from that which he entered into. Pollock, C. B. It is like a contract for the purchase of wine coming from a particular estate in France or Spain, where there are two estates of that name.] The defendant has no right to contradict by parol evidence a written contract good upon the face of it. He does not impute misrepresentation or fraud, but only says that he fancied the ship was a different one. Intention is of no avail, unless stated at the time of the contract. [Pollock, C. B. One vessel sailed in October and the other in December.] The time of sailing is no part of the contract.

Mellish (Cohen with him) in support of the plea. There is nothing on the face of the contract to show that any particular ship called the Peerless was meant; but the moment it appears that two ships called the Peerless were about to sail from Bombay there is a latent ambiguity, and parol evidence may be given for the purpose of showing that the defendant meant one Peerless and the plaintiff another. That being so, there was no consensus ad idem, and therefore no binding contract. He was then stopped by the court.

PER CURIAM. There must be judgment for the defendants.

Co.*, 158 Mass. 124 (1892-3) where the dispute was whether grain in a burned elevator or in another one was covered by a description of the grain as in "the elevator building" of a company which owned one of the elevators and leased the other, Holmes, J., said: "Perhaps it will be pressing the principle of such cases as Kyle v. Kavanagh, 103 Mass. 356 and Raffles v. Wichelhaus, 2 H. & C. 906, too far to say that the description of the elevator containing the corn was one proper name in the mouth of the plaintiff and another in that of the defendant, and that therefore the policy was void and the supposed contract never made." In Scriven Brothers & Co. v. Hindley & Co., [1913] 3 K. B. 564, at an auction sale, tow was offered for sale but the buyer reasonably understood that hemp was offered and bid accordingly. After the goods were knocked down to the buyer he discovered the mistake and refused to take or pay for them. In this action for the price, A. T. Lawrence, J., said that the foregoing facts found by the jury "shew that the parties were never ad idem as to the subject matter of the proposed sale; there was therefore in fact no contract of bargain and sale" (p. 568). Action by the McCaull-Webster Elevator Company against Lee A. Steele and J. W. Steele, copartners doing business under the firm name of Steele Bros. From judgment for defendants and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

WHITING, J.¹⁰⁸ Plaintiff and defendants entered into a written contract whereby defendants contracted to sell and plaintiff to buy, at a certain agreed price, "5,000 bu. of good sound, dry and merchantable S. corn to grade 3Y, * * * said grain being now in my possession." "3Y" meant No. 3 yellow corn. This corn was not delivered, and, the market price of "3Y" corn being much above the agreed price at the time delivery should have been made under the contract, plaintiff sought a judgment in damages for the difference between such agreed and market prices. From a judgment for defendants and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff has appealed.

Defendants alleged that the corn that was in contemplation of the understood him to say $65. It was held that there was no contract. [See Hartford & New Haven R. Co. v. Jackson, 24 Conn. 514]. To the same head may be referred cases where a person, by mistake, enters into a different kind of agreement from that which he intended to make or supposed he was making; as where he signed a bond supposing it to be a mere petition, or which he supposed he was signing merely as a witness. See Thoroughgood's Case, 2 Coke 9; Foster v. McKinnon, L. R. 4 C. P. 704. To the same general principle may be referred those cases where, after the parties have apparently agreed to the terms of a contract, it is made to appear that there was a latent ambiguity in an essential word, by which one of the parties meant one thing, and the other a different thing, the essential word being applicable to both. See Raffles v. Wichelhaus, 2 Hurl. & C. 906; Kyle v. Kavanaugh, 103 Mass. 356. In all these cases it was held that there was no binding contract, because the minds of the parties had never met on its terms. But suppose, in Raffles v. Wichelhaus, there had been but one ship named Peerless, and hence no latent ambiguity in the terms of the contract; the defendant could not have been released from his contract merely because he had in mind, and supposed he was contracting with reference to, another ship of a different name." Mitchell, J., in Stong v. Lane, 66 Minn. 94, 97 (1896).

In Cargill Commission Co. v. Mowery, 99 Kans. 389 (1916), where plaintiff sued for failure of defendant to deliver 30,000 to 35,000 bushels of wheat defendant claimed mistake in use of code words whereby 30,000 to 35,000 bushels stated when 3,000 to 3,500 bushels meant. Plaintiff, however, in reliance on code messages, sold 35,000 bushels of wheat before learning of the claimed mistake, and, accordingly, the contract for the larger amount was held binding. The court said, however, that "Had the mistake been discovered and made known to the plaintiff before acting on the contract the error could have been corrected" (West, J., 99 Kans., at p. 396).

parties as the subject-matter of this contract was corn raised by defendants and standing in their fields at the time the written contract was entered into; that, when this contract was entered into, both parties believed that this corn would, at the time it was to be delivered test No. 3; that as a matter of fact it would not grade No. 3; that it was because of this mutual mistake that the parties entered into this contract; that plaintiff refused to accept this corn under such contract; and that, upon such refusal, defendants returned to plaintiff a check which had been given to them in part payment for such corn. The trial court, over objections, admitted evidence that fully established all of the above allegations of the answer. * * *

In this case it is perfectly clear that both parties were so confident that the corn, then in the minds of the parties, would fulfill the conditions as to grade, that they made no provision whatsoever as to what should be done if this corn would not test No. 3. They contracted in the full belief that defendants had in their possession 5,000 bushels of yellow corn that would, at the time for delivery, grade No. 3. No corn that would, by mere lapse of time, become No. 3 corn, was in possession of defendants. Both parties assumed, as the very basis of the contract, that corn that would fulfill this contract did exist in the possession of defendants. Being mistaken as to this essential fact, there was no binding contract. 13 C. J. 376; 6 R. C. L. 620; Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Co. v. Graham, 124 Va. 692, 98 S. E. 659; Muhlenberg v. Henning, 116 Pa. 138, 9 Atl. 144; St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Johnston, 58 Tex. Civ. App. 639, 125 S. W. 61.

Let us suppose that No. 3 corn had not been worth the contract price and defendants had gone out and purchased No. 3 corn and tendered same to plaintiff, plaintiff knowing such fact would have had the right to, and would undoubtedly, have refused to accept such corn for the very simple reason that it never agreed to buy any corn other than the corn in possession of defendants when the contract was entered into.

The judgment and order appealed from are ¹⁰⁴ "There was no subject-matter. The parties supposed there was a judgment, and negotiated and agreed on that basis, but there was none. Where they assumed there was substance there was no substance. They made no contract because the thing they supposed to exist, and the existence of which was indispensable to the institution of the contract had no existence." Graves, J., in Gibson v. Peikle, 37 Mich. 380, 381 (1877).

So in Galloway v. Galloway, 20 T. L. R. 531 (1914), the plaintiff and defendant, erroneously believing that they were married, entered into a deed of separation, and it was held that the deed was void because of mutual mistake of a material fact.

FALCK v. WILLIAMS.

(The Privy Council, on Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.
[1900] A. C. 176.)

LORD MACNAGHTEN. Mr. Falck, who was plaintiff in the action and is now the appellant, was a shipowner residing in Norway; Williams, the respondent was a shipbroker in Sydney, New South Wales.

Through one Buch, who was a shipbroker and chartering agent at Stavanger, in Norway, Falck did a good deal of business with Williams.

Buch and Williams corresponded by means of a telegraphic code, or rather a combination of two codes arranged between them. It was owing to a misunderstanding of a code message relating to one of Falck's vessels called the "Semiramis" that the difficulty arose which led to the present litigation.

Falck sued Williams for breach of a contract of affreightment to load the "Semiramis" with a cargo of copra in Fiji for delivery in the United Kingdom or some port in Europe. Williams understood the proposal made to him to be a proposal for carriage of a cargo of shale to be loaded at Sydney and delivered at Barcelona, and he accepted the proposal under this impression. It was conceded that both parties acted in good faith, and that the mistake was unintentional, whoever might be to blame for the misunderstanding.

The case came on for trial before Owen, J., and a jury. A verdict was taken by consent for the defendant. The amount of damages, if damages were recoverable, was fixed by agreement. All other questions were reserved for the full court. The full court dismissed the action with costs.

The first question is, Was there a contract? If there was no contract in fact, Was the proposal made on Falck's behalf so clear and unambiguous that Williams cannot be heard to say that he misunderstood it? If this question be answered in the negative, all other questions become immaterial.

The negotiation in reference to the "Semiramis" began apparently on February 7, 1895, by a telegram from Williams to Buch. Williams offered to load the "Semiramis" with shale at Sydney Wharf for Barcelona "at freight per ton dead weight 27s." Buch replied by telegram, dated February 9, asking £2250 as a lump sum for freight. On February 12 Williams offered 27s. 6d. "per ton dead weight." On the 13th Buch offered to accept that sum on the ships dead weight "capacity." By telegram on the 14th Williams explained that the rate offered was "per ton dead weight discharged." On the 15th Buch replied that the freight was to be payable "on guaranteed dead weight capacity," or to be a lump sum of £2100, adding a word interpreted to mean "Do your best to obtain our figures, vessel will not accept less." Then, on the 16th, Williams asked what was the guaranteed dead weight capacity of the ship. The answer on the 17th was "1550" tons. On the 18th Williams telegraphed, "Shippers will not pay more than they have already offered at per ton dead weight discharged." He also offered in the same telegram to engage a vessel to load shale at Sydney for Liverpool, at freight per ton dead weight 23s.

Having had no reply to his telegram of the 18th, Williams, on the 21st, telegraphed to Buch, "Why do you not reply to our last telegraph? It is very important that we have immediate reply" And he went on to offer to engage a vessel to load copra at two ports in the Fiji Islands, deliverable in the United Kingdom, or some port on the Continent, at 47s. 6d. per ton cargo delivered.

Then we come to the disputed message. On February 22 Buch telegraphed as follows: "Shale Copyright Semiramis Begloom Estcorte Sultana Brilliant Argentina Bronchil." That message with the code words interpreted runs thus: "Shale. Your rate is too low, impossible to work business at your figures. Semiramis. Have closed in accordance with your order.—Confirm. Two ports Fiji Islands. Sultana. Brilliant. Argentina. Keep a good look-out for business for this vessel and wire us when anything good offers."

On the following day Williams telegraphed, "Semiramis, we confirm charter." And, in accordance with his reading of the telegram of February 22, he at once proceeded in the name and on behalf of Falck to charter the "Semiramis" to carry a cargo of shale from Sydney to Barcelona. So the controversy arose. And after mutual explanations or mutual recrimination the action was brought.

Now, it is impossible to contend that there was a contract in fact. Obviously the parties were not at one. Obviously the acceptance by Williams as he meant it to be understood had no connection with or reference to the proposal which Buch intended to make and thought he was making.

But then, said the learned counsel for the appellant, the message of February 22 was too plain to be misread. An intelligent child would have understood it. Business cannot go on if men of business are allowed to shelter themselves under such a plea. Their Lordships are unable to take that view of the disputed message. When the message was sent there were three matters under consideration. There was the Barcelona charter for the "Semiramis," there was the offer for a Liverpool charter, and there was the Fiji proposal. Of these the most important and the most pressing was the Barcelona charter. True, the negotiation was at a deadlock for the moment, but the parties were so nearly at one that it was only reasonable to expect that they would come to terms, and it is to be observed that during the negotiation, which seems to have been unusually protracted, the "Semiramis" was never once mentioned in connection with any other voyage. Whether the appellant's view or the respondent's view be correct, the telegram of February 22 seems to deal with all three points. The appellant says that the first two words of the code message deal compendiously with both the Barcelona charter and the Liverpool proposal, and that the next three words deal with the "Semiramis," the last word of the three indicating clearly that she was to be sent to Fiji. The respondent says that the first two words refer to the Liverpool proposal, the second two to the Barcelona charter, and that the fifth word, "estcorte," is to be read with what follows. Indeed, the whole controversy when the matter is threshed out seems to be narrowed down to this question—"Is the word 'estcorte' to be read with what has gone before or with what follows?" In their Lordships' opinion there is no conclusive reason pointing one way or the other. The fault lay with the appellant's agent. If he had spent a few more shillings on his message, if he had even arranged the words he used more carefully, if he had only put the word "estcorte" before the word "begloom" instead of after it, there would have been no difficulty. It is not for their Lordships to determine what is the true construction of Buch's telegram. It was the duty of the appellant as plaintiff to make out that the construction which he put upon it was the true one. In that he must fail if the message was ambiguous, as their Lordships hold it to be. If the respondent had been maintaining his construction as plaintiff he would equally have failed.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal must be dismissed.¹⁰⁵

C. H. ABORN & Another v. SAME.

the plaintiffs, at Boston, for carriage to Dayton, Ohio. Verdict for plaintiffs. Defendants alleged exceptions.

MORTON, C. J. These three cases were tried together. In some features they resemble the case of Samuel v. Cheney, ante [135 Mass.] 278. In other material features they differ from it. They also in some respects differ from each other. In two of the cases, a swindler, representing himself to be Edward Pape of Dayton, Ohio, who is a reputable and responsible merchant, appeared personally in Boston and bought of the plaintiffs the goods which are the subject of the suits respectively. In those cases, we think it clear, upon principle and authority, that there was a sale, and the property in the goods passed to the purchaser. The minds of the parties met and agreed upon all the terms of sale, the thing sold, the price and time of payment, the person selling and the person buying. The fact that the seller was induced to sell by fraud of the buyer made the sale voidable, but not void. He could not have supposed that he was selling to any other person; his intention was to sell to the person present, and identified by sight and hearing; it does not defeat the sale because the buyer assumed a false name, or practiced any other deceit to induce the vendor to sell.¹⁰⁶

In Cundy v. Lindsay, 3 App. Cas. 459, 464, where the question was whether a man, who in good faith had bought chattels of a swindler who had obtained possession of them by fraud, could hold them against the former owner, Lord Chancellor Cairns states the rule to be that, "if it turns out that the chattel has come into the hands of the person who professed to sell it, by a de facto contract, that is to say, a contract which has purported to pass the property to him from the owner of the property, there the purchaser will obtain a good title."

In the cases before us, there was a de facto contract, purporting, and by which the plaintiffs intended, to pass the property and possession of the goods to the person buying them; and we are of opinion that the property did pass to the swindler who bought the goods. The sale was voidable by the plaintiffs; but the defendant, the carrier by whom they were forwarded, had no duty to inquire into its validity. The person who bought them, and who called himself Edward Pape, owned the goods, and upon their arrival in Dayton had the right to demand them of the carrier. In delivering them to him, the carrier was guilty of no fault or negligence. It delivered them to the person who bought and owned them, who went by the name of Edward Pape, and thus answered the direction upon the packages and who was the person to whom the plaintiffs sent them. Dunbar v. Boston & Providence Railroad, 110 Mass. 26. The learned judge who tried the cases in the Superior Court based his charge upon a different view of the law; and, as three cases were tried together, there must be a new trial in each.

¹⁰⁶ See Phillips v. Brooks, Ltd., [1919] 2 K. B. 243.

It seems to have been assumed that the same questions are raised in each case. It is proper that we should add that the third case differs materially from the others. In that case, the contract did not purport, nor the plaintiffs intend, to sell to the person who was present and ordered the goods. The swindler introduced himself as a brother of Edward Pape of Dayton, Ohio, buying for him. By referring to the mercantile agency, he tacitly represented that he was buying for the Edward Pape who was there recorded as a man of means. The plaintiffs understood that they were selling, and intended to sell, to the real Edward Pape. There was no contract made with him, because the swindler who acted as his agent had no authority, but there was no contract of sale made with any one else. The relation of vendor and vendee never existed between the plaintiffs and the swindler. The property in the goods, therefore, did not pass to the swindler;¹⁰⁷ and the defendant cannot defend, as in the other cases, upon the ground that it has delivered the goods to the real owner. Hardman v. Booth, 32 L. J. (N. S.) Ex. 105; Kingsford v. Merry, 26 L. J. (N. S.) Ex. 83; Barker v. Dinsmore, 72 Pa. St. 427.

Whether the defendant has any other justification or excuse for delivering the goods to the swindler is a question not raised by this bill of exceptions, and not considered at the trial; and therefore we cannot express an opinion upon it.

Exceptions sustained.

W. F. TURNER and Another v. O. M. WEBSTER.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1880. 24 Kan. 38, 36 Am. Rep. 251.)

Action brought by Webster against Turner and another, partners, to recover for services rendered the defendants. Trial at the January term, 1879, of the District Court, and verdict and judgment for plaintiff. The defendants bring the case to this court.

BREWER, J.¹⁰⁸ In an action commenced by plaintiffs in error, an attachment was issued, placed in the hands of the sheriff, and by him levied upon certain mill property. Pending the attachment proceedings, the sheriff, under direction of the plaintiffs in error, employed defendant in error to watch the property; and this action was brought by defendant in error, plaintiff below, to recover for such services. That the sheriff was authorized by plaintiffs in error to employ defendant in error, and that the latter performed the services, are conceded facts. The dispute is as to the compensation. Webster claims that the contract price was three dollars per day, and that it was worth that amount, while Turner & Otis say that they authorized the sheriff to contract for only one dollar and a half a day, and the sheriff says that that was all he promised to pay. The misunderstanding seems to have arisen in this way: After the attachment, Turner & Otis requested the sheriff to find some one to guard the mill. Meeting Webster, he asked him what he would undertake the job for. He replied, one dollar and one half a day, and nights the same. The sheriff understood him to say and mean, one dollar and a half for each day of twenty-four hours, while plaintiff meant that amount for a twelve-hour day, and the same for the night-time, or three dollars for every twenty-four hours. The sheriff reported the offer to Turner & Otis as he understood it, and they, after some hesitation, told him to accept the offer and employ Webster. Without further words as to the price, the sheriff gave the key of the mill to Webster, and told him to go ahead.

¹⁰⁷ So where the fraudulent person orders the goods by mail in the name of a responsible buyer, while the courts could take the view that there is a sale to the one signing the letter with the other's name, they take, instead, the view that the intention to sell to the person whose name is used is the fundamental intent and there is no sale. See Cundy v. Lindsay, 3 A. C. 459 (1878), cited in the principal case; Brighton Packing Co. v. Butchers, etc. Association, 211 Mass. 398 (1912); Phelps v. McQuade, 220 N. Y. 332 (1917).

Now the contention of plaintiffs in error is that the case turns on the law of agency; that they never personally employed Webster; that the sheriff was only a special agent with limited powers, only authorized to bind them by a contract to the amount of one dollars and fifty cents per day of twenty-four hours; that Webster is chargeable with notice of the extent of the sheriff's authority, and can enforce the contract as against the plaintiffs in error to the extent only of such authority. For any contract beyond that amount, the special agent binds himself alone, and not the principal. On the other hand, the defendant in error contends that, where services are contracted for and rendered, and no price stipulated, the law awards reasonable compensation therefor, and that, where there is a misunderstanding as to the price, the one party understanding it at one sum and the other at a different, there is no stipulation as to the price, and that it makes no difference whether the contract be made through an agent or with the principal directly. In the case at bar, he contends that it is immaterial that the conversation and misunderstanding were with the sheriff,—the agent—and that the rule is just the same as though the talk and misundersanding had been with Turner & Otis personally.

We think the case rests upon the propositions advanced by the defendant in error. It will not be questioned that, where the minds of two contracting parties do not come together upon the matter of price or compensation, but do upon all other matters of the contract, and the contract is thereupon performed, the law awards a reasonable price or compensation. Thus, where shingles were sold, and delivered, at $3.25, but there was a dispute as to whether the $3.25 was for a bunch or for a thousand, it was ruled that, unless both parties had understandingly contracted to one of these views, there was no special contract as to price. Green v. Batemen, 2 Woodb. & M. 359. It is said by Parsons, in his work on Contracts (vol. 1, p. 389), that "there is no contract unless the parties thereto assent; and they must assent to the same thing, in the same sense." Here, Webster never assented to a contract to work for $1.50 a day. Turner & Otis employed him to do that work, and knew that he did it; but their understanding was that they were to pay but $1.50 per day. In other words, the minds of the parties met upon everything but the compensation. As to that, there was no aggregatio mentium. What then, should result? Should he receive nothing, because there was no mutual assent to the compensation. That were manifest injustice. Should his understanding bind both parties. That were a wrong to them. Should theirs control? That were an equal wrong to him. The law, discarding both, says a reasonable compensation must be paid. So that if the negotiation had been between the parties directly, and this misunderstanding had arisen, the rule of reasonable compensation would unquestionably have obtained. Now how does the law of agency interfere? The proposition of law advanced by counsel for plaintiff in error, that a special agent binds his principal to the extent only of the authority given, and himself by any promise in excess, is clear. But the agent made no promise in excess of his authority. He promised that which he was authorized to promise. Because the other party misunderstood the extent of the promise, is surely no reason for holding the agent bound for more than he did in fact promise. The agent has rights as well as the principal. The work is not done for his benefit. He has discharged his agency in good faith, and to the best of his ability. Why should he be mulcted in any sum on account of the misunderstanding of the party with whom he contracted? * * * Justice is done to all parties by ignoring any promise or understanding as to compensation, and giving to the laborer reasonable compensation for the work done, and requiring the party receiving the benefit of such work to pay a just and reasonable price therefor.¹⁰⁰

The case was submitted to the jury upon this basis, and * * *

¹¹⁰ In Vickery v. Ritchie, 202 Mass. 247 (1909), Knowlton, C. J., stated the facts as follows:

"This is an action to recover a balance of $10,467.16, alleged to be due the plaintiff as a contractor, for the construction of a Turkish bath house on land of the defendant. The parties signed duplicate contracts in writing, covering the work. At the time when the plaintiff signed both copies of the contract the defendant's signature was attached, and the contract price therein named was $33,721. When the defendant signed them the contract price stated in each was $23,200. * * * The contracts were on typewritten sheets, and it is supposed that the architect accomplished the fraud by changing the sheets on which the price was written before the signing by the plaintiff, and before the delivery to the defendant. The parties did not discover the discrepancy between the two writings until after the building was substantially completed. Each of them acted honestly and in good faith, trusting the statements of the architect. * * *

"The auditor found that the market value of the labor and materials furnished by the plaintiff, not including the customary charge for the supervision of the work, was $33,499.30, and that their total cost to the plaintiff was $32,950.96. He found that the land and building have cost the defendant much more than their market value. The findings indicate that it was bad judgment on the part of the defendant to build such a structure upon the lot, and that the increase in the market value of the real estate, by reason of that which the plaintiff put upon it, is only $22,000."

The opinion stated that "In this case there was no express contract. The plaintiff's right is to recover upon an implied contract of an owner to pay for labor and materials used upon his property at his request" and ended as follows:

"The right of recovery depends upon the plaintiff's having furnished property or labor, under circumstances which entitle him to be paid for it, not upon the ultimate benefit to the property of the owner at whose request it was furnished.

"It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the fair value of his labor and materials."

By "implied contract" the court should have meant a contract implied-in-fact, whether it did so or not, for the measure of damages adjudged was the market value of the labor and materials furnished by the plaintiff, viz., $33,499.30, rather than the increase in the market value of the land, viz., $22,000, resulting from the erection of the bath house. There was a clear showing of the actual enrichment and a clear showing of the still greater value of the labor and materials. The selection of the contract implied-in-fact measure of damages necessarily was an assertion that there was an implied-in-fact contract, even though the court may have thought, as some suppose that it did, that it was enforcing a quasi-contractual obligation. See George P. Costigan, Jr., Implied-in-Fact Contracts and Mutual Assent, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 376, 386-390.

FRED W. AYER v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1887. 79 Me. 493, 10 Atl. 495, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353.)

EMERY, J.¹¹¹ On report. The defendant telegraph company was engaged in the business of transmitting messages by telegraph between Bangor and Philadelphia, and other points. The plaintiff, a lumber dealer in Bangor, delivered to the defendant company in Bangor, to be transmitted to his correspondent in Philadelphia, the following message:—

“Will sell 800M. laths, delivered at your wharf, two ten net cash. July shipment. Answer quick.”

The regular tariff rate was prepaid by the plaintiff for such transmission. The message delivered by the defendant company to the Philadelphia correspondence was as follows:—

“Will sell 800M. laths delivered at your wharf two net cash. July shipment. Answer quick.”

It will be seen that the important word “ten” in the statement of price was omitted.

The Philadelphia party immediately returned by telegraph the following answer:—

“Accept your telegraphic offer on laths. Cannot increase price spruce.”

Letters afterward passed between the parties which disclosed the error in the transmission of the plaintiff's message. About two weeks after the discovery of the error, the plaintiff shipped the laths, as per the message received by his correspondent, to wit, at $2.00 per M. He testified that his correspondent insisted he was entitled to the laths at that price, and they were shipped accordingly.

The defendant telegraph company offered no evidence whatever, and did not undertake to account for or explain the mistake in the transmission of the message. The presumption therefore is, that the mistake resulted from the fault of the telegraph company. We cannot consider the possibility that it may have resulted from causes beyond the control of the company. In the absence of evidence on that point we must assume that for such an error the company was in fault. Bartlett v. Tel. Co., 62 Maine 221.

The fault and consequent liability of the defendant company being thus established, the only remaining question is the extent of that liability in this case. The plaintiff claims, it extends to the difference between the market price of the laths and the price at which they were shipped. The defendant claims its liability is limited to the amount paid for the transmission of the message. * * * It contends that the plaintiff was not bound by the erroneous message delivered by the company to the Philadelphia party, and hence need not have shipped the laths at the lesser price.

This raises the question, whether the message written by the sender and entrusted to the telegraph company for transmission, or the message written out and delivered by the company to the receiver at the other end of the line, as and for the message intended to be sent, is the better evidence of the rights of the receiver against the sender. The question is important and not easy of solution. It would be hard, that the negligence of the telegraph company, or any error in transmission resulting from uncontrollable causes, should impose upon the innocent sender of a message a liability he never authorized nor contemplated. It would be equally hard that the innocent receiver, acting in good faith upon the message as received by him, should through such error, lose all claim upon the sender. If one, owning merchandise, write a message offering to sell at a certain price, it would seem unjust that the telegraph company could bind him to sell at a less price by making that error in the transmission. On the other hand, the receiver of the offer may, in good faith, upon the strength of the telegram as received by him, have sold all the merchandise to arrive, perhaps at the same rate. It would seem unjust that he should have no claim for the merchandise. If an agent receive instructions by telegraph from his principal, and in good faith act upon them as expressed in the message delivered him by the company, it would seem he ought to be held justified, though there were an error in the transmission.

It is evident that in case of an error in the transmission of a telegram, either the sender or receiver must often suffer loss. As between the two, upon whom should the loss finally fall? We think the safer and more equitable rule, and the rule the public can most easily adapt itself to, is, that, as between sender and receiver, the party who selects the telegraph as the means of communication shall bear the loss caused by the errors of the telegraph. The first proposer can select one of many modes of communication, both for the proposal and the answer. The receiver has no such choice, except as to his answer. If he cannot safely act upon the message he receives through the agency selected by the proposer, business must be seriously hampered and delayed. The use of the telegraph has become so general, and so many transactions are based on the words of the telegram received, any other rule would now be impracticable.

Of course the rule above stated presupposes the innocence of the receiver, and that there is nothing to cause him to suspect an error. If there be anything in the message, or in the attendant circumstances, or in the prior dealings of the parties, or in anything else, indicating a probable error in the transmission, good faith on the part of the receiver may require him to investigate before acting. Neither does the rule include forged messages, for in such case the supposed sender did not make any use of the telegraph.

The authorities are few and somewhat conflicting, but there are several in harmony with our conclusion upon this point. In Durkee v. Vt. C. R. R. Co., 29 Vt. 137, it was held, that where the sender himself elected to communicate by telegraph, the message received by the other party is the original evidence of any contract. In Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431, the message received from the telegraph company was admitted as the original and best evidence of a contract, binding on the sender. In Morgan v. People, 59 Ill. 58, it was said that the telegram received was the original, and it was held that the sheriff, receiving such a telegram from the judgment creditor, was bound to follow it, as it read. There are dicta to the same effect, in Wilson v. M. & N. Ry. Co., 31 Minn. 481, and Howley v. Whipple, 48 N. H. 488.

Tel. Co. v. Schotter, 71 Ga. 760, is almost a parallel case. The sender wrote his message, "Can deliver hundred turpentine at sixty-four." As received from the telegraph company it read, "can deliver hundred turpentine at sixty," the word "four" being omitted. The receiver immediately telegraphed an acceptance. The sender shipped the turpentine, and drew for the price at sixty-four. The receiver refused to pay more than sixty. The sender accepted the sixty, and sued the telegraph company for the difference between sixty and the market. It was urged, as here, that the sender was not bound to accept the sixty, as that was not his offer. The court held, however, that there was a complete contract at sixty—that the sender must fulfil, it and could recover his consequent loss of the telegraph company.

It follows, that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover the difference between the two dollars and the market, as to laths. The evidence shows that the difference was ten cents per M.

¹¹⁸ The authorities are divided on the point. In accord, see W. U. Tel. Co. v. Flint River Lumber Co., 114 Ga. 576 (1901). Contra, see Henkel v. Pape, L. R. 6 Ex. 7 (1870); Shingleur v. W. U. Tel. Co., 72 Miss. 1030 (1895). See also, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 419, note.

In Henkel v. Pape, L. R. 6 Ex. 7, 8-9 (1870) Kelley, C. B. said: "But the post-office authorities are only agents to transmit messages in the terms in which the senders deliver them. * * * The defendant cannot be made responsible because the telegraph clerk made a mistake in the transmission of the message."

"The explanation of the English cases [saying no contract] lies in the fact that in England the telegraph lines are connected with the postoffice and that according to Anglo-American law the government is not responsible for the negligence of its employees. It seemed unfair to hold the sender liable on account of the carelessness of the telegraph company without giving him any redress against the company." 27 Yale L. J. at p. 933.

ment between Goldsborough and Liverpool, alleging that the defendant agreed to transport five hundred bales of cotton for plaintiffs between those points at a rate of sixty-nine and a half cents per one hundred pounds and afterwards declined to do so, but charged eighty-nine and a half cents, which latter amount plaintiffs paid under protest, and brought suit to recover the difference between eighty-nine and a half cents and sixty-nine and a half cents. Defendant admitted that its agent at Goldsborough quoted a rate of sixty-nine and a half cents on October 20, 1891, and that plaintiffs accepted it, but alleged that this rate was quoted by a mistake of a telegraph operator in transmitting an authorization from J. H. Drake, defendant's general freight agent at Richmond, Va., to C. M. Levister, the local agent of defendant at Goldsborough, N. C., with whom plaintiffs dealt, for a rate of eighty-nine and a half cents. As delivered to Levister the message fixed sixty-nine and a half cents as the rate, and he offered that rate to the plaintiffs who accepted. Burwell, J., for the majority of the court, said:

"Assuming for the sake of argument that the local agent at Goldsborough was the mere mouthpiece or spokesman of the defendant in this matter, and that plaintiff knew this fact, then we have here a variance between the intention of the proposer (the defendant) and the expression of that intention. There was an error in the expression of the defendant's intention, but that error was unknown to the plaintiff. He had no good reason to suspect that the writing submitted to him did not correctly express the intention of the defendant. He did not 'snap up' an offer which he knew or suspected was erroneously expressed. He merely accepted a plainly-expressed proposition. In the view of the matter we are now taking, the question, then, is, if in the expression of the intention of one of the parties to an alleged contract there is error, and that error is unknown to and unsuspected by the other party, is that which was so expressed by the one party and agreed to by the other a valid and binding contract, which the party not in error may enforce? * * *

An essential bilateral error as to the nature of a contract avoids it if based upon such error, but a unilateral error will not have that effect. Bish. Cont. §§ 701, 702. 'It would open the door to fraud if such a defense was to be allowed. It is said that it is hard to hold a man to a bargain entered into under a mistake, but we must consider the hardship on the other side.' Tamplin v. James, 15 Ch. Div. 215. We must consider also that 'one of the remarkable tendencies of the English common law upon all subjects of a general nature is to aim at practical good, rather than theoretical perfection; and to seek less to administer justice in all possible cases than to furnish rules which shall secure it in the common course of human business.' 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 111. We think, therefore, that all evidence in regard to plaintiff's purchase of the cotton was irrelevant. He had a valid contract for its shipment at 69½ cents. His rights thereunder could not be affected by a notice that the defendant's agent had been misinformed as we have seen."

CLARK, J., in dissenting, said:

"There was no contract at 69½ cents. The mind of the defendant never entered into such. * * * The principal is only bound by the acts of its

BROOKE, J.¹¹³ This is an action for damages arising out of an alleged breach of contract to deliver certain stock. The contract is based upon three telegrams, as follows:

Exhibit B: "Western Union Telegram, Chicago, Ill. September 19, 1916. Received 3 P. M. J. William Foley, Wyandotte, Mich. We bid agents within the scope of their agency. The scope of Drake's agency at Richmond was to contract for rates. He made no offer at 89½ cents. He made no mistake. He has done nothing that fixes any contractual liability upon the defendant. Yet he is the only one who could have done so. The scope of the agency of the telegraph operator at Chase City, who, it seems, made the mistake, was not to make contracts, but to transmit messages. The defendant is only bound by his acts within the scope of its agency. Whatever damage the plaintiffs sustained by the mistake in relaying the message, the principal, the defendant company, is liable for; but not for a breach of a contract, since that agent could not make a contract if he had offered to do so, and certainly could not by making a mistake. In relaying the message he inadvertently took or erroneously transmitted six dots (.), the telegraphic marks for 6, instead of a dash and four dots (—), the sign for 8. This mistake of a dash for two dots was, so to speak, a lapseus pennae on his part. It was no mistake on the part of the contracting agent. The learning about unilateral mistakes has, therefore, no bearing, for there was no mistake on either side to the contract. The two sides simply never agreed. The defendant offered 89½ cents, the plaintiff thought he was accepting 69½ cents. Take a homely example: A landowner has an overseer, who is authorized to employ hands. The overseer sends a message by one of his employees to some one that he will give him employment for a year at $10 per month. By reason of carelessness, drunkenness, or stupidity the messenger says the overseer will give $30 per month. Could it be contended that the landowner must pay for a year three times the usual price for an ordinary farm hand? Not at all. He is bound by the act of his overseer, who is authorized to hire hands, in the absence of collusion and the like. But as to the messenger, the principal is bound by his mistake only to the extent of the damages actually suffered by the other party by relying upon the message before it is corrected."

But where the receiver of the telegram knew, or ought to have known, that there was a mistake in the telegram, his acceptance does not complete a contract. German Fruit Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co., 137 Cal. 598 (1902). Some courts overlook that rule, however. See J. L. Price Brokerage Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., (Mo. App.) 199 S. W. 732 (1917).

The rule against snapping up an offer applies, of course, also in other than telegram cases. See on accepting bid with knowledge of mistake as to subject matter, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, note.

In Tyra v. Cheney, 129 Minn. 428 (1915) plaintiff by mistake left an item of $963 out of his written bid for repair work on a school building, though it had been in an oral estimate given to defendant, and the trial court charged that if plaintiff by a fair preponderance of the testimony showed that the defendant knew of the mistake when he accepted the plaintiff might recover the reasonable value of the work, otherwise he could recover only the unpaid balance of the contract price. The jury found for the plaintiff the reasonable value of the work and in affirming the judgment on the verdict, Holt, J., for the court, said (p. 430):

"If cognizant of the mistake in plaintiff's bid, and that the latter was un-hundred fifty-two firm immediate acceptance fifty by-products. Wire confirmation. A. E. Butler & Co. Charge Acc't. JAB 1 P. M."

Exhibit C: "Western Union Telegram, Chicago, Ill. 1916, Sept. 20, P. M. 12:33 a249H 12 Coll Sibley, Mich., 1020A. A. E. Butler and Co., La Salle St., Chicago, Ill. Your bid one five two by-products accepted on forty-four shares. J. W. Foley."

Exhibit D: "Western Union Telegram, Chicago, Ill. September 20, 1916. J. William Foley, Sibley, Mich. We confirm purchase forty-four by-products hundred fifty-two. Please ship stock to-day. Draft attached. A. E. Butler & Co. Charge account 12:55 JAB"

Defendant failed to deliver the stock mentioned in the last two telegrams, and plaintiff, having made sale of the stock, was obliged to purchase the same in the open market at a cost of $792 in excess of the price mentioned in the contract. A jury trial resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $885.39. A motion was hereafter made by defendant for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which was denied. * * *

Defendant's entire contention as shown by the correspondence was based upon his claim that Exhibit C (his telegram of September 20, 1916) should have contained the word "subject," making the message read as follows:

"Your bid one hundred fifty-two by-products accepted on forty-four shares, subject." * * *

It is undisputed that Exhibit C was received by plaintiff without the word "subject." * * *

It is the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff, having chosen the telegraph company as a means of communication, and having asked an answer by telegraph, constituted that company its agent; and that therefore any error in transmission of defendant's reply (Exhibit C) should be aware of its occurrence, defendant had no right to claim that, when he told the plaintiff to go ahead with the work, their minds met upon the price mistakenly stated in the bid. Nor should plaintiff be allowed to profit by his own mistake so as to hold defendant to the oral bid. There was a failure to enter a binding contract. One cannot snap up an offer or bid knowing that it was made in mistake."

"Take the case of 'snapping up' too low an offer or bid knowing that the offeror has made a mistake and then, after getting performance, insisting on paying the erroneously offered low price. Even if it be thought that there cannot properly be said to be even an imperfect meeting-of-the-minds implied-in-fact contract in such a case, why is it not a situation calling for the finding and enforcement of a no-meeting-of-the-minds implied-in-fact contract? The thing done is done at request, is the very thing attempted to be contracted about, payment for it is contemplated—all these are tests of implied-in-fact contracts—and, if defendant is to be denied his unfair advantage under the express contract, clearly the implied-in-fact contract measure of damages is the sound one to apply. The plaintiff should not be compelled to show defendant's enrichment and should recover even if defendant was not enriched." George P. Costigan, Jr., Implied-in-Fact Contracts and Mutual Assent, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 376, 391.

chargeable to plaintiff. We are of the opinion that the authorities are clear that—

“The offerer takes the risk as to the effectiveness of communication if the acceptance is made in the manner either expressly or impliedly indicated by him.” 13 Corpus Juris. 301, § 117, and cases cited.

See, also, Jones on Telegraph and Telephone Companies, page 944; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511; Magie v. Herman, 50 Minn. 424, 52 N. W. 909, 36 Am. St. Rep. 660; Wilson v. Railway, 31 Minn. 483, 18 N. W. 291; Durkee v. Vt. Central Ry., 29 Vt. 127.

The difficulty with defendant's contention is that Exhibit C does not constitute an acceptance of plaintiff's offer, Exhibit B. It was, in fact, a counter proposition, and, as such, under the authorities, it operated as a rejection of the original offer. Mechem on Sales, § 299; Elliott on Contracts, § 41; 9 Cyc. 290; Johnson v. Federal Union Surety Co., 187 Mich. 469, 153 N. W. 788. By refusing to accept plaintiff's proposition for the sale of 50 shares and making the counter offer to sell 44 shares, defendant became the offerer, and under the authorities above cited constituted the telegraph company his agent; and therefore, if any error occurred in the transmission of the message, his remedy would be against the telegraph company, and not against the plaintiff.

It is claimed by defendant that Plaintiff's Exhibit D is not an unqualified acceptance of defendant's offer (Exhibit C) by reason of the addition of the words: “Please ship stock to-day. Draft attached.” With this contention we are unable to agree. The offer contained in Exhibit C was accepted without qualification in Exhibit D, and the added words are simply precatory and do not affect the binding character of the contract. 13 C. J. § 86, subsec. 2; Marshall v. Jamison, 42 U. C. Q. B. 115; Elliott on Contracts, vol. 1, § 39; Purrington v. Grimm, 83 Vt. 466, 76 Atl. 153.

PAUL FELTHOUSE v. BINDLEY.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1862. 11 C. B. (N. S.) 368.)

This was an action against an auctioneer for the conversion of a horse. Pleas, not guilty, and not possessed. A verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages £33, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the court should be of opinion that the objection was well founded.

WILLES, J.¹¹⁴ I am of opinion that the rule to enter a nonsuit should be made absolute. The horse in question had belonged to the plaintiff's nephew, John Felthouse. In December, 1860, a conversation took place between the plaintiff and his nephew relative to the purchase of the horse by the former. The uncle seems to have thought that he had on that occasion bought the horse for £30, the nephew that he sold it for 30 guineas, but there was clearly no complete bargain at that time. On January 1st, 1861, the nephew writes: "I saw my father on Saturday. He told me that you considered you had bought the horse for £30. If so, you are laboring under a mistake, for 30 guineas was the price I put upon him, and you never heard me say less. When you said you would have him, I considered you were aware of the price." To this the uncle replies on the following day: "Your price, I admit, was 30 guineas. I offered £30; never offered more, and you said the horse was mine. However, as there may be a mistake about him, I will split the difference. If I hear no more about him, I consider the horse mine at £30 15s." It is clear that there was no complete bargain on January 2d, and it is also clear that the uncle had no right to impose upon the nephew a sale of his horse for £30 15s. unless he chose to comply with the condition of writing to repudiate the offer. The nephew might, no doubt, have bound his uncle to the bargain by writing to him, the uncle might also have retracted his offer at any time before the acceptance. It stood an open offer, and so things remained until February 25th, when the nephew was about to sell his farming stock by auction. The horse in question being catalogued with the rest of the stock, the auctioneer (the defendant) was told that it was already sold. It is clear, therefore, that the nephew in his own mind intended his uncle to have the horse at the price which he (the uncle) had named—£30 15s.—but he had not communicated such his intention to his uncle, or done anything to bind himself. Nothing, therefore, had been done to vest the property in the horse in the plaintiff down to February 25th, when the horse was sold by the defendant. It appears to me that, independently of the subsequent letters, there had been no bargain to pass the property in the horse to the plaintiff, and therefore that he had no right to complain of the sale.

Then what is the effect of the subsequent correspondence? The letter of the auctioneer amounts to nothing. The more important letter is that of the nephew, of February 27th, which is relied on as showing that he intended to accept and did accept the terms offered by his uncle's letter of January 2d. That letter, however, may be treated either as an acceptance then for the first time made by him, or as a memorandum of a bargain complete before February 25th, sufficient within the Statute of Frauds. It seems to me that the former is the more likely construction, and if so, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot recover. But, assuming that there had been a complete parol bargain before February 25th, and that the letter of the 27th was a mere expression of the terms of that prior bargain, and not a bargain then for the first time concluded, it would be directly contrary to the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Stockdale v. Dunlop, 6 M. &

W. 224, to hold that that acceptance had relation back to the previous offer so as to bind third persons in respect of a dealing with the property by them in the interim. In that case Messrs. H. & Co., being the owners of two ships, called the Antelope and the Maria, trading to the coast of Africa, and which were then expected to arrive in Liverpool with cargoes of palm-oil, agreed verbally to sell the plaintiffs two hundred tons of oil—one hundred tons to arrive by the Antelope and one hundred tons by the Maria. The Antelope did afterward arrive with one hundred tons of oil on board, which were delivered by H. & Co. to the plaintiffs. The Maria, having fifty tons of oil on board, was lost by perils of the sea. The plaintiffs having insured the oil on board the Maria, together with their expected profits thereon, it was held that they had no insurable interest, as the contract they had entered into with H. & Co., being verbal only, was incapable of being enforced.

BYLES, J. I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add to what has fallen from my brother Willes.

KRATING, J. I am of the same opinion. Had the question arisen as between the uncle and the nephew, there would probably have been some difficulty. But as between the uncle and the auctioneer, the only question we have to consider is, whether the horse was the property of the plaintiff at the time of the sale on February 25th. It seems to me that nothing had been done at that time to pass the property out of the nephew and vest it in the plaintiff. A proposal had been made, but there had before that day been no acceptance binding the nephew.

Rule absolute.

HOBBS v. MASSASOIT WHIP COMPANY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1893. 158 Mass. 194, 33 N. E. 495.)

Contract, upon an account annexed for one hundred and eight dollars and fifty cents, for 2350 eelskins sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

HOLMES, J.¹¹⁶ This is an action for the price of eelskins sent by the plaintiff to the defendant, and kept by the defendant some months, until they were destroyed. It must be taken that the plaintiff received no notice that the defendants declined to accept the skins. The case comes before us on exceptions to an instruction to the jury, that, whether there was any prior contract or not, if skins are sent to the defendant, and it sees fit, whether it has agreed to take them or not, to lie back, and say nothing, having reason to suppose that the man who has sent them believes that it is taking them, since it says nothing about it, then, if it fails to notify, the jury would be warranted in finding for the plaintiff.

Standing alone, and unexplained, this proposition might seem to imply that one stranger may impose a duty upon another, and make him a purchaser, in spite of himself, by sending goods to him, unless he will take the trouble, and be at the expense, of notifying the sender that he will not buy. The case was argued for the defendant on that interpretation. But, in view of the evidence, we do not understand that to have been the meaning of the judge, and we do not think that the jury can have understood that to have been his meaning. The plaintiff was not a stranger to the defendant, even if there was no contract between them. He had sent eelskins in the same way four or five times before, and they had been accepted and paid for. On the defendant's testimony, it is fair to assume that, if it had admitted the eelskins to be over twenty-two inches in length, and fit for its business, as the plaintiff testified, and the jury found that they were, it would have accepted them; that this was understood by the plaintiff; and, indeed, that there was a standing offer to him for such skins. In such a condition of things, the plaintiff was warranted in sending the defendant skins conforming to the requirements, and even if the offer was not such that the contract was made as soon as skins corresponding to its terms were sent, sending them did impose on the defendant a duty to act about them; and silence on its part, coupled with a retention of the skins for an unreasonable time, might be found by the jury to warrant the plaintiff in assuming that they were accepted, and thus to amount to an acceptance. See Bushel v. Wheeler, 15 Q. B. 442; Benjamin on Sales, §§ 161-164; Taylor v. Dexter Engine Co., 146 Mass. 613, 615. The proposition stands on the general principle that conduct which imports acceptance or assent is acceptance or assent in the view of the law, whatever may have been the actual state of mind of the party—a principle sometimes lost sight of in the cases. O'Donnell v. Clinton, 145 Mass. 461, 463; McCarthy v. Boston & Lowell Railroad, 148 Mass. 550, 552.

Exceptions overruled.

JOHN F. WHEELER and Another v. A. W. KLAHOLT and Another.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1901. 178 Mass. 141, 59 N. E. 756.)

HOLMES, C. J.* This is an action for the price of one hundred and seventy-four pairs of shoes, and the question raised by the defendants' exceptions is whether there was any evidence, at the trial, of a purchase by the defendants. * * *

*The statement of facts and a portion of the opinion are omitted.

The evidence of the sale was this. The shoes had been sent to the defendants on the understanding that a bargain had been made. It turned out that the parties disagreed, and if any contract had been made it was repudiated by them both. Then, on September 11, 1899, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants that they had written to their agent, Young, to inform the defendants that the latter might keep the goods "at the price you offer if you send us net spot cash at once. If you cannot send us cash draft by return mail, please return the goods to us immediately via Wabash & Fitchburg Railroad, otherwise they will go through New York City and it would take three or four weeks to get them." On September 15, the defendants enclosed a draft for the price less four per cent, which they said was the proposition made by Young. On September 18 the plaintiffs replied, returning the draft, saying that there was no reduction of four per cent, and adding, "If not satisfactory please return the goods at once by freight via Wabash & Fitchburg Railroad." This letter was received by the defendants on or before September 20, but the plaintiffs heard nothing more until October 25, when they were notified by the railroad company that the goods were in Boston.

It should be added that when the goods were sent to the defendants they were in good condition, new, fresh, and well packed, and that when the plaintiffs opened the returned cases their contents were more or less defaced and some pairs of shoes were gone. It fairly might be inferred that the cases had been opened and the contents tumbled about by the defendants, although whether before or after the plaintiffs' final offer perhaps would be little more than a guess.

Both parties invoke Hobbs v. Massasoit Whip Co., 158 Mass. 194, the defendants for the suggestion on p. 197 that a stranger by sending goods to another cannot impose a duty of notification upon him at the risk of finding himself a purchaser against his own will. We are of opinion that this proposition gives the defendants no help. The parties were not strangers to each other. The goods had not been foisted upon the defendants, but were in their custody presumably by their previous assent, at all events by their assent implied by their later conduct. The relations between the parties were so far similar to those in the case cited, that if the plaintiffs' offer had been simply to let the defendants have the shoes at the price named, with an alternative request to send them back at once, as in their letters, the decision would have applied, and a silent retention of the shoes for an unreasonable time would have been an acceptance of the plaintiffs' term, or, at least would have warranted a finding that it was. See also Bohn Manuf. Co. v. Sawyer, 169 Mass. 477.

The defendants seek to escape the effect of the foregoing principle, if held applicable, on the ground of the terms offered by the plaintiffs. They say that those terms made it impossible to accept the plaintiffs' offer, or to give the plaintiffs any reasonable ground for understanding that their offer was accepted, otherwise than by promptly forwarding the cash. They say that whatever other liabilities they may have incurred they could not have purported to accept an offer to sell for cash on the spot by simply keeping the goods. But this argument appears to us to take one-half of the plaintiffs' proposition with excessive nicety, and to ignore the alternative. Probably the offer could have been accepted and the bargain have been made complete before sending on the cash. At all events we must not forget the alternative, which was the immediate return of the goods.

The evidence warranted a finding that the defendants did not return the goods immediately or within a reasonable time, although subject to a duty in regard to them. The case does not stand as a simple offer to sell for cash received in silence, but as an alternative offer and demand to and upon one who was subject to a duty to return the goods, allowing him either to buy for cash or to return the shoes at once, followed by a failure on his part to do anything. Under such circumstances a jury would be warranted in finding that a neglect of the duty to return imported an acceptance of the alternative offer to sell, although coupled with a failure to show that promptness on which the plaintiffs had a right to insist if they saw fit, but which they also were at liberty to waive.

¹¹⁶ "Now though it is true that if a stranger were to write and say to a person, 'If I do not hear I will send goods,' the omission to reply would be no evidence of a contract, yet it is different where two persons are actually engaged in dealing or under contract with each other. Then, if a proposal is made to which assent might be reasonably expected amongst men of business, and no answer is sent to it, acquiescence may be presumed." Pollock, C. B., in Lucy v. Moullet, 5 H. & N. 228, 233 (1860).

In Emerson v. Stevens Grocer Co., 95 Ark. 421 (1910) 105 Ark. 575 (1912) it was held a question for the jury whether silent retention of a check for an unreasonable time constituted acceptance of a counter offer which had been made in the form of a conditional acceptance of an offer, or was merely a retention awaiting negotiations.

In Cole-McIntyre Norfleet Co. v. Holloway, 141 Tenn. 679, (1919) retention of a solicited order for goods for two months with no notice of non-acceptance until delivery of the goods, which had risen in price, was requested was held to constitute an acceptance by acts, the principal by the authorized solicitation of the order being placed in a position where he must accept or reject promptly. Lanaden, C. J., said: "Delay in communicating action as to the acceptance may amount to an acceptance itself" (p. 1683) and, on rehearing, said:

"Acceptance of an offer may be inferred from silence. This is only where the circumstances surrounding the parties afford a basis from which an inference may be drawn from silence. There must be the right and the duty to speak, before the failure to do so can prevent a person from afterwards setting up the truth. We think it is the duty of a wholesale merchant, who sends out his drummers to solicit orders for perishable articles, and articles consumable in the use, to notify his customers within a reasonable time that the orders are not accepted; and if he fails to do so, and the proof shows that he had ample opportunity, silence for an unreasonable length of time will amount to an acceptance, if the offerer is relying upon him for the goods."

CARNAHAN MFG. CO. v. BEEBE-BOWLES CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon, 1916. 80 Or. 124, 156 Pac. 584.)

Action by the Carnahan Manufacturing Company against the Beebe-Bowles Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The defendant was a contractor for the erection of a building in Walla Walla, Wash., to whom the plaintiff agreed to furnish for use in the structure certain doors and interior trim under a written contract which plaintiff claimed had been modified.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

BURNETT, J.¹¹⁷ It was competent for the parties to modify their original contract which would amount to making a new agreement; but this later stipulation, like all others, must be one in which the minds of the parties meet on identically the same proposition. The record shows that the plaintiff proposed certain changes in the contract, but it does not show that the defendant accepted the offer. It was therefore error for the court to say to the jury:

"That a modification of a contract submitted and taken under consideration must be answered. If it is not answered, it is agreed to."

On effect of delay of principal in disapproving or rejecting orders for goods taken by agent subject to approval, see 7 A. L. R. 1686, note. On whether acknowledging receipt of order is acceptance completing the contract, see 10 A. L. R. 683, note.

"The case of Wheeler v. Klaholt, 178 Mass. 141, 59 N. E. 756 (1901), for instance, has offered serious difficulty from the express contract point of view. There the express offer was to sell for 'net spot cash at once' shoes which belonged to the offeror but by mutual mistake of the parties were in the possession of the offeree, the offer specifying that the offeree should return the goods 'immediately' or 'at once' if the offer was not accepted. Though net spot cash was not forthcoming, the court held that the jury could find from the silence of the offeree, and his failure to return the shoes for about a month, the previous relations of the parties calling for speech, an acceptance of an offer to sell, with payment, presumably, to be due at once without demand. That would seem to be binding the parties by a contract different from that contemplated by the express offer, but it may perhaps be an instance of a no-meeting-of-the-minds implied-in-fact contract, the conduct of the offeror being such that it must be given the interpretation 'Unless you send the cash or else in a reasonable time return the goods, you will be deemed to buy them and we shall hold you for the price,' and the offeree's silence and failure to return the goods in a reasonable time having the significance which the jury may see fit to attach to it. It is not intended here to defend the decision, but merely to suggest that as an implied-in-fact contract decision it is understandable, though as merely an express contract decision it is incapable of comprehension, let alone of support." George P. Costigan, Jr., Implied-in-Fact Contracts and Mutual Assent, 33 Harv. L. Rev. 376, 396, n.

¹¹⁷ The statement of facts is abbreviated and part of the opinion is omitted.

No one receiving an overture to change an agreement to which he is a party is obliged to answer the same. His silence cannot be construed as an acceptance if nothing else is shown. * * *

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.¹¹⁸

OSTMAN v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1917. 91 Conn. 731, 101 Atl. 23.)

Action by Frederick Ostman against Harry P. Lee. From an order setting aside a verdict for defendant, defendant appeals. No error.

PER CURIAM.¹¹⁹ * * * The plaintiff offered evidence to prove that the defendant, after examination, on May 5, 1915, agreed to purchase an old automobile belonging to him for $150, payable in two weeks; that the defendant took the automobile into his possession on the same afternoon, and still retains it, and has paid no part of the purchase price. The defendant offered evidence to prove that he agreed with the plaintiff to store the auto-

¹¹⁸ "It may be said that it [the offeree's President's silence] could not have constituted an acceptance in the absence of an agreement that such silence should have that effect." Settle, J., in Cincinnati Equipment Co. v. Big Muddy etc. Co., 158 Ky. 247, 256 (1914).

See Royal Ins. Co. v. Beatty, 119 Pa. St. 6 (1888).

In Prescott v. Jones, 69 N. H. 305 (1898) the defendant insurance agents wrote the plaintiff that they would renew his fire insurance policy on a building for a further term of one year unless notified to the contrary. Relying on that letter the plaintiff did not reply. The defendants, however, did not renew the policy and the building was destroyed by fire within the year. Blodgett, J., for the court, said:

"If, therefore, the defendants might and did make their offer in such a way as to dispense with the communication of its acceptance to them in a formal and direct manner, they did not and could not so frame it as to render the plaintiff liable as having accepted it, merely because he did not communicate his intention not to accept it. And if the plaintiff was not bound by the offer until he accepted it, the defendants could not be, because 'it takes two to make a bargain,' and, as contracts rest on mutual promises, both parties are bound or neither is bound. * * * All the plaintiff did was merely to determine in his own mind that he would accept the offer, for there was nothing whatever to indicate it by way of speech or other appropriate act. Plainly, this did not create any rights in his favor as against the defendants. From the very nature of a contract this must be so, and it therefore seems superfluous to add that the universal doctrine is that an uncommunicated mental determination cannot create a binding contract.

"Nor is there any estoppel against the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff relied upon their letter, and believed they would insure his buildings as therein stated. The letter was a representation only of a present intention or purpose on their part."

mobile until fall, free of charge, and if, upon examination, it was then found to be in good condition, and he could use it, he would purchase it, and pay for it $150, and that in November, 1915, he found the automobile was not what he could use. If the decision of the case depended exclusively upon the weight of these respective claims in the light of the probabilities, and of the character and quality of the testimony, we should hold that these were considerations for the jury, and that the trial court was without authority to substitute its judgment for that of the jury. But the defendant's own testimony was that he had kept possession of the automobile from May 5, 1915, to the trial, January 2, 1917, and had neither returned it to the plaintiff, nor told him to take it away, and that, although he had frequently passed the plaintiff's place of business, he had not called upon him or told him the automobile was unsatisfactory, but had advertised it for sale together with other property of his own.

Assuming that the jury found the agreement of sale as the defendant claimed, his subsequent conduct in not informing the plaintiff, in the fall of 1915, that the automobile was not in good condition, and that he could not use it, and in assuming ownership over it by keeping possession of it down to the trial, and by advertising it for sale as his own, constituted in law an acceptance of the automobile by the defendant. He cannot now be permitted to withdraw from a sale long since consummated. The ground of the decision of the trial court would be difficult to justify; the decision itself was right. * * *

EDWARD WHEAT AND OTHERS, v. LEMUEL CROSS.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1869. 31 Md. 99, 1 Am. Rep. 28.)

BARTOL, C. J.¹²¹ This suit was brought by the appellee to recover the price of a horse sold to the appellants.

The plaintiff resided in Frostburg, and the defendants were engaged in the business of buying and selling horses in Baltimore. The contract of sale was made by correspondence between the parties through the mails.

The facts of the case, so far as it is material to state them, were as follows: On the 23d of August, 1867, the defendants received the horse into their possession, to be sold on commission, at that time apparently sound and in good condition. On the 12th of September, 1867, they addressed a letter to the plaintiff, stating that the horse had been sick, but is doing well at this time, and offering $140 for him clear of all expenses, and saying, "you can draw on us at sight for $140." This letter was received on the 15th or 16th of September; on the 16th the plaintiff signified his acceptance of the offer by drawing on the defendants for $140. The draft was sent on that day, and on the 17th the defendants refusing to pay the draft, it was protested.

On the 16th of September, the defendants addressed a letter to the plaintiff withdrawing their offer of the 12th, stating that "when they wrote they did not think the horse was so bad, but since it has turned out to be 'farcy,' they would not buy at any price," and directing him "not draw on them for the money, that they will not pay the draft until they see how the horse gets." This letter was not received by the plaintiff till after he had accepted the offer contained in the letter of the 12th, by sending the draft.

In the argument of the case two positions have been taken by the defense—

1. That there was not such mutual assent between the parties as to constitute a binding contract, * * *

1st. On the first question, we consider the law well settled that where parties are at a distance from each other, and treat by correspondence through the post, an offer made by one is a continuing offer until it is received, and its acceptance then completes the aggregatio mentium necessary to make a binding bargain. The bargain is complete as soon as the letter is sent containing notice of acceptance. This rule applies where the offer and acceptance are unconditional.

The offer may be withdrawn, and the withdrawal thereof is effectual so soon as the notice thereof reaches the other party; but if before that time the offer is accepted, the party making the offer is bound, and the withdrawal thereafter is too late.

In this case it appears the defendants' letter of withdrawal was sent on the same day on which the notice of the plaintiff's acceptance of their previous offer was transmitted, and it has been argued that the onus is on the plaintiff to show that the sending of the acceptance preceded the sending of the letter of withdrawal. This position is not correct; it is quite immaterial to inquire whether the defendants' letter of the 16th, or the draft of the same date, was first sent.

Until the notice of the withdrawal of the offer actually reached the plaintiff, the offer was continuing, and the acceptance thereof completed the contract.

This point was expressly decided in Taylor v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co., 9 Howard 390. That was a case arising upon an insurance contract, but the reasoning of the court on this question, and the principles decided, are applicable alike to all contracts made by correspondence between parties at a distance from each other. There the terms upon which the company was willing to insure were made known by letter, and it was held "that the contract was complete when the insured placed a letter in the post-office accepting the terms." * * *

*Judgment [for the plaintiff] affirmed.*¹²²

OLIVE PICKERING v. JAMES C. PICKERING.

(Superior Court of Judicature of New Hampshire, 1833. 6 N. H. 120.)

This was an action of assumpsit, in which the plaintiff alleged, that, on the 27th November, 1802, one E. Pickering being seized of certain

"Thus the offeror may send goods with a letter stating the price and requesting no manifestation of acceptance from the offeree except that he shall take the goods and use them. If he does, there can be no doubt that though his use of the goods involves no attempt at communication with the offeror, a debt arises. It may be objected that though there is a sale and debt in such a case, there is no promise by the buyer and therefore properly speaking no contract; but it seems hard to believe that the law would not impose on the acceptor in such a case any obligation which the offeror requested and which the acceptor must be supposed to have intended to assume; and unless the acceptor can be held liable on a contract if what is requested by the offeror is a liability not enforceable as a debt, the offeror would be without remedy. Let it be supposed that bills of lading are sent with the statement that the offeree may take them if he is willing to accept bills of exchange to be drawn against them. It can hardly be supposed that a court would not hold the acceptor bound to honor the bills of exchange if he took the bills of lading." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 71, p. 126.

real estate, made his will, and devised certain lands to the defendant and E. P., provided the defendant should pay the plaintiff, annually, from the decease of the testator, the sum of twenty dollars, during her life; that the testator, died, on the 12th January, 1803; and afterwards the will was probated, and the defendant accepted the devise and promised the plaintiff to pay her said sum, according to the will. The jury returned a verdict for the amount of the legacy, from the death of the testator, to January 12th, 1831, and interest. The defendant moved for a new trial.

BY THE COURT.¹³³ * * * In general, no action can be maintained for a legacy against an executor, without showing a demand. 3 Pick. 218; 14 Mass. Rep. 431. The reason of this is, that it is not the duty of the executor to seek the legatee, but it is enough if he pay when the legatee comes and demands payment.

The question is, whether, in this respect, a devisee in a case like this, stands on any other ground than that on which an executor stands? We are of the opinion that he does stand on different ground. When he accepts the land he becomes a debtor, by reason of the land, for the legacy, and, like any other debtor, is bound to pay without a demand. He stands on the same ground as if he had expressly promised to pay.¹³⁴ * * *

Judgment on the verdict.

¹³³ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

¹³⁴ "The rule is thus stated in Porter v. Jackson, 95 Ind. 210: 'Where lands are devised to one who, by the will, is directed to pay a legacy, the legacy is charged upon the land devised; and, when payment of the legacy is made a condition of the devise, its acceptance creates also a personal liability to the legatee, which may be enforced without resorting to the land, the lien still remaining as a security.' * * * The rule rests upon the reasonable principle that he who takes a benefit under a will must take it subject to its provisions. Any other construction would necessarily defeat the intention of the testator. So that, where a devisee is required to pay legacies to others, an acceptance of the devise imports a promise to pay the legacies; and the legatees have the right to maintain an action thereon for its nonperformance, as though the promise had been made to themselves." Minshall, J., in Case v. Hall, 52 Oh. St. 24, 31-32 (1894).

"It is settled law that a devisee who accepts a devise charged with the payment of a legacy thereby becomes personally liable to pay the legacy, although the land is worth less than the amount of legacy. This liability is put upon the ground of an implied promise arising from the fact of acceptance; for the doctrine is that he who accepts a benefit under a will must conform to all its provisions, and renounce every right inconsistent with them. Brown v. Knapp, 79 N. Y. 136; Glen v. Fisher, 6 Johns. Ch. 33; Wiggin v. Wiggin, 43 N. H. 561; Porter v. Jackson, 95 Ind. 210. But when the devisee conveys the land subject to the charge the vendee stands, in respect of personal liability, much like one who purchases mortgaged premises subject to the mortgage, who does not become personally liable for the mortgage debt without a contract of assumption, evidenced in some way. But no particular form of words is necessary to create such liability. Any words that clearly import the assump-

JOHN WALL v. THE NIAGARA MINING & SMELTING CO. OF IDAHO.

(Supreme Court of Utah, 1899. 20 Utah 474, 59 Pac. 399.)

Action by John Wall against the Niagara Mining & Smelting Company of Idaho. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

BARTON, C. J.¹²⁵ The plaintiff brought this action to recover $3,000, with interest, alleged to be due upon a contract. It appears from the record that the plaintiff, Ole H. Petersen, Peter A. H. Franklin, Hans H. Petersen, G. E. Palen, and Sarah J. Vance were the promoters and incorporators of the defendant company. The articles of incorporation, tion of such obligation are sufficient to impose it, and the intention will be sought from the whole instrument, if the promise is to be gathered from a writing. The statement in a deed that the land is conveyed subject to mortgage does not, of itself, make the grantee personally liable for the payment of the mortgage debt. But if the statement is that the grantee assumes, or agrees to pay, the mortgage, then he becomes personally liable. So, by many authorities, certainly, when the purchaser agrees to pay a particular sum as purchase money, and on the execution of the contract of purchase the amount of the mortgage is deducted from the consideration, and the land conveyed subject to the mortgage, the purchaser is bound to pay the mortgage debt, whether he so agreed in express words or not, for this obligation results from the very nature of the transaction. Held v. Vreeland, 30 N. J. Eq. 591; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 749; note to Klapworth v. Dressler, 78 Amer. Dec. 83." Powell, J., in Hodges v. Phelps, 65 Vt. 303, 309-310 (1893).

In Olmstead v. Brush, 27 Conn. 530, 536 (1858) Ellsworth, J., said that in Lord v. Lord, 22 Conn. 602, the court had held that a devise with direction to pay a legacy created a personal charge on the devisee, "a private personal duty, founded on his election to accept and enjoy under the will" and pointed out that "we find in the books a class of conveyances, leases, etc., by deeds poll, in which some clause is inserted by the grantor, imposing a duty of some kind on the grantee which, if accepted, is held to create an implied obligation that the grantee is to comply with the condition. Not that the grantee covenants to do it, for the words are the words of the grantor, but if the grantee accepts the deed he assents to the condition in it, and becomes liable on an implied assumpsit to keep and perform it."

There is no personal liability beyond the proceeds of the property where it is provided that payment is to be made out of the proceeds. Hunkypillar v. Harrison, 59 Ark. 453 (1894); Funk v. Eggleston, 92 Ill. 515 (1879).

The doctrine about legacies applies also to debts. Gridley v. Gridley, 24 N. Y. 130 (1861) (defendant treated as sued on an "implied promise"); Baylor's Lessee v. Dejarnette, 13 Gratt. (Va.) 152 (1856).

If the devisee is only a life tenant an intention to make him personally liable is negatived, since the estate might terminate before he got any benefit. Decker v. Decker, 3 Ohio 157 (1827). See Case v. Hall Admr., 52 Oh. St. 24, 32-33 (1894).

which were signed by the promoters, were dated October 29, 1888, but were neither sworn to nor filed, as required by law, before December 3, 1888. The plaintiff, Ole H. Petersen, and Sarah J. Vance, on the same day (December 3, 1888), conveyed by deed to the corporation certain mining claims, which were described in the articles of incorporation, and accepted by the corporation as payment in full of its capital stock, which, according to the articles, consisted of 200,000 shares, of the par value of $10 each. Of this stock, Ole H. Petersen received 53,200 shares; the plaintiff, Wall, 66,666; Peter A. H. Franklin, 33,334; Hans H. Petersen, 133; G. E. Palen, 33,334; and Sarah J. Vance, 13,333. Each of the parties contributed to the corporation 25 per centum of his or her stock, making in all 50,000 shares as working capital. As appears from the evidence, neither Franklin nor Palen contributed property for their shares. On the same day (December 3, 1888) on which the articles of incorporation and the deed were executed and these arrangements made, the contract which has given rise to this controversy was entered into, by the terms of which, and in consideration of the conveying of the mining claims to the corporation, the plaintiff was to be paid, out of the first sale of the 50,000 shares of working capital, 35 per cent. of the proceeds until he had received $3,000. There appears to be no question that the working capital was sold for sufficient to pay the plaintiff's claim in accordance with the terms of the contract. Peter A. H. Franklin was named in the articles of incorporation as president of the company, and the contract was executed by the company through him. * * * After the organization was completed, the corporation retained the property conveyed by the deed, but failed to pay the plaintiff's claim under the contract. At the trial judgment was rendered against the defendant, and it thereupon appealed.

The most important question presented is whether "promoters," or persons who contemplate organizing a corporation, can make contracts which will bind it after it becomes a legal entity. It is contended by counsel for the appellant that a contract made for a corporation before it has an actual existence is not enforceable by or against it. This contention is too broad. It indicates that a corporation cannot, even in the exercise of its powers to make contracts, accept and adopt a contract made for it by the promoters before its existence as an entity. The legitimate sequence of this would be that a corporation, upon full and complete organization under the statute, might accept and adopt such a contract, receive and retain the benefits thereof, and at the same time be absolved from its burdens. We have no sympathy with a doctrine that would lead to such results; that might be employed as an instrument of fraud and injustice to the unwary. It may be assumed as true that promoters and incorporators have no standing in any relation of agency, since that which has no existence can have no agent, and, in the absence of any act authorizing them so to do, can enter into no contract, nor transact any business, which shall bind the proposed corporation after it becomes a distinct entity; but, notwithstanding this be true, still such promoters and incorporators may, acting in their individual capacities, make contracts in furtherance of the incorporation, and for its benefit, and, after the incorporation comes into being as an artificial person under the forms of law, it may, at least under the weight of American authority, accept and adopt such contracts, and thereupon they become its own contracts, and may be enforced by or against it. This the corporation may do, not because of an agency, on the part of the incorporators, before the existence of the entity, for there is none, but because of its own inherent powers as a body corporate to make contracts. Moreover, the adoption of such a contract need not be by express action of the corporation, entered on its minutes, but may be inferred from its own acts and acquiescence, or those of its agents, and there need be no express acceptance; or the corporation may be bound by the contracts of its promoters, if made so by its charter, which it has accepted and to which it was agreed. Unless, however, there be an acceptance and adoption thereof in some such way, the corporation will not, in general, be bound by the contracts of its promoters and incorporators, made for it before its complete organization. Where a contract is made by and with promoters, which is intended to inure to the benefit of a corporation about to be organized, such contract will be regarded as in the nature of an open offer, which the corporation, upon complete organization, may accept and adopt or do as it chooses; but, if it does accept and adopt and retain the benefits of it, it cannot reject any liability under it, but in such case will be bound to perform the contract, upon the principle that one who accepts and adopts a contract which another undertook to perform in his name and on his behalf must take the burden with the benefit. In Mor. Priv. Corp. § 548, it is said: "A corporation may, however, make itself responsible for such acts and contracts by subsequently adopting them. The liability of the corporation, under these circumstances, does not rest upon a supposed agency of the promoters, and a ratification of their acts, but upon the immediate and voluntary act of the company. If an agreement is made with promoters or persons about to form a corporation, and the parties intend that the corporation, when formed, shall become a party to the agreement, such agreement would usually constitute or include an open offer, which may be accepted by the corporation after it is formed. And this is true, whether the promoters are primarily liable or not." * * *

Which of the three instruments—the articles of incorporation, the deed, or the contract—was executed first does not appear, but it is shown that they were all completed on the same day. Thereupon the corporation, as appears, took possession of the property conveyed to it by the deed, and referred to in the contract, as the consideration for the $3,000 to be paid to the respondent, and has retained it, with the benefits accruing therefrom, during all these years, but has refused to pay the respondent, although it has sold the working capital admittedly for more than sufficient to pay him in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Under these circumstances, and in consonance with the principles of law hereinbefore considered, this corporation must be held to have accepted and adopted the contract, and to be bound by its terms. The fact that there is nothing to show that the contract was ever adopted at a meeting of the board of directors is, under the circumstances, wholly immaterial. * * * To permit the corporation to retain possession of the property and its proceeds, without paying the agreed price therefor, would be subversive of every principle of justice. In Seymour v. Association, 144 N. Y. 333, 39 N. E. 365, 26 L. R. A. 859, where similar questions were considered, it was said: "That no formal resolution of purchase was produced from the minutes of the corporation does not prove that there was none, and if, in fact, there was none, because the agreement to that effect preceded by a day or two the actual filing of the corporate certificate, at least the corporation ratified the proposed contract; for it accepted the deeds, took possession of the property, has sold it in burial lots, has kept it and its proceeds for more than 30 years, and put utterly out of its power by its own acts any possible restoration. It must, therefore, pay, or its possession becomes a robbery." * * *

*Judgment affirmed, with costs.*¹⁹⁶

¹⁹⁶ "It is also generally held that contracts by promoters made on behalf of the corporation, within the scope of its general authority, may be adopted by the latter after its organization. Some of the courts say they may be ratified; but ratification presupposes a principal existing at the time of the agent's action and it seems to us, therefore, that the term is not applicable in its technical sense. McArthur v. Printing Co., [48 Minn. 319], 51 N. W. Rep. 712; Spiller v. Paris Skating Rink Co., 7 Ch. Div. 368.

"With the exception of the law courts of England, the rule is also very generally recognized that if a contract be made on behalf of a corporation by its promoters, and the corporation, after its organization with a knowledge of the facts, accepts its benefits, it must take it with the burdens; and if the other party has performed the stipulation binding upon him, it may be enforced as against the corporation. Spiller v. Rink Co., supra; Loucke v. Warehousing Co., 6 Ch. 67. * * *

"Again, when the promoters of a corporation have made a contract in its behalf, to be performed after it is organized, it may be deemed a continuing offer on the part of the other party to the agreement unless withdrawn by him, and may be accepted, and adopted by the corporation after such organization; and the exercise of any right inconsistent with the non-existence of such contract might be deemed conclusive evidence of such adoption." Gaines, J., in Weatherford etc. Ry. Co. v. Granger, 86 Tex. 350, 354-355 (1894).

But in Pennell v. Lothrop, 191 Mass. 357 (1906) Knowlton, C. J., said: "In Abbott v. Hapgood, 150 Mass. 248, it was said that 'if a contract is made in the name and for the benefit of a projected corporation, the corporation after its organization cannot become a party to the contract, even by adoption or ratification of it.' This does not mean that after the organization of the corporation it cannot enter into a contract such as previously had been prepared. Holyoke Envelope Co. v. U. S. Envelope Co., 182 Mass. 171; Penn Watch Co. v. Hapgood, 141 Mass. 145; Abbott v. Hapgood, ubi supra. Such a contract, as between the incorporation and any other party would have its inception when entered into by the corporation, and would require, to make it valid, the existence of all such elements as are necessary in other contracts." .

CHAPTER III.

THE DOCTRINE OF CONSIDERATION.

James Barr Ames, Lectures on Legal History,¹ pp. 129-130, 144-147.

The mystery of consideration has possessed a peculiar fascination for writers upon the English Law of Contract. No fewer than three distinct theories of its origin have been put forward within the last eight years. According to one view, "the requirement of consideration in all parol contracts is simply a modified generalization of quid pro quo to raise a debt by parol."² On the other hand, consideration is described as "a modification of the Roman principle of causa, adopted by equity, and transferred thence into the common law."³ A third learned writer derives the action of assumpsit from the action on the case for deceit, the damage to the plaintiff in that action being the forerunner of the "detriment to the promisee," which constitutes the consideration of all parol contracts.⁴

To the present writer⁵ it seems impossible to refer consideration to a single source. At the present day it is doubtless just and expedient to resolve every consideration into a detriment to the promisee incurred at the request of the promisor. But this definition of consideration would not have covered the cases of the sixteenth century. There were then two distinct forms of consideration: (1) detriment; (2) a precedent debt. Of these detriment was the more ancient, having become established, in substance, as early as 1504. On the other hand, no case has been found recognizing the validity of a promise to pay a precedent debt before 1542. These two species of consideration, so different in their nature, are, as would be surmised, of distinct origin. The history of detriment is bound up with the history of special assumpsit, whereas the consideration based upon a precedent debt must be studied in the development of indebitatus assumpsit. * * *

Both in equity⁶ and at law, therefore,⁷ a remediable breach of a parol promise was originally conceived of as a deceit; that is, a tort. Assumpsit was in several instances distinguished from contract.⁸ By a natural transition, however, actions upon parol promises came to be regarded as actions ex contractu.⁹ Damages were soon assessed, not upon the theory of reimbursement for the loss of the thing given for the promise, but upon the principle of compensation for the failure to obtain the thing promised. Again, the liability for a tort ended with the life of the wrongdoer. But after the struggle of a century, it was finally decided that the personal representatives of a deceased person were as fully liable for his assumpsits as for his covenants.¹⁰ Assumpsit, however, long retained certain traces of its delictual origin. The plea of not guilty was good after verdict, "because there is a deceit alleged."¹¹ Chief Baron Gilbert explains the comprehensive scope of the general issue in assumpsit by the fact that "the gist of the action is the fraud and delusion that the defendant hath offered the plaintiff in not performing the promise he had made, and on relying on which the plaintiff is hurt."¹² This allegation of deceit, in the familiar form: "Yet the said C. D., not regarding his said promise, but contriving and fraudulently intending, craftily and subtly, to deceive and defraud the plaintiff," etc.,¹³ which persisted to the present century is an unmistakable mark of the genealogy of the action. Finally, the consideration must move from the plaintiff today, because only he who has incurred detriment upon the faith of the defendant's promise, could maintain the action on the case for deceit in the time of Henry VIII.

The view here advanced as to the origin of special assumpsit, although reached by an independent process, accords with, it will be seen, and confirms, it is hoped, the theory first advanced by Judge Hare.

The origin of indebitatus assumpsit may be explained in a few words: Slade's case,¹⁴ decided in 1603, is commonly thought to be the source of this action.¹⁵ But this is a misapprehension. Indebitatus assumpsit upon of any promises can hardly be much older than the middle of the sixteenth century. Bro. Abr. Act. on Case, pl. 72 [specific performance of contract, infra]. an express promise is at least sixty years older than Slade's case.¹⁶ The evidence of its existence throughout the last half of the sixteenth century is conclusive. There is a note by Brooke, who died in 1558, as follows: "Where one is indebted to me, and he promises to pay before Michaelmas, I may have an action of debt on the contract, or an action on the case on the promise."¹⁷ In Manwood v. Burston,¹⁸ (1588), Manwood, C. B., speaks of "three manners of considerations upon which an assumpsit may be grounded: (1) A debt precedent, (2) where he to whom such a promise is made is damnified by doing anything, or spends his labor at the instance of the promisor, although no benefit comes to the promisor * * * (3) or there is a present consideration."¹⁹

The Queen's Bench went even further. In that court proof of a simple contract debt, without an express promise, would support an indebitatus assumpsit.²⁰ The other courts, for many years, resisted this doctrine. Judgments against a debtor in the Queen's Bench upon an implied assumpsit were several times reversed in the Exchequer Chamber.²¹ But the Queen's Bench refused to be bound by these reversals, and it is the final triumph of that court that is signalized by Slade's case, in which the jury found that "there was no other promise or assumption, but only the said bargain;" and yet the judges of England resolved "that every contract executory implied an assumpsit."

Indebitatus assumpsit, unlike special assumpsit, did not create a new substantive right; it was primarily only a new form of procedure, whose introduction was facilitated by the same circumstances which had already made Case concurrent with Detinue. But as an express assumpsit was requisite to charge the bailee, so it was for a long time indispensable to charge a debtor. The basis or cause of the action was, of course, the same as the basis of debt, i. e., quid pro quo, or benefit. This may explain the inveterate practice of defining consideration as either a detriment to the plaintiff or a benefit to the defendant.

In one sense this inference is correct but in another sense it is incorrect. There are two kinds of consideration known to the law, and contracts not under seal may be divided into two classes, according as they are supported by the one or the other of these considerations; and yet either kind of consideration is sufficient to render any contract binding. In other words, all contracts not under seal are alike in respect to the consideration required to make them binding, but whether a contract belongs to the one or the other of the two classes above referred to depends upon the kind of consideration by which it is supported. These two classes of contracts are most easily distinguished by the actions by which they are respectively enforced, the action of debt being the original and proper remedy for one class, and the action of assumpsit being the sole remedy for the other class. The former class has existed in our law from time immemorial; the latter class had no legal existence (i. e., they could not be enforced by law) until the introduction of the action of assumpsit, it having been originally the sole object of that action to enforce a class of contracts for which there was previously no remedy. In respect to consideration, the former class of contracts requires that the thing given or done, in exchange for the obligation assumed, shall be given or done to or for the obligor directly; that it shall be received by the obligor as the full equivalent for the obligation assumed, and be in legal contemplation his sole motive for assuming the obligation; and, lastly, that it shall be actually executed, i. e., that the thing to be given or done in exchange for the obligation be actually given or done, it not being sufficient for the obligee to become bound to do it. Unless there is a consideration which satisfies each of these requirements, debt will not lie; and this is equivalent to saying that there is no binding contract according to the ancient law. Whether there is a binding contract at all, or not, depends upon whether there is such a consideration as will support an action of assumpsit. This latter kind of consideration may be best described negatively, namely, by saying that it need not satisfy any one of the requirements before enumerated. If anything whatever (which the law can notice) be given or done in exchange for the promise, it is sufficient; and, therefore, if one promise be given in exchange for another promise, there is a sufficient consideration for each. It is obvious that this more modern species of consideration was derived directly from the more ancient; that in truth it is the ancient consideration relaxed and reduced to a minimum. How and why this relaxation took place, it is not difficult to see. The ancient consideration was required for the creation of a debt because "debt" was the name given to the contract which had been borrowed from the Roman law. A debt (i. e., by simple contract) could be created, therefore, only in the mode in which a real contract was made by the Romans; and the consideration in case of a debt corresponded to the res which gave the name to the Roman contract. The consideration, therefore, was of the very essence of a debt,—was in fact what created it. But when the action of assumpsit was introduced, and a new class of contracts came to be enforced, it was neither necessary nor possible to require the old consideration to make the new contracts binding. It was not necessary, because it was neither supposed nor claimed that the new contracts created or constituted debts; and it was not possible, because the very reason why a new action was required to enforce these contracts was that they had not a sufficient consideration to support an action of debt. Some relaxation, therefore, was indispensable from the beginning; and the process having begun, there was found to be no satisfactory stopping-place until the result already stated was reached. It may be urged that a more rational course would have been to apply the maxim, cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex, and to hold that the action of assumpsit required no consideration to support it. To this, however, it may be answered, that the courts could not change the law by their own authority; that the action of assumpsit was the creature of a statute (13 Ed. i, c. 24), and was limited to cases which were analogous to cases for which a legal remedy was already provided; that promises not under seal and without consideration were not analogous to any contracts which had ever been enforced, and that to have enforced such promises would have been to put parol contracts on the same footing with specialties.

§ 47. But whatever may have been the merits of the question originally, it was long since conclusively settled in the manner stated above; and thus the action of assumpsit modified the old consideration instead of wholly superseding it; but so important were the modifications that the relationship of the new consideration to the old has been almost wholly lost sight of. Nay, the old consideration itself has been nearly lost sight of, though it is as necessary now as it ever was for the creation of a debt by simple contract. The reason is obvious. When the old consideration ceased to be necessary to the validity of any contract, it lost in a great measure its practical importance except to lawyers; and when by degrees assumpsit had superseded debt upon simple contracts, it ceased to attract the attention even of lawyers. The result is that the term "consideration" has practically changed its meaning; having formerly meant the consideration necessary to create a debt, it now means the consideration necessary to support assumpsit. It is in this latter sense that it now constitutes an important branch of the law of contracts. * * * The old consideration, however, should never be lost sight of by the student, as it furnishes the best, if not the only, key to the intelligent understanding of the new.

W. T. Barbour, The History of Contract in Early English Equity, (Oxford Studies in Social and Legal History, Vol. IV), pp. 59-65, 160-168.²²

A. The Doctrine of Consideration: The history of parol contracts raises two distinct problems: (1) How did parol contracts become actionable at all? (2) How did consideration become the test of the enforceability of such contracts? Before it is possible to classify agreements and determine what are enforceable and what are not, it must be first settled that a contract will support an action. Any classification or generalization is a matter for later consideration. In consequence, nothing but confusion will result if we fail to observe the historical sequence of these two problems.

Now the answer to the first question is to be found in the history of Assumpsit. Starting as an action on the case, it was extended after the struggle of a century from cases of misfeasance to cases of non-feasance. Throughout this struggle there appears no theory of contract, nor was it apparent even that the judges considered the promise as the basis of the action. The delictual origin of the action overshadowed its development. The result is that at the beginning of the sixteenth century Assumpsit has in fact become an action to enforce parol contract, but such an achievement is not realized by contemporary lawyers. The reason is to be found in the principle upon which the action was allowed. A detriment to the plaintiff was an essential condition to its use; or, stated differently, a breach of promise supported an action when, and only when, it could be regarded as a deceit to the plaintiff. There was still a very strong element of tort in the theory of the action.

Some time in the sixteenth century another principle obtained a foothold. Men begin to speak of consideration, of promises as made in consideration of some act or forbearance. The early history of this doctrine is wrapped in obscurity. We do not know how or when it made its first appearance, and there is much dispute as to its source. But we do know that the first use of the word at common law was in the action of Assumpsit, and that ultimately it became settled that no promise was enforceable unless it were made upon a valid consideration.

To-day in the interests of logic it is deemed advisable to resolve every consideration into a detriment to the promisee. Such a definition, however, does not meet the situation in the sixteenth century. The word was then of wider use than it is today; for when we now speak of consideration, only a valuable consideration is meant.

Historically, consideration seems to have meant any motive or inducement which was sufficient to support a promise.²³ It included such diverse species as (1) a benefit to the promisor, (2) detriment to the promisee, (3) a moral obligation, (4) natural love and affection. All of these are not found in Assumpsit, but it would be a mistake to confine the doctrine to that action. The quid pro quo which was essential to Debt became ultimately absorbed by the wider idea. Now in a certain phase, namely as a detriment to the promisee, consideration bears a striking resemblance to the original limitation in Assumpsit, the detriment to the plaintiff. But the question remains, is this more than an analogy? Is there any historical connection between the detriment to the plaintiff in Assumpsit, and the detriment to the promisee into which consideration was ultimately resolved? This is the crux of the matter. We may therefore notice three principal theories of the origin of consideration.

1. "The requirement of consideration in all parol contracts is simply a modified generalization of the requirement of quid pro quo to raise a debt by parol."²⁴

This is the theory advanced by Mr. Justice Holmes. But there are great difficulties in the way of its acceptance.

(1) It assumes that the doctrine started from a narrow basis and became widened. Originally a benefit to the promisor, consideration came to embrace the notion of detriment to the promisee. But there is no evidence that this is what happened. Consideration as a rule of contract made its first appearance in the action of Assumpsit, and not in Debt. If this theory be correct, then the basis of one action must in some way have become the basis of the other. From the sharp line which was always drawn between Debt and Assumpsit, it seems in the highest degree improbable.

(2) The consideration in indebitatus assumpsit was not a modification of quid pro quo, but identical with it.²⁵

(3) The idea of consideration as a detriment to the promisee never appeared in Debt; though repeated efforts were made to extend quid pro quo to cover detriment.²⁶

For these reasons we must reject this theory. It fails to take recognition of the wide idea embraced in the word consideration; it requires a transformation of quid pro quo which was never effected.

²³ Salmond, Anglo-Am., iii. 331.

²⁶ Salmond, Essays, 222.

II. Another theory is put forward by Professor Ames in a brilliant series of articles in the Harvard Law Review.⁸⁷ He there identifies consideration with the detriment to the plaintiff upon which the action of Assumpsit was founded. This theory has a certain decided advantage. It shows a regular and consistent development in Assumpsit culminating in the evolution of the principle of consideration from within the action itself. So far as the Year Book cases are themselves concerned it seems impossible of refutation. But the theory is open to the following objections:

(1) It assumes that consideration is identical with the detriment to the plaintiff. As we have already pointed out, there is a strong analogy between consideration when resolved into a detriment to the promisee and the limitation fixed in the action of Assumpsit. But this analogy does not mean that the principles are identical. It is submitted that Professor Ames has not demonstrated this identity beyond peradventure. The principles may be extremely close to one another, and yet have no historical connection.

(2) It does not account for all the species of consideration, such as moral obligation, for example. A moral obligation is no longer a consideration, but it was once. Moreover, a precedent debt was recognized as a valid consideration in indebitatus assumpsit. It is difficult to see how a precedent debt can by any contortion be twisted into a detriment to the plaintiff.

(3) This theory rests upon the assumption that the principle of consideration was a creation of the common law pure and simple. So keen is Professor Ames to emphasize this point that he is led to make certain unwarranted assertions with regard to equity. Not only does he contend that "in equity * * * a remediable breach of a parol promise was originally conceived of as a deceit,"⁸⁸ but he goes on to say that "chancery gave relief upon parol agreements only upon the ground of compelling reparation for what was regarded as a tort to the plaintiff or upon the principle of preventing the unjust enrichment of the defendant."⁸⁹ We shall take pains to examine both of these statements later on; it is believed that neither of them is correct. If, on the other hand, the Chancellor did exercise a general jurisdiction over parol contracts in the fifteenth century, if in fact he did evolve a principle upon which promises were held binding, it is surely fatuous to suggest that he borrowed this principle from the common law, which did not possess a general contractual action⁹⁰ till the sixteenth century. Furthermore, if parol contracts were so recognized in equity that alone throws considerable doubt upon the correctness of this theory.

(4) It should be noticed, finally, that all the early cases in Assumpsit involve a specific undertaking. There is no recognition of agreement or a bargain as such. Indeed, it was found necessary in Slade's case to resolve that every contract executory imported an Assumpsit. That is to say, the fact of agreement did not of itself "raise" any undertaking. In consequence we are forced to the position that originally every enforceable contract took the highly technical form of an undertaking. But does this seem a natural way in which a contract should arise? Men make informal agreements or "accordees" without troubling to incorporate them into a particular form. I venture to suggest that there were many such agreements which fell without the scope of undertakings; that, in fact, the theory which relies upon the "undertaker" fails to take account of many formless agreements which were the common experience of everyday life.

For these reasons we may question the theory advanced by Professor Ames. We can, however, state our objections with more effect after examining contract in equity.

III. Still another theory is advanced by Mr. Salmond.³¹ He refuses to admit that the doctrine of consideration was identical with the detriment to the plaintiff in Assumpsit. Rather does he think that it was not "a logical development from within the action at all, but was a ready-made principle imported ab extra."³² Now if we go back to the first cases in which Assumpsit lay for non-feasance, we find that the detriment to the plaintiff assumed one particular form.

He had parted with money on the strength of the defendant's promise, and that money had been received by the defendant. If, therefore, we shift our point of view, what on the one side appears to be a detriment to the plaintiff may on the other side be regarded as a benefit to the promisor. The theory that a promise is actionable because the promisee has incurred damage by relying upon it is essentially delictual. From the standpoint of contractual theory, a promise should be actionable if there were a sufficient ground for making it, regardless of whether or no the promisee had suffered damage from its breach. But in the specific case we are considering, the two principles amount to different ways of looking at the same thing. A promises to make an estate of lands to B for £50. B pays the money, but A fails to make estate. B has suffered a detriment, because he has parted with £50 on the strength of A's promise. On the other hand, there was a sufficient inducement for A's promise, namely the payment of £50. Mr. Salmond's contention is this: Somewhere outside the common law the principle was evolved that a promise was binding if there were a "legally sufficient motive or inducement for making it."³³

Now the promises which were first enforced in Assumpsit were only such as had a legal inducement; for the promisor had always obtained a direct benefit by the payment of money. It therefore became possible that the one principle should be substituted for the other. In short, the doctrine of consideration, already evolved, was thrust into the action of Assumpsit from without; and its entrance into the action was facilitated by the strong analogy which it bore to the limitation already engrafted on Assumpsit. This introduction of a foreign principle "breaks the logical continuity of the development" of the action.

This theory is certainly plausible. But it leaves two questions unanswered:

(1) How and when did consideration gain its entrance into Assumpsit if it came from without? This Mr. Salmond does not answer satisfactorily. Indeed, it is doubted whether this question can be answered at all. The reports do not show effectively the manner of appearance of consideration. In fact the doctrine is at first shrouded in mystery which it is very difficult to pierce. But if consideration was somewhere recognized as a principle before it was adopted in Assumpsit, the presumption that it was introduced from without becomes very strong. We therefore ask:

(2) Whence came the doctrine of consideration? Mr. Salmond asserts that it had become established in equity. This is the weakest point in his argument. He can produce few cases; he is compelled to reason from inference. An occasional hint from the Year Books, and a brief quotation or two from contemporary writers, are all he has to offer. This, it must be admitted, is not very convincing. Mr. Salmond is not to be blamed for this defect, for he has no access to the materials whence proof might be drawn. But it is at this very point that our real inquiry begins. The burning question, which has been largely ignored, is this: What evidence is there that parol contracts were enforced in equity, and if they were enforced, upon what principle or principles did the chancellor act? To this inquiry the second part of the present essay is devoted. * * *

³¹ Salmond, Essays in Jurisprudence, Essay No. IV.

B. Enforcement of Parol Contracts: In the Diversity of Courts it is written that "a man shall have remedy in Chancery for covenants made without specialty if the party have sufficient witness to prove the covenants."²⁴ I do not propose to introduce any further evidence in proof of this statement. I believe it has been shown that the chancellor did enforce certain parol promises, and that he did so upon the principle of reason and conscience. It is granted even by Professor Ames that the chancellor did enforce certain parol agreements, but this admission is qualified by the assertion that he did so "only upon the ground of compelling reparation for what was regarded as a tort to the plaintiff or upon the principle of preventing the unjust enrichment of the defendant."²⁵

If then it be said that the promisor is under an obligation to perform his promise, upon what principle did the chancellor enforce this obligation. Now every breach of contract which is accompanied by damage bears a strong analogy to a tort, if in fact it does not amount to one. But an obligation arising from a tort is plainly distinguishable from one arising from contract. In the one case it proceeds contrary to the will of the person bound; in the other it is in accordance with, and in fulfilment of, his will. Does the chancellor then enforce the obligation, because the breach of promise amounts to a tort to the plaintiff, or because he holds that one who has for legitimate cause made a promise ought to carry it out? In other words, in his analysis of agreements, did the chancellor proceed upon a principle of tort or of contract? This is the question which I shall endeavor to answer. But first I shall examine some illustrative cases.

1456. A was to marry B, daughter of C. It was agreed that A should make an estate of lands to himself and B, etc., and that C "for the * * * marriage and ioynture" should make an estate of lands to A and B and their heirs. The marriage took place; A made the estate to himself and B, but C refused to carry out his part. A accordingly brought a subpoena against C. The chancellor, after examining the evidence, decided that the matter set up in the petition was true and just, and decreed that, as B was dead leaving issue, C should make an estate of the land to A and his heirs.²⁶

1464-5. A made B "le proctour de son benefice et luy promise per fidem que il luy garderait indemne." A resigned the benefice to B's damage and B brought a subpoena for the breach of promise. The chancellor remarked: "Pur ceo que il est en damages par le non perfourmans de le promise, il avera remedy icy."²⁷

1467-1468. A was bound to B in an obligation of £100. B told A that if he would furnish C (B's son) with goods and money on request, he would make payment therefor. A furnished C with goods and money to the value of £94, receiving from C, in the name of his father, bills witnessing the delivery of the goods &c.; at the same time C promised on behalf of B that A should have deduction of £94 on the obligation of £100. Afterwards A tendered B the bills for £94 and £6 in money, and desired him to receive them on satisfaction of the obligation. B refused, and A brought a subpoena. Much evidence was introduced by both parties. The chancellor decided that A had proved his case, and that the obligation of £100 should be considered "vacuum et nullius valoris." Accordingly he ordered it to be cancelled.³⁸

1470-1471. A at the request of B and on his promise to save him harmless, became surety to C for the debt of D. D did not pay the debt, and in consequence A was threatened with suit by C. As B had died, A called upon B's executors to carry out the promise; but they refused. He accordingly brought a subpoena. The chancellor decreed that the executors should discharge A against suit from C.³⁹

What situation do these cases disclose? There has been a breach of promise by non-feasance which is succeeded by damage, immediate or prospective, to the promisee. This element of damage is frankly suggestive of tort. It would be possible, if we did not scruple to strain our reasoning, to resolve the gist of the cause of action into a tort to the plaintiff, even a deceit. Such would be the line of reasoning followed by the common law. But I do not think one could make a greater mistake than to impose upon the cases in equity the peculiar theory of the common law.

In the first place, why did the common law treat a breach of promise as a deceit to the promisee? I believe a ready and conclusive answer is found in the history of Assumpsit. Here we find another example of the manipulation of the substantive law through the exigencies of procedure. From the standpoint of contract, a breach of contract was a breach of covenant, but I scarcely need remark that a breach of covenant was actionable only in case the covenant was under seal. It was never suggested by any common law judge that a breach of covenant was a tort, a deceit to the plaintiff. Such reasoning was unnecessary. But the promise may be the same in essence whether it be under seal or no. A for £50 in hand paid promises to convey Blackacre to B. A breaks his promise. If the promise is under seal, Covenant lies, because the promise is broken. The law says in effect that one who makes a promise in a deliberate and formal way is bound to fulfill it, irrespective of the situation of the promisee. If, on the other hand, the promise is verbal, Assumpsit lies.⁴⁰ But herein the law adopts a different line. Assumpsit lies because by the breach of promise A has deceived B. It does this in order to bring a breach of contract within the scope of an action which sounds in tort. Thus on substantially the same state of facts the law adopts a contractual theory for breach of promises under seal, a theory fundamentally tortious for breach of verbal promises. There is no logical basis for this distinction; counsel and judges were aware of this, as the constant argument in the early cases in assumpsit, "this is a breach of covenant," bears witness. The distinction finds its justification in the history of the forms of action and there alone. Had the ingenious suggestion of Blackstone⁴¹ that Assumpsit is an action on the case analogous to Covenant, been literally true, the law might have adopted a different theory for parol contract.

In equity the situation is different. There was no procedural necessity for treating a breach of contract as a tort. There was no division into forms of action; there were no technicalities of pleading to obscure the real issue. We stand, so to speak, before breach of contract as a question of first impression. Analysis may lead us in the direction of tort or contract; but both ways are open, and there is nothing to compel us to take the one in preference to the other. I wish, therefore, to submit such evidence as I have been able to find which indicates the attitude of the chancellor in questions of contract.

1. The chancellor was an ecclesiastic, and probably carried with him into the chancery the principles and theories of the ecclesiastical courts. It is notorious that the ecclesiastical court did assume jurisdiction over laesio fidei. What more natural than that the chancellor should have proceeded upon the ground of breach of faith? There is at least a suggestion of this in the petitions. In *Wheler v. Huchynden*⁴² a pledge of faith is alleged, and it is quite common to find a petitioner saying that the defendant, "promitted by hie feith"⁴³ or "promytted by his feith"⁴⁴ or promised "on his faith and troueth."⁴⁵ In one of the cases⁴⁶ stated at length above, a promise "per fidem" is set forth. It would be venturesome, however, to assert that breach of faith was the sole ground upon which chancery took jurisdiction. It has been argued that if the chancellor proceeded upon this ground, "equity would give relief upon any and all agreements, even upon gratuitous parol promises."⁴⁷ I do not think it necessary to base the chancellor's jurisdiction on breach of faith alone; but that he did enforce gratuitous promises cannot be doubted.⁴⁸ In this connection however, I do not wish to consider breach of faith except in so far as it tends to point to the promise as the essential factor in the chancellor's consideration of parol contract. The fact that some petitioners take occasion to mention a pledge of faith, coupled with our knowledge that gratuitous promises were enforced, seems to me a very strong indication that chancery was employing a purely contractual principle.

2. If we turn to the petitions and notice the way in which complainants state their case, we find that it is the promise of the defendant upon which stress is laid. If in fact the chancellor did consider breach of promise a deceit to the plaintiff, it is very curious that pleaders who were constantly appearing before him do not make use of so convenient an allegation. But they do not do so. Rather do they say that the defendant has made a promise which reason and conscience require him to perform. The defendants refuse to make a conveyance "solonque leur covenantz,"⁴⁹ or "accordantz as covenantz et bargoyne suisditz,"⁵⁰ another defendant is asked "to shewe whi your seid besecher shuld not be content after promys made betwix them."⁵¹ Emphasis is laid upon the promise as the indispensable part of the case.

3. In certain cases the beneficiary brings the subpoena. These cases have been considered at length already;⁵² at this point I wish merely to refer to the significance of the right of action in the beneficiary. It seems to mean this. If there is sufficient cause for a promise which is deliberately made, the chancellor holds the promisor to his obligation at the behest of one who has a right to obtain some advantage from the fulfilment of the promise, although he is not the promisee. The principle upon which the subpoena is allowed cannot be "detriment to the promisee," for the complainant is not the promisee; it cannot be a "tort to the plaintiff," for there is nothing but a breach of promise. But there is a reason why the promise should be fulfilled, and this reason lies in the circumstances under which the promise was made; it is suggestive of the fundamental canonical doctrine of "cause." Marriage seems to have been an adequate "cause" for a promise, and it is for the enforcement of promises given for marriage that we most frequently find beneficiaries appealing to equity.

4. Again, if we look at the conditions under which an implied contract arises, some light may be thrown upon the whole question. The petitioner at the request of X became "pledge" to the king for a farm which X held of the king, and through X's default has had to pay.⁵³ Again, petitioner "atte request and praiser" of B became bound to C as surety for B's debt, and as B has failed to meet his obligation C called upon the petitioner.⁵⁴ A at B's request "undertook" for B in Ireland for certain customs; B inconsiderately sailed away and left A to meet his obligation.⁵⁵ In none of these cases is there an express promise, but a promise is raised by the relation in which the parties stand to each other. As the petitions phrase it, inasmuch as the petitioner has been put "in charge" for the duty of the defendant and at his request, reason and conscience require that the defendant should discharge him. Even where, under similar circumstances, there is an express promise, the same process of reasoning is adduced to support its enforcement. Reasoning, therefore, from the implied to the express contract, we may conclude that the promise is enforced because there is some imperative reason why the promisor should fulfil his obligation, and this reason is found in the circumstances under which the promise was made.

5. Finally, the suits brought for specific performance of contracts to convey land lend support to the view here advanced. While there are many cases in which the promisee has paid the whole purchase price, there are many others in which he has paid nothing, but alleges that he is ready to pay. The only damage sustained is the "loss of the bargain," that is, the loss of the advantage which would accrue to the promisee, if the promisor carried out his promise. The obligation is purely contractual; there is not the faintest suggestion of a tort.

For these reasons I believe that the attitude of the chancery towards contract was radically different from that of the common law before consideration became the recognized test of the enforceability of promises. The common law looked primarily at the promisee; it compelled him to show that he had sustained damage other than that which resulted directly from the breach of contract. He must convert the breach of promise into a tort, a deceit to himself. Chancery, on the other hand, scrutinized the position of the promisor. It asked whether he had made such a promise as in reason and conscience he ought to perform. In such an inquiry the benefit to the promisor or the immediate detriment to the promisee was a matter of secondary importance. It was forced into the background, while the promise and the circumstances under which it was made held the center of the stage.

It is with considerable hesitancy that I venture to make any generalizations, but an examination of the chancery proceedings has led me to the following conclusions. I believe that the chancellor held that one might make a valid promise to do anything which was reasonable and possible, and that the obligation resulting from such a promise ought to be performed because the promisor had deliberately and intentionally assumed the obligation.⁵⁶ By this I do not mean that the chancellor enforced any and all promises. But in his analysis of parol contract he did not require as an essential condition to a right of action that the promisee should have been deceived or that the promisor should have been benefited. Rather did he inquire whether the enforcement of a particular promise would further some general interest. If the promisor has led the promisee to alter his position on the strength of the promise, there lies upon him a moral duty to fulfil that promise. It is desirable, in the interests of the community at large, that such promises should be enforced. A pays B £50 for a conveyance of land, or upon B's promise to deliver a letter A entrusts the letter to him. The cases are different from B's point of view. In the first case he has received a benefit; in the second, there is no benefit. But in determining whether or no B shall be compelled to perform his promise, we look to some larger interest than that of the immediate parties to the contract. B induced A to give him the letter; he placed in A's mind a reasonable expectation that it should be delivered. Is it in the general interest that such an expectation should be fulfilled? The chancellor, I believe, determined that it was.

Closely connected with this factor is another. Some promises appear to have been enforced because of the object for which they were made. Thus money is promised for a marriage; the chancellor decrees that the promise must be performed. We might say that the promise is enforced because on the strength of it the promisee has entered upon marriage. But the fact that the beneficiary could bring the subpoena argues against this. I believe that such a promise was enforced because of the purpose for which it was given.

All this is admittedly speculative. One must be frank, and admit that it is impossible to determine absolutely the ground upon which chancery proceeded. But it seems to me that we are driven to seek the source of the chancellor's doctrines in the canon law. I have tried to state my reasons for thinking it impossible that the chancellor should have applied the theory of the common law. Hence we must look to the only other system from which he could possibly have borrowed his theory.

In the discussion of "consideration" which St. Germain places in the mouth of the Doctor, we find it stated that a promise, to be enforceable, must have a reasonable cause. This cause may consist in a material advantage to the promisor, or in the object for which the promise was made. I do not think we can completely parallel the whole classification of promises, as set forth by the Doctor, in the cases in equity, but I do believe that all these cases can be explained from the principles of the canon law. Therein seems to me to lie the only adequate and reasonable explanation. It is very probable that the chancellor as a judge in chancery did not proceed to the same lengths as he would have done in the ecclesiastical court. But when confronted with a new situation in chancery, he did apply so far as possible, the principles of that system in which as a churchman he was trained. This indirect reception of the canon law is not demonstrable with mathematical precision; it seems to me, however, that the whole line of decision in equity points unequivocally towards the canon law.

I have attempted to set forth the main outline of equitable jurisdiction in contract. Of the source of the chancellor's doctrines, the canon law, little has been said. But an investigation of the principles of the canon law with regard to contract is in itself a special study.

Roscoe Pound, Consideration in Equity, 13 Illinois L. Rev. 667-668.⁵⁷ In 1835 Sir Edward Sugden decreed specific performance of a post-nuptial agreement whereby a father undertook to make provision for his child by way of marriage settlement, although there was no common-law consideration and the agreement was not in the form of a covenant to stand seized.⁵⁸ As late as 1841 it was possible for able counsel to argue in the court of chancery that "a voluntary settlement, although void against a subsequent purchaser, was good as between the parties,"⁵⁹ and there was abundant authority to sustain the proposition.⁶⁰ In the older cases, even when the court did not go so far, it by no means required a common-law considera-

⁵⁷ The foot notes are those of the author quoted, but are renumbered.

⁵⁸ Ellis v. Nimmo, Lloyd & Gould, temp. Sugden, 333. The chancellor put it as a question "whether an agreement for a meritorious consideration, resting in fieri, is such a contract as a court of equity will enforce" (p. 345), and came to this conclusion: "I have before me a contract which I am bound to enforce if there is a sufficient consideration. The consideration is such as to enable the court to remedy even a defective settlement, where there is no contract. I think it a fortiori sufficient to sustain an actual contract, and I shall therefore decree specific performance of the agreement" (p. 349).

⁵⁹ Jeffreys v. Jeffreys, Cr. & P. 138, 139.

tion.⁶¹ In 1841 Lord Cottenham definitely laid it down that "the court will not execute a voluntary contract" and that "the principle of the court to withhold its assistance from a volunteer applies equally whether he seeks to have the benefit of a contract, a covenant, or a settlement."⁶²

Since Jeffreys v. Jeffreys, Lord Cottenham's statement has been accepted as the pronouncement of a general rule. But it has not been certain just what promises courts of equity regard as "voluntary" in this connection, nor how far there were not exceptions. Starting with the proposition that equity will not aid a volunteer and assuming it to mean that it will only act where there is a common-law consideration, we must admit, as the authorities go, at least six anomalous cases in which the proposition does not apply or is not wholly true.

These are:

- (1) A gratuitous declaration of trust without transmutation of possession;
- (2) A covenant to hold real property in trust for another in "consideration" of natural love and affection;
- (3) Cases of executory gift which the courts torture into cases of contract in order to enforce the gift;
- (4) Parol gifts of land where the donee takes possession and acts upon the gift;
- (5) Defective conveyances to a creditor by way of security, to a wife by way of settlement, or to a child by way of advancement, where there was no legal duty but on the basis of the moral duty equity gives reformation under circumstances amounting to specific performance of the promise; and
- (6) Options under seal.

⁶¹ Thus Lord Henley said in Wycherley v. Wycherley, 2 Eden 175, 177-8 (1763): "It is certain that in general courts will not compel the performance of voluntary agreements. An agreement, in its nature, imports a reciprocity and a quid pro quo, and where that reciprocity does not exist, the power of enforcing it does not exist. I do not mean the cases of specialties where the deed itself is evidence of a consideration. I say I know no instance where a court of equity has compelled a man to execute what was a mere act of volition. But I think the present was not a mere voluntary agreement, and the court will (and I am warranted by the precedents to say that it has done so) attend to slight considerations for confirming family settlement and modifications of property. They pay a regard to reasonable motives and honorable intentions. * * * They consider the ease and comfort and security of families as a sufficient consideration."

⁶⁴ "No man makes a promise for nothing, is the English rule. * * * The Scottish rule is simpler and more consistent with ordinary morality. A man has made a promise, therefore he ought to keep it. Why he made it is a matter personal to himself. The courts have only to make sure that he made it deliberately and knowing what he was about." J. W. form as much as a seal.⁶⁵ The only difference is that one form [i. e., consideration] is of modern introduction, and has a foundation in good sense, or at least falls in with our common habits of thought, so that we do not notice it,⁶⁶ whereas the other [i. e., the seal] is a survival from an older condition of the law, and is less manifestly sensible or less familiar."

SIR ANTHONY STURLYN v. ALBANY.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1587. Cro. Eliz. 67.)

Assumpsit. The case was, the plaintiff had made a lease to J. S. of land for life rendering rent. J. S. grants all his estate to the defendant; the rent was behind for divers years; the plaintiff demands the rent of the defendant, who assumed that if the plaintiff could show to him a deed that the rent was due, that he would pay to him the rent and the arrearages; the plaintiff alleged that upon such a day of, etc., at Warwick, he showed unto him the indenture of lease, by which the rent was due, and notwithstanding he had not paid him the rent and the arrearages due for four years. Upon non assumpsit pleaded it was found for the plaintiff, and damages assessed to so much as the rent and arrearages did amount unto. And it was moved in arrest of judgment, [1] that there was no consideration to ground an action, for it is but the showing of the deed, which is no consideration. 2. The damages ought only to be assessed for the time the rent was behind, and not for the rent and the arrearages, for he hath other remedy for the rent; and a recovery in this action shall be no bar in another action. But it was adjudged for the plaintiff, for when a thing is to be done by the plaintiff, be it never so small, this is a sufficient consideration to ground an action, and here the showing of the deed is a cause to avoid suit, and the rent and arrearages may be assessed all in damages; but they took order that the plaintiff should release to the defendant all the arrearages of rent before execution should be awarded. Nota. In this case it was alleged that it hath been adjudged, when one assumeth to another, that if he can show him an obligation in which he was bound to him, that he would pay him, and he did show the obligation, etc., that no action lieth upon this assumpsit; which was affirmed by the justices.

⁶⁵ See a similar statement by Justice Holmes in Krell v. Codman, 154 Mass. 154 (1891), where the fact that in general the courts will not inquire into the adequacy of consideration is mentioned, and it is said: "This being so, consideration is as much a form as a seal."

⁶⁶ "Whatever view may be taken of the suitability of 'consideration' as the test of simple contract, it cannot be denied that it has the singular merit of appealing to the average man, and further, of being remarkably easy for a court mainly concerned with material interests to apply. It avoids all difficult and unsatisfactory enquiries about intention and other mental elements; and substitutes a broad external standard of the kind beloved by the Common Law." Edward Jenks, A Short History of English Law, 298. One may accept most of the first sentence of that statement without sharing the enthusiasm of the second.

BRET v. J. S. and WIFE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1600. Cro. Eliz. 756.)

Assumpsit, the case was that William Dracot, first husband to the feme, sent his son to table with the plaintiff for three years, and agreed to give unto him, for every year £8, and died within the year. The feme, during her widowhood, in consideration of her natural affection to the son, and in consideration that the son should continue during the residue of the time with the plaintiff, promised to the plaintiff to pay unto him £6 13s. 4d. for the tabling of the son for the time past, and £8 for every year after that he should continue there with the plaintiff; afterwards she married the defendant, and the plaintiff brought his action as well for the £6 13s. 4d. as for the tabling for the two years following. Warberton moved that this action lay not. First, because it was an entire contract by her first husband for the entire year, which cannot be apportioned. Secondly, because natural affection is not sufficient to ground an assumpsit without quid pro quo. Thirdly, that this is a contract, for which action of debt lies, and not this action. But all the court held that it well lay. For as to the first, it is well apportionable; because it being for tabling, which he had taken, there ought to be a recompense, although he departed within the year, or that the contractor died within the year. To the second they agreed, that natural affection of itself is not a sufficient consideration to ground an assumpsit; for although it be sufficient to raise an use, yet it is not sufficient to ground an action, without an express quid pro quo. But it is here good, because it is not only in consideration of affection, but that her son should afterwards continue at his table, which is good as well for the money due before, as for what should afterwards become due. And as to the third, true it is, that if the contract had been only for the tabling afterwards, then debt would have lain, and not this action, but in regard it is conjoined with another thing, for which he could not have an action of debt (as it is here for this £6 13s. 4d.), an action upon the case lies for all (as debt with other things may be put into an arbitrament). Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.

MAYLARD v. KESTER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1601. Moore, 711.)

Maylard brings action on the case against Kester on assumpsit, in consideration that he would sell and deliver to Kester woollen cloth for the funeral of a clerk, Kester assumed to pay him cum inde requisitus. And alleges that he sold and delivered divers cloth to him at various prices, viz., thirty-one black striped garments for £19, and so he recites other lots in the same manner, and the sum amounted to £160, which he requested Kester to pay, and he did not pay according to the promise and assumption aforesaid. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and verdict was for the plaintiff, and judgment given. And on writ of error brought, the judgment was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, Michaelmas Term, 41 & 42 Elizabeth, because debt properly lies, and not action on the case, the matter proving a perfect sale and contract.

SLADE'S CASE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1602. 4 Coke 92b.)

John Slade brought an action on the case in the King's Bench against Humphrey Morley (which plea began Hil. 38 Eliz. Rot. 305), and declared, that whereas the plaintiff, 10th of November, 36 Eliz. was possessed of a close of land in Halberton, in the county of Devon, called Rack Park, containing by estimation eight acres for the term of divers years then and yet to come, and being so possessed, the plaintiff the said 10th day of November, the said close had sowed with wheat and rye, which wheat and rye, 8 Maii, 37 Eliz. were grown into blades, the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the said Humphrey, had bargained and sold to him the said blades of wheat and rye growing upon the said close (the tithes due to the rector, &c. excepted), assumed and promised the plaintiff to pay him £16 at the feast of St. John the Baptist then to come; and for non-payment thereof at the said feast of St. John Baptist, the plaintiff brought the said action; the defendant pleaded non assumpsit modo et forma; and on the trial of this issue the jurors gave a special verdict, sc., that the defendant bought of the plaintiff the wheat and rye in blades growing upon the said close as is aforesaid, prout in the said declaration is alleged, and further found, that between the plaintiff and the defendant there was no other promise or assumption but only the said bargain. * * * And after many conferences between the Justices [of the King's Bench and of the Common Pleas] and [the] Barons [of the Exchequer] it was resolved,⁶⁷ that the action was maintainable, and that the plaintiff should have judgment. And in this case these points were resolved:

1. That although an action of debt lies upon the contract, yet the bargainer may have an action on the case, or an action of debt at his election.

⁶⁷ Parts of the report of the case are omitted.

3. It was resolved, that every contract executory imports in itself an assumpsit, for when one agrees to pay money, or to deliver anything, thereby he assumes or promises to pay, or deliver it, and therefore when one sells any goods to another, and agrees to deliver them at a day to come, and the other in consideration thereof agrees to pay so much money as such a day, in that case both parties may have an action of debt, or an action on the case on assumpsit, for the mutual executory agreement of both parties imports in itself reciprocal actions upon the case, as well as actions of debt, and therewith agrees the judgment in Read and Norwood's case, Pl. Com. 128.

4. It was resolved, that the plaintiff in this action on the case on assumpsit should not recover only damages for the special loss (if any be) which he had, but also for the whole debt, so that a recovery or bar in this action would be a good bar in an action of debt brought upon the same contract; so vice versa, a recovery or bar in an action of debt, is a good bar in an action on the case on assumpsit. Vide 12 E. 4. 13 a. 2 R. 3. 14. (32) 33 H. 8. Action sur le case. Br. 105.

5. In some cases it would be mischievous if an action of debt should be only brought, and not an action on the case, as in the case inter Redman and Peck, 2 & 3 Ph. and Mar. Dyer, 113, they bargained together, that for a certain consideration Redman should deliver to Peck twenty quarters of barley yearly during his life, and for non-delivery in one year it is adjudged that an action well lies, for otherwise it would be mischievous to Peck, for if he should be driven to his action of debt, then he himself could never have it, but his executors or administrators, for debt doth not lie in such case, till all the days are incurred, and that would be contrary to the bargain and intent of the parties, for Peck provides it yearly for his necessary use: so 5 Mar. Br. Action sur le case 108, that if a sum is given in marriage to be paid at several days, an action upon the case lies for non-payment at the first day, but no action of debt lies in such case till all the days are past. Also it is good in these days in as many cases as may be done by the law, to oust the defendant of his law, and to try it by the country, for otherwise it would be occasion of much perjury.

6. It was said, that an action on the case on assumpsit is as well a formed action, and contained in the register, as an action of debt, for there is its form; also it appears in divers other cases in the register, that an action on the case will lie, although the plaintiff may have another formed action in the Register. And therefore it was concluded, that in all cases when the Register has two writs for one and the same case, it is in the party's election to take either. But the Register has two several actions, sc. action upon the case upon assumpsit, and also an action of debt, and therefore the party may elect either. And as to the objection which has been made, that it would be mischievous to the defendant that he should not wage his law, forasmuch as he might pay it in secret; to that it was answered, that it should be accounted his folly that he did not take sufficient witnesses with him to prove the payment he made; but the mischief would be rather on the other party, for now experience proves that men's consciences grow so large that the respect of their private advantage rather induces men (and chiefly those who have declining estates) to perjury; for jurare in propria causa (as one saith) est sæpenumero hoc seculo præcipitium diaboli ad detrudendas miserorum animas ad infernum; and therefore in debt, or other action where wager of law is admitted by the law, the Judges without good admonition and due examination of the party do not admit him to it. * * *

RANN v. HUGHES.

(House of Lords, 1778. 7 Term Reports, 346, note a.)

Rann and another, executors of Mary Hughes v. Isabella Hughes, Administratrix of J. Hughes in error; Dom. Proc. The declaration stated that on June 11th, 1764, divers disputes had arisen between the plaintiffs' testator and the defendant's intestate, which they referred to arbitration; that the arbitrator awarded that the defendant's intestate should pay to the plaintiffs' testator £983. That the defendant's intestate afterward died possessed of effects sufficient to pay that sum; that administration was granted to the defendant; that Mary Hughes died, having appointed the plaintiffs her executors; that at the time of her death the said sum of £983 was unpaid, "by reason of which promises the defendant as administratrix became liable to pay to the plaintiffs as executors the said sum, and being so liable she in consideration thereof undertook and promised to pay," etc. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, plene administravit, and plene administravit, except as to certain goods, etc., which were not sufficient to pay an outstanding bond debt of the intestate's therein set forth, etc. The replication took issue on all these pleas. Verdict for the plaintiff on the first issue, and for the defendant on the two last; and on the first a general judgment was entered in B. R. against the defendant de bonis propriis. This judgment was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, and a writ of error was afterward brought in the House of Lords, where after argument the following question was proposed to the judges by the Lord Chancellor:

"Whether sufficient matter appeared upon the declaration to warrant after verdict the judgment against the defendant in error in her personal capacity?"

Upon which [question] the Lord Chief Baron Skynner delivered the opinion of the judges to this effect: It is undoubtedly true that every man is by the law of nature bound to fulfil his engagements. It is equally true that the law of this country supplies no means, nor affords any remedy, to compel the performance of an agreement made without sufficient consideration; such agreement is nudum pactum ex quo non oritur actio; and whatsoever may be the sense of this maxim in the civil law, it is in the least-mentioned sense only that it is to be understood in our law. The declaration states that the defendant being indebted as administratrix promised to pay when requested, and the judgment is against the defendant generally. The being indebted is of itself a sufficient consideration to ground a promise, but the promise must be co-extensive with the consideration unless some particular consideration of fact can be found here to warrant the extension of it against the defendant in her own capacity. If a person indebted in one right in consideration of forbearance for a particular time promise to pay in another right, this convenience will be a sufficient consideration to warrant an action against him or her in the latter right; but here no sufficient consideration occurs to support this demand against her in her personal capacity, for she derives no advantage or convenience from the promise here made. For if I promise generally to pay upon request what I was liable to pay upon request in another right, I derive no advantage or convenience from this promise, and therefore there is not sufficient consideration for it. But it is said that if this promise is in writing that takes away the necessity of consideration and obviates the objection of nudum pactum, for that cannot be where the promise is put in writing; and that after verdict, if it were necessary to support the promise that it should be in writing, it will after verdict be presumed that it was in writing, and this last is certainly true; but that there cannot be nudum pactum in writing, whatever may be the rule of the civil law, there is certainly none such in the law of England. His Lordship observed upon the doctrine of nudum pactum delivered by Wilmot, J., in the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop and Hopkins, 3 Burr. 1663,⁶⁶ that he contradicted himself, and was also contradicted by Vinnius in his Comment on Justinian.

All contracts are by the laws of England distinguished into agreements by specialty and agreements by parol, nor is there any such third class as some of the counsel have endeavored to maintain, as contracts in writing. If they be merely written and not specialties, they are parol, and a consideration must be proved. But it is said that the Statute of Frauds has taken away the necessity of any consideration in this case. The Statute of Frauds was made for the relief of personal representatives and others, and did not intend to charge them further than by common law they were chargeable. His Lordship here read those sections of that statute which relate to the present subject. He observed that the words were merely

⁶⁶ Wilmot, J. said in that case:

"I cannot find that a nudum pactum evidenced by writing has been ever holden bad, and I should think it good; though, where it is merely verbal it is bad. Yet I give no opinion upon its being good always when in writing."

And Lord Mansfield said:

"I take it that the ancient notion about the want of consideration was for the sake of evidence only, for when it is reduced into writing, as in covenants, specialties, bonds, etc., there was no objection to the want of consideration. And the Statute of Frauds proceeded upon the same principle."

negative, and that executors and administrators should not be liable out of their own estates, unless the agreement upon which the action was brought or some memorandum thereof was in writing and signed by the party. But this does not prove that the agreement was still not liable to be tried and judged of as all other agreements merely in writing are by the common law, and does not prove the converse of the proposition that when in writing the party must be at all events liable. He here observed upon the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop in Burr., and the case of Losh v. Williamson,⁶⁶ Mich. 16 G. 3 in B. R., and so far as these cases went on the doctrine of nudum pactum, he seemed to intimate that they were erroneous. He said that all his brothers concurred with him that in this case there was not a sufficient consideration to support this demand as a personal demand against the defendant, and that it being now supposed to have been in writing makes no difference. The consequence of which is that the question put to us must be answered in the negative.

And the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed.⁷⁰

⁶⁶ In that case the writing was witnessed and the holding was that "the instrument being in writing and attested by witnesses, the objection of nudum pactum [for want of consideration] did not lie."

⁷⁰ "It is true that in some cases an assumpsit will lie, although the consideration is past, if there was a duty before; but in all of them the duty is co-extensive with the promise." Taylor, J., in Mitchell v. Bell, 1 No. Car. 244, 246 (1800).

"In Rann v. Hughes it was held by the highest authority that a debt would support no promise except the one which the law would imply, and, therefore, that the defendant's promise to pay personally a debt which she owed as administratrix was not binding without a new consideration." Langdell's Summary of Contracts, § 93.

We are coming to the view that an express promise to pay an existing debt is not supported by the debt except as regards the statute of limitations, discharges in bankruptcy, etc. "When the statute [of limitations] does not come in question, assuming that the letter does contain an acknowledgment, or even a promise, it amounts to no more than this,—that a man, being liable to pay a debt, promises to pay it. Such a promise, which leaves the legal rights of the parties just where they were, creates no new cause of action." Maule, J., in Deacon v. Gridley, 15 C. B. 295, 309 (1854). But see dictum in Webster v. Le Compte, 74 Md. 249, 257 (1891). See 1 Williston on Contracts, § 143. "It was held in Wimer v. Overseers, 104 Pa. St. 317, that where a legal obligation exists, a cumulative promise to perform it, unless upon new consideration is a nullity." Green, J., in Cleaver v. Lenhart, 182 Pa. St. 285, 292 (1897). "When these parties once promised to marry each other, repetitions of that promise on different occasions thereafter, regardless of the number of times, were but ratifications of the first one, and constituted no new contract. There was but one contract, and that was the one created by the original promise." Watson, C. J., in Dyer v. Lalor, (Vt.) 109 Atl. 30, 37 (1920).

MARCH v. CULPEPPER and WIFE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1627. Cro. Car. 70.)

Assumpsit. Whereas One Hugh Goddard was indebted to the plaintiff in £107 for wares sold to him by the plaintiff, and died intestate, the said £107 being due and not paid, and administration committed to the wife of the defendant, for which £107 the plaintiff intended to sue the said wife as administratrix; but the husband of the said Anne, dum sola fuit, desiring to know the true debt which the said Hugh, her former husband, at the time of his death owed to the plaintiff, on the 30th day of July, 1 Car. 1, required the plaintiff, quod quidem Willihelmus Whiteman, Egidius Diggs et Hugo Owen, superviderent compotum betwixt the plaintiff and the intestate of and concerning the said wares sold, &c., ut suam certitudinem cognosceret; whereto the plaintiff assented; and then they finding, super risum compoti, that the said Hugh the intestate, at the time of his death, was indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum of £107, gave notice thereof to the defendant Anne the same day, &c; and the said Anne knowing that the intestate at the time of his death was indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum, the said Anne, Dum sola fuit, in consideration of the premises, adunc et ibidem, scilicet, the 30 July, 1 Car. 1, promised the plaintiff to pay to him the said £107 in this manner, viz. part thereof before the end of Michaelmas term then next ensuing, and the residue within reasonable time after; and alleges in fact, that the said Michaelmas term began at Reading, and ended such a day, and that neither the said Anne, dum sola fuit, nor the husband and wife during the coverture, had paid the said £107 or any part thereof.

The defendant pleaded to issue; and it was found for the plaintiff; and alleged in arrest of judgment, that here is not any sufficient consideration shewn to ground the action; for there is not any matter of profit or advantage to the defendant, nor any matter of charge or trouble to the plaintiff, and without one of them there is not any consideration to charge the defendant, and to make him liable to pay it out of his own proper goods; for the promise of the wife, dum sola fuit, shall not tie him without valuable consideration.

But Lord Richardson, Hutton, Harvey and Yelverton conceived, he did a thing at her request which he needed not, viz. shew his accompts to her three friends appointed by her; which is a trouble to him, and more than he needed to have done. And it seemeth the consideration is sufficient, and the breach of promise made thereupon just cause of suit, especially she promising to pay at two days; which implies that in the interim the plaintiff should forbear his suit; which being found by verdict, is a good consideration. And thereupon the plaintiff had judgment.⁷¹

⁷¹ In Williamson v. Clements, 1 Taunt. 523 (1809), the plaintiff seemingly had lost a bill of exchange drawn by the defendant and the latter promised that if the plaintiff would execute to him a bond, conditioned for indemnifying the

BAKER v. SMITH.

(Court of Upper Bench, 1651. Style, 295.)

Baker brought an action upon the case against Smith, and declared that whereas there was a speech concerning marriage between her, the plaintiff, and Smith, the defendant, in consideration that she the plaintiff would marry the defendant, the defendant did assume and promise to her the plaintiff that he would marry her, and that afterwards the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff would discharge the defendant of this promise, the defendant did assume and promise that he would pay unto her the plaintiff a thousand pound, and that she did discharge the defendant of his promise of marriage; and yet the defendant had not paid the £1000, according to his promise. Upon non assumpsit pleaded, and a verdict found for the plaintiff, it was moved in arrest of judgment that there is mention of two promises in the declaration, and that it is incertain to which promise the declaration relates. 21y. That there is no temporal consideration alleged, but only a promise to dissolve a contract of marriage, which is a thing illegal, and so no consideration. Roll Chief Justice an-defendant against his afterwards being compelled to pay the said sum of money, and purporting to acknowledge its having been paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, the defendant would pay the plaintiff the said sum of money upon request. The bond was executed, but the defendant did not pay. The court held that the defendant's promise was supported by sufficient consideration. Lawrence, J., said in part: "It is a disadvantage to the plaintiff to execute the bond, if it is no advantage to the defendant. There is a case in 1 Sid. 57, Traver v. ———, where a woman, after the decease of her husband, promised a creditor, that if he would prove her husband had owed him £20 she would pay it; and it was held a good consideration; because it was trouble and charge to the creditor to prove his debt."

⁷⁸ "Ames, Essays in Anglo-American Legal History III, 313, n. 2, and Street, op. cit. [Foundations of Legal Liability II,] 55 n. 6, cite Pecke v. Redman (1555) Dyer 113a as the earliest case in which effect was given to a purely executory contract; and the case seems to be so treated by Coke in Slade's Case (1602) 4 Rep. at p. 94b; but it does not appear from the report in Dyer whether or no the contract had not been partly performed; however, the case of Strangborough v. Warner (1588) 4 Leo. 3 is quite conclusive, and it was quickly followed by other cases in which the same point was adjudged; see for these cases Street, op. cit. 55 n. 8." W. S. swered, that here is a mutual promise made by both parties, and there have been divers actions of late times brought for this cause, and that they have been adjudged good, and the engagement to marry is not merely a spiritual matter, and this action is not to compel the marriage upon the contract, but to recover damages for not doing it, and it is like to a wager, and here is a temporal loss, and therefore a temporal action doth lie. But it was adjourned till next term to be argued again, and then judgment was given for the plaintiff, for the court held, that the dis-engagement shall be intended to the party himself, and here is no need to expresse notice given of it. Postea.

HUNT v. BATE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1508. Dyer, 272.)

The servant of a man was arrested and imprisoned in the Compter in London for a trespass, and he was let to mainprise by the manucaption of two citizens of London (who were well acquainted with the master), in consideration that the business of the master should not go undone. And afterward, before judgment and condemnation, the master upon the said friendly consideration promised and undertook to one of the mainperners to save him harmless against the party plaintiff from all damages and costs if any should be adjudged, as happened afterward in reality; whereupon the surety was compelled to pay the condemnation, s. £31, etc. And thereupon he brought an action on the case, and the undertaking was traversed by the master, and found in London at nisi prius against him. And now in arrest of judgment it was moved that the action does not lie. And by the opinion of the court it does not lie in this matter, because there is no consideration wherefore the defendant should be charged for the debt of his servant, unless the master had first promised to discharge the plaintiff before the enlargement, and mainprise made of his servant, for the master did never make request to the plaintiff for his servant to do so much, but he did it of his own head, wherefore, etc.

But in another like action on the case brought upon a promise of £20 made to the plaintiff by the defendant in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance of the said defendant, had taken to wife the cousin of the defendant, that was good cause, although the marriage was executed and past before the undertaking and promise, because the marriage ensued the request of the defendant.⁷⁸ And land may be also given in frank ⁷⁸ "In the early stages of the action of assumpsit, when it was sought to substitute the new action for the action of debt on simple contract, it became customary to declare that the defendants, being indebted to the plaintiff, in consideration of that indebtedness promised to pay the debt to the plaintiff. When the promise in indebitatus assumpsit became a fiction, the real ques-marriage with the cousin of the donor as well after the marriage as before, because the marriage may be intended the cause, etc. And therefore the opinion of the court in this case this term was that the plaintiff should recover upon the verdict, etc. And so note the diversity between the aforesaid cases.

LAMPLEIGH v. BRATHWAIT.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1615. Hobart 105.)

Anthony Lampleigh brought an assumpsit against Thomas Braithwait and declared, that whereas the defendant had feloniously slain one Patrick Mahume, the defendant, after the said felony done, instantly required the plaintiff to labour, and do his endeavor to obtain his pardon from the King; whereupon the plaintiff upon the same request did, by all the means he could and many day's labour, do his endeavor to obtain the King's pardon for the said felony, viz. in the riding and journeying at his own charges from London to Roiston, when the King was there, and to London back, and so to and from New-market, to obtain pardon for the defendant for the said felony. Afterwards, scil. &c. in consideration of the premises, the said defendant did promise the said plaintiff to give him £100, and that he had not, &c. to his damage £120.

To this the defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and found for the plaintiff damage one hundred pounds. It was said in arrest of judgment, that the consideration was passed.

But the chief objection was, that it doth not appear, that he did any thing towards the obtaining of the pardon, but riding up and down, and nothing done when he came there. And of this opinion was my brother [Warburton] but my self [Hobart, C. J.] and the other two judges were of opinion for the plaintiff, and so he had judgment.

First, it was agreed that a meer voluntary curtesie will not have a consideration to uphold an assumpsit. But if that curtesie were moved by the suit or request of the party that gives the assumpsit, it will bind, for the promise, though it follows, yet it is not naked, but couples itself with the suit before, and the merits of the party procured by that suit, which is the difference. tion at issue came to be the existence of a debt and not the promise to pay it. From the fact that the consideration in such cases, towit, the indebtedness, was alleged to have accrued before the promise, the idea naturally arose that an act performed at the defendant's request would support a subsequent promise." Harriman on Contracts, 2 ed., p. 75, § 138.

⁷⁴ Part of the report of the case is omitted.

In Bradford v. Roulston, 8 Irish Common Law, 468 (1858) Pigot, C. B. said:

ROSCORLA v. THOMAS.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1842. 3 Q. B. 234.)

LORD DENMAN, C. J.⁷⁵ This was an action of assumpsit for breach of warranty of the soundness of a horse. The first count of the declaration, upon which alone the question arises, stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, had bought of the defendant a horse for the sum of £30, the defendant promised that it was sound and free from vice. And it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that the precedent executed consideration was insufficient to support the subsequent promise. And we are of opinion that the objection must prevail.

It may be taken as a general rule, subject to exceptions not applicable to this case, that the promise must be co-extensive with the consideration. In the present case, the only promise that would result from the consideration, as stated, and be co-extensive with it, would be to deliver the horse upon request. The precedent sale, without a warranty, though at the request of the defendant, imposes no other duty or obligation upon him. It is clear, therefore, that the consideration stated would not raise an implied promise by the defendant that the horse was sound or free from vice.

But the promise in the present case must be taken to be, as in fact it was, express; and the question is, whether that fact will warrant the extension of the promise beyond that which would be implied by law; and whether the consideration, though insufficient to raise an implied promise, will nevertheless support an express one. And we think that it will not.

The cases in which it has been held that, under certain circumstances, a consideration insufficient to raise an implied promise will nevertheless support an express one, will be found collected and reviewed in the note to Wennall v. Adney, 3 B. & P. 249, note (a), and in the case of Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438. They are cases of voidable contracts subsequently ratified, of debts barred by operation of law, subsequently revived, and of equitable and moral obligations, which, but for some rule of law, would of themselves have been sufficient to raise an implied promise. All these cases are distinguishable from, and indeed inapplicable to, the present, which appears to us to fall within the general rule, that a consideration

"It is clearly established that where a past consideration—that is, a thing previously done by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant—is one from which the law implies a promise, an express promise different from, or in addition to, that which the law implies, is nudum pactum, on the ground that the whole consideration is exhausted by the promise which the law implies. . . . But it has also been held, in a long series of decided cases, that where there is a past consideration, consisting of a previous act done at the request of the defendant, it will support a subsequent promise; the promise being treated as coupled with the previous request. The leading authority for this proposition is Lampleigh v. Brathwait, Hob. 105."

⁷⁵ The statement of facts is omitted.

past and executed will support no other promise than such as would be implied by law.

The rule for arresting the judgment upon the first count must therefore be made absolute.

*Rule absolute.*⁷⁶

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1901. 180 Mass. 15, 61 N. E. 259.)

Bill in equity by the owner of certain land subject to a mortgage assumed by her, to restrain the administrators of Willard Elmer, the holders of the mortgage, from foreclosing it, or disposing of it and the note secured thereby, and for an order to the defendants to discharge the mortgage and cancel the note, filed July 7, 1900.

The bill alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land to which she derived title by a deed of one Herman E. Bogardus, by which ⁷⁶ "In Roscola v. Thomas, the decision went the full length of establishing that no executed consideration would support any actual promise; for there was no debt in that case and hence the law implied no promise, notwithstanding the remark of Lork Denman that the only promise that would result from the consideration stated would be to deliver the horse upon request." Langdell's Summary of Contracts, § 93.

"It is sometimes said that a warranty given before the property in the goods has passed is binding. Douglass v. Moses, 89 Ia. 40; Bowen v. Zaccanti (Mo. App.) 208 S. W. 277; or if given before delivery of the goods. Webster v. Hodgkins, 25 N. H. 128. But such statements are erroneous. The question is whether the warranty was given before the seller was bound to accept title and delivery. See 17 Mich. L. Rev. 519." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 142, p. 318 n.

In Evans v. Heathcote, [1918] 1 K. B. 418, 435, Scrutton, L. J., while saying that "Under the well known doctrine of Lampleigh v. Brathwait (1615) Hob. 105, a past consideration executed on request is a good consideration for a subsequent promise to pay," proceeded to show that he was speaking of the recognized exceptions to the rule that past consideration even though furnished at request is no consideration except where an obligation to pay arose at the time, or to the other rule that moral consideration is no consideration, by instancing merely such cases.

In Stewart v. Casey, [1892] 1 Ch. 115, 116, Bowen, L. J., said: "If it were true, as some scientific students of law believe, that a past service cannot support a future promise, you must look at the document and see if the promise cannot receive a proper effect in some other way. Now, the fact of a past service raises an implication that at the time it was rendered it was to be paid for, and, if it was a service which was to be paid for, when you get in the subsequent document a promise to pay, that promise may be treated either as an admission which evidences or as a positive bargain which fixes the amount of that reasonable remuneration on the faith of which the service was originally rendered."

deed she assumed and agreed to pay a certain mortgage of the premises given by Bogardus, which mortgage and the note for $1,300 thereby secured had been assigned to Willard Elmer, the defendants' intestate, that the defendants' intestate on or about January 11, 1898, executed and delivered to the plaintiff the following agreement: "Springfield, Mass., Jan. 11, 1898. In Consideration of Business and Test Sitzings Received from Mme. Sesemore, the Clairvoyant, otherwise known as Mrs. Josephene L. Moore on Numerous occasions I the undersigned do hear by agree to give the above named Josephene or her heirs, if she is not alive, the Balance of her Mortgage note which is the Herman E. Bogardus Mortgage note of Jan. 5, 1893, and the Interest on same on or after the last day of Jan. 1900, if my Death occurs before then which she has this day Predicted and Claims to be the truth, and which I the undersigned Strongly doubt. Wherein if she is right I am willing to make a Recompense to her as above stated, but not payable unless death Occurs before 1900. Willard Elmer."

The bill alleged, that by the foregoing instrument the premises were released and discharged from the operation of the mortgage deed, and the note secured thereby was paid in full and became null and void, upon the death of Willard Elmer, which occurred before the year 1900, to wit, on September 15, 1899.

The bill also alleged, that before the execution of the above agreement, at the request of Willard Elmer, the plaintiff gave to Elmer the business and test sittings referred to in the agreement as the consideration for the agreement, and at his request devoted much time and labor thereto.

The defendants demurred, and among the causes of demurrer alleged, that the above agreement annexed to the bill was a wagering contract and against public policy and void, and that it was without consideration.

In the Superior Court the case was heard by Lawton, J., who made a decree sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill. The plaintiff appealed; and, at the request of the plaintiff, the judge reported the case for the determination of this court. If the demurrer was sustained rightly, the bill was to be dismissed; otherwise, the demurrer was to be overruled and the defendants were to answer to the plaintiff's bill.

HOLMES, C. J. It is hard to take any view of the supposed contract in which, if it were made upon consideration, it would not be a wager. But there was no consideration. The bill alleges no debt of Elmer to the plaintiff prior to the making of the writing. It alleges only that the plaintiff gave him sittings at his request. This may or may not have been upon an understanding or implication that he was to pay for them. If there was such an understanding it should have been alleged or the liability of Elmer in some way shown.⁷⁷ If, as we must assume and as the writing seems to imply, there was no such understanding, the consideration was executed and would not support a promise made at a later time. The modern authorities which speak of services rendered upon request as supporting a promise must be confined to cases where the request implies an undertaking to pay, and do not mean that what was done as a mere favor can be turned into a consideration at a later time by the fact that it was asked for.⁷⁸ See Langdell, Contracts, §§ 92 et seq.; Chamberlin v. Whitford, 102 Mass. 448, 450; Dearborn v. Bowman, 3 Met. 155, 158; Johnson v. Kimball, 172 Mass. 398, 400.

It may be added that even if Elmer was under a previous liability to the plaintiff it is not alleged that the agreement sued upon was received in satisfaction of it, either absolutely or conditionally, and this again cannot be implied in favor of the plaintiff's bill. It is not necessary to consider what further difficulties there might be in the way of granting relief.

Bill dismissed.

ATKINS et Uxor v. HILL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1775. Cowper 284.)

LORD MANSFIELD.⁷⁹ This is a case in which the declaration particularly states that assets have been received by the defendant, the executor, more than sufficient to pay all the testator's debts and legacies. * * * The declaration then goes on to state that, in consideration of there being full sufficient assets as aforesaid, the defendant undertook and promised to pay the plaintiff his legacy [namely, £60 bequeathed by testator to plaintiff's wife]. No doubt then but, at any time after an executor has assented, the property vests; and if it be a pecuniary legacy, an action at law will lie for the recovery of it. Formerly, upon a bill being filed in chancery against an executor, one part of the prayer of it was, that he should assent to the bequests in his testator's will. If he had assets, he was bound to assent. And when he had assented, the legacy became a demand which in law and conscience he was liable to pay. But, in the present case, there is not only an assent to the legacy, but an actual promise and undertaking to pay it; and that promise founded on a good consideration in law, as appears from the cases cited. * * * Here the defendant, by his demurrer, admits he had sufficient to pay. * * * In this case the promise is grounded upon a reasonable and conscientious consideration; namely, that the defendant had assets to discharge the legacy. If so, he was compellable in a court of equity, or in the ecclesiastical court, to pay it. I give my opinion upon this case as it stands; that is, that it is an express promise made upon a good and sufficient consideration.

*Per Cur. Judgment for the plaintiff.

Of Atkins v. Hill, Langdell's Summary of Contracts, § 75, says: "No consideration was alleged for an express promise and the reason alleged for an implied promise, namely, that the defendant had become liable by virtue of assets (i. e., liable at law) was untrue. Deeks v. Strutt, 5 T. R. 690. His position was simply that of holding a fund in which plaintiff had an interest; which is a ground for a suit in equity to compel the application of the fund, but never imposes any liability at law except in those cases in which an action of account will theoretically lie."

The case of Rann v. Hughes, reported ante, p. 280, is later than Atkins v. Hill, and should be considered here, though Rann v. Hughes was a case of a promise to pay a debt and Atkins v. Hill one of a promise to pay a legacy.

"Some of the early cases at common law recognized the action of assumpsit as the appropriate remedy for such a [i. e., pecuniary] legacy. In Atkins v. Hill, Cowper's R. 284, Lord Mansfield goes into an elaborate argument to show that assumpsit is the appropriate remedy, but concludes by saying that he formed his opinion, in that case, upon 'an express promise, made upon a good and sufficient consideration,' i. e., having assets. In Hawkes v. Saunders, Cowper's R. 291, by Buller, J., assumpsit is held to be the proper remedy. The same doctrine is countenanced by two anonymous cases in Mod. reports. 11 Mod. R. 91, 6 do. 27, per Holt, C. J. But since the case of Deeks v. Strutt, 5 Term. R. 690, it has been considered settled law that no such action will lie for a pecuniary legacy." Redfield, J., in Howard v. Brown, 11 Vt. 361, 363 (1839).

But in Goodwin v. Chaffee, 4 Conn. 163, 166 (1822) Hosmer, C. J., said: "If there exists a liability on the executor, by reason of his having assets, an action of assumpsit founded on an implied promise, in my opinion, is maintainable against him for a legacy."

In Dunham v. Elford, 13 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 190 (1867), the court concluded "that there is, after assent [by the executor who has assets to a pecuniary legacy] a contract or promise, express or implied upon sufficient consideration to pay the legacy to the legatee—but that, like some other classes of contracts, owing to special circumstances and considerations, it can only be enforced in equity."

"The effect of an executor's assent to a general legacy seems not to have engaged the attention of courts to any considerable extent. It was held in South Carolina that the effect of the executor's assent to a pecuniary legacy was a contract on his part to pay it, enforceable in equity (Dunham v. Elford, 13 Rich. Eq. 190, 194, citing Atkins v. Hill, Cowp. 284, and Sto. Eq., § 592 to the effect that it might be enforced at law, but relying on Deeks v. Strutt, 5 Term. R. 690, that an action at law would not lie); but it seems that a verbal promise by an executor, either with or without assets, to a legatee to pay a legacy, imposes no personal liability upon him, as it comes under the Statute of Frauds, and hence no right of action arises therefrom (Smith v. Carroll, 112 Pa. St. 390) * * * It is provided by statute in Delaware that assets in the hands of an executor to pay a legacy shall create a legal liability, and raise a consequent promise to pay it.

"It is to be observed that the subject of the executor's assent is of little or no importance in those states whose statutes determine the time and man-

EASTWOOD v. KENYON.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1840. 11 Adolphus & Ellis 438.)

LORD DENMAN, C. J.³¹ * * * The second point arose in arrest of judgment, namely, whether the declaration showed a sufficient consideration for the promise. It stated, in effect, that the plaintiff was executor under the will of the father of the defendant's wife, who had died intestate as to his real estate, leaving the defendant's wife, an infant, his only child; that the plaintiff had voluntarily expended his money for the improvement of the real estate, while the defendant's wife was sole and a minor; and that, to reimburse himself, he had borrowed money of [one] Blackburn, to whom he had given his promissory note; that the defendant's wife, while sole, had received the benefit, and, after she came of age, assented and promised to pay the note, and did pay a year's interest; that after the marriage the plaintiff's accounts were shown to the defendant, who assented to them, and it appeared that there was due to the plaintiff a sum equal to the amount of the note to Blackburn; that the defendant in right of his wife had received all the benefit, and, in consideration of the premises, promised to pay and discharge the amount of the note to Blackburn.

Upon [this] motion in arrest of judgment this promise must be taken to have been proved, and to have been an express promise, as indeed it must of necessity have been, for no such implied promise in law was ever heard of. It was then argued for the plaintiff that the declaration disclosed a sufficient moral consideration to support the promise.

Most of the older cases on this subject are collected in a learned note to the case of Wennall v. Adney, 3 B. & P. 249, and the conclusion there arrived at seems to be correct in general, "that an express promise can only revive a precedent good consideration, which might have been enforced at law through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law; but can give no original cause of action, if the obligation, on which it is founded, never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision." Instances are given of voidable contracts, as those of infants ratified by an express promise after age, and distinguished from void contracts, as of married women, not capable of ratification by them when widows; Loyd v. Lee, 1 Stra. 94; debts of bankrupts revived by subsequent promise after certificate, and similar cases. Since that time some cases have occurred upon this subject, which require to be more particularly examined. Barnes v. Hedley, 2

ner of paying and delivering legacies and point out the conditions under which the executor may fully protect himself against liability. * * * The same is true of the question of assent before or without probate of the will, which is within the executor's power at common law, but not in any of those states in which the executor's authority is derived from the grant of the probate court." 2 Woerner's American Law of Administration, 2 ed., § 453, pp. *993-994.

³¹ The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

Taunt. 184, decided that a promise to repay a sum of money, with legal interest, which sum had originally been lent on usurious terms, but, in taking the account of which, all usurious items had been by agreement struck out, was binding. Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36, upheld an assumpsit by a widow that her executors should pay a bond given by her while a feme covert to secure money then advanced to a third person at her request. On the latter occasion the language of Mansfield, C. J., and of the whole Court of Common Pleas, is very large, and hardly susceptible of any limitation.* * * The case of Lee v. Muggeridge * * * is a decision of great authority. It should, however, be observed that in that case there was an actual request of the defendant during coverture, though not one binding in law. * * *

The eminent counsel who argued for the plaintiff in Lee v. Muggeridge spoke of Lord Mansfield as having considered the rule of nudum pactum as too narrow, and maintained that all promises deliberately made ought to be held binding. I do not find this language ascribed to him by any reporter, and do not know whether we are to receive it as a traditional report, or as a deduction from what he does appear to have laid down. If the latter, the note to Wennall v. Adney shows the deduction to be erroneous. If the former, Lord Tenterden and this court declared that they could not adopt it in Littlefield v. Shee, 2 B. & Ad. 811. Indeed the doctrine would annihilate the necessity for any consideration at all, inasmuch as the mere fact of giving a promise creates a moral obligation to perform it.

The enforcement of such promises by law, however plausibly reconciled by the desire to effect all conscientious engagements, might be attended with mischievous consequences to society; one of which would be the frequent preference of voluntary undertakings to claims for just debts. Suits would thereby be multiplied, and voluntary undertakings would also be multiplied, to the prejudice of real creditors. The temptations of executors would be much increased by the prevalence of such a doctrine, and the faithful discharge of their duty be rendered more difficult.

Taking, then, the promise of the defendant, as stated on this record, to have been an express promise, we find that the consideration for it was past and executed long before, and yet it is not laid to have been at the request of the defendant, nor even of his wife while sole (though if it had, the case of Mitchinson v. Hewson, 7 T. R. 348, shows that it would not have been sufficient), and the declaration really discloses nothing but a benefit voluntarily conferred by the plaintiff and received by the defendant, with [subsequently] an express promise by the defendant to pay money.

In holding this declaration bad because it states no consideration but a past benefit not conferred at the request of the defendant, we conceive that we are justified by the old common law of England * * *; while the principle of moral obligation does not make its appearance till the days of Lord Mansfield, and then under circumstances not inconsistent with this ancient doctrine when properly explained.

* Mansfield, C. J., said: "It has been long established, that where a person is bound morally and conscientiously to pay a debt, though not legally bound, a subsequent promise to pay will give a right of action."

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the rule must be made absolute to arrest the judgment.

*Rule to arrest judgment, absolute.*⁸³

ALLEN v. BRYSON.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1885. 67 Iowa 591, 25 N. W. 820, 56 Am. Rep. 358.)

Both parties are attorneys at law, and this action was brought to recover for professional services performed by the plaintiff for the defendant and for personal property sold. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff and defendant appeals.

SEEVERS, J.⁸⁴ * * * III. The defendant pleaded that he and the plaintiff were brothers-in-law, and, in substance, that each of them was engaged in the practice of the law, and had been in the habit of assisting each other as a matter of mutual accommodation, and that "all and each of the professional services for which plaintiff seeks to recover in this action were rendered by him as matters of mutual accommodation and interchange of courtesies, and without charge or expectation of payment or reward by one as against the other." The court instructed the jury: "If, however, such services were rendered by the plaintiff without expectation of reward, or intention on his part to charge therefor, or by any agreement or understanding that the services were to be gratuitous, the plaintiff cannot recover unless, after such services were rendered and in consideration thereof, defendant agreed with or promised plaintiff to pay for the same. In the latter case the valuable character of the service, and the moral obligation to pay for the same, would be a sufficient consideration to support the promise, and enable the plaintiff to recover the reasonable value of such service." We understand this instruction to mean that where one person renders services for another gratuitously, and with no expectation of being paid therefor, that a moral obligation is incurred by the latter which will support a subsequent promise to pay. In our opinion, this is not the law. If the services are gratuitous, no obligation, either moral or legal, is incurred by the recipient. No one is bound to pay for that which is a gratuity. No moral obligation is assumed by a person who receives a gift. Suppose the plaintiff had given the defendant a horse, was he morally bound to pay what the horse was reasonably worth? We think not. In such case there never was any liability to pay, and therefore a subsequent promise would be without any consideration to support it. That there are cases which hold that where a liability to pay at one time existed, which because of the lapse of time or for other reasons cannot be enforced, the moral obligation is sufficient to support a subsequent promise will be conceded.

⁸³ In Watson v. Turner, Buller N. P. 129 (1767), where overseers of the poor who had made no previous request for the service were held bound by a promise to pay the bill of an apothecary for attending and curing a pauper who boarded with her son out of the parish and was suddenly taken ill, the court said that "overseers are under a moral obligation to provide for the poor." But in Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 64 (1828), Daggett, J., said of Watson v. Turner: "It is no longer doubted that the defendants in that case, the overseers of the poor, were under a legal obligation to furnish the support for which the promise was made."

These cases are distinguishable because the instructions contemplate a case where an obligation to pay never existed until the promise was made. We do not believe a case can be found where a moral obligation alone has been held to be a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise. To our minds, however, it is difficult to find a moral obligation to pay anything, in the case contemplated in the instructions, prior to the promise. The following cases support the view above expressed: Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57; Williams v. Hathaway, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 387; Dawson v. Dawson, 12 Iowa 515; McCarty v. Hampton Building Assn., 61 Iowa 287. * * *

KENT v. RAND.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1886. 64 N. H. 45, 5 Atl. 760.)

Assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant's intestate, Mary Snow, to the plaintiff's use. Facts found by a referee. In the summer of 1855 Mary Snow, being then a married woman, borrowed from the plaintiff $275 for the use of her husband in his own business. At that time she had title by deed from her father of his homestead in Rochester, of which her father held a life lease from her. Her husband died in 1858, her father in 1859, and her mother in 1860. The referee also found facts which, it was claimed, showed promises by Mary Snow to pay the debt, made on several occasions between 1855 and the time of her death in 1883, while she was sole and the owner of property in her own right, the latest of which was within six years before her death.

SMITH, J. When the defendant's intestate borrowed the sum of $275 of the plaintiff in 1855 she was a married woman. The money was borrowed for the use of her husband in his business, and there is no evidence that it was otherwise used or applied. She had, at the time of the loan, title by deed to her father's homestead in Rochester, subject to her lease to him for the term of his life. It does not appear that she held this property to her sole and separate use, or that the promise made by her to the plaintiff was in respect to her separate property. Her common-law disability, therefore, rendered her contract void. Bailey v. Pearson, 29 N. H. 77; Ames v. Foster, 42 N. H. 381; Shannon v. Canney, 44 N. H. 592; Hammond v. Corbett, 51 N. H. 311; Batchelder v. Sargent, 47 N. H. 262; Muzzey v. Reardon, 57 N. H. 378; Read v. Hall, 57 N. H. 482; Messer v. Smyth, 58 N. H. 298; Penacock Savings Bank v. Sanborn, 60 N. H. 558. The question then is, whether assumpsit can be maintained upon her promise to pay the debt made after the death of her husband; or, in other words, whether a moral obligation to pay money or perform a duty is a good consideration for a promise to pay or to do the duty.

In a note to Wennall v. Adney, 3 Bos. & Pull. 249, is a review of many of the English cases, the result being summed up as follows: "An express promise, therefore, as it should seem, can only revive a precedent good consideration, which might have been enforced at law, through the medium of an implied promise, had it not been suspended by some positive rule of law, but can give no original right of action, if the obligation on which it is founded never could have been enforced at law, though not barred by any legal maxim or statute provision." The doctrine of this note is approved in Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. 257; Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207; Goodright v. Straphan, Cowp. 201; Littlefield v. Shee, 2 B. & Ad. 811; Meyer v. Haworth, 8 A. & E. 467; Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438; Jennings v. Brown, 9 M. & W. 501, and in 1 Pars. Cont. 432-436.

In Loyd v. Lee, 1 Stra. 94 (decided in 1718), the facts were these: A married woman gave a promissory note as a feme sole, and after her husband's death, in consideration of forbearance, promised to pay it. In an action against her it was insisted that though being under coverture at the time of giving the note, it was voidable for that reason; yet by her subsequent promise, when she was of ability to make a promise, she had made herself liable, and the forbearance was a new consideration. "But the Chief Justice held the contrary, and that the note was not barely voidable, but absolutely void; and forbearance, where originally there is no cause of action, is no consideration to raise an assumpsit. But he said it might be otherwise where the contract was but voidable. And so the plaintiff was called."

Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36 (decided in 1813), a similar case, was decided the other way. The facts were as follows: A married woman, having an estate settled to her separate use, gave a bond for repayment by her executors of money advanced at her request on security of the bond to her son-in-law. After her husband's decease she wrote a letter addressed to the plaintiff, stating "that it was not in her power to pay the bond off, her time here was short, and that it would be settled by her executors." The plaintiff brought assumpsit on this promise against her executors, and recovered a verdict. The defendants moved in arrest of judgment, on the ground that no sufficient consideration was shown for the promise. The verdict was sustained upon the ground that a moral obligation is a good cause for a promise to pay.

In Littlefield v. Shee, 2 B. & Ad. 811 (A. D. 1831), the facts were these: The plaintiff's testate in his lifetime supplied the defendant, a married woman whose husband was absent, with butcher's meat. After the death of her husband the defendant promised to pay when it should be in her power, and her ability to pay was proved at the trial. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and the nonsuit was sustained upon the ground that it appeared the goods were supplied to the wife while her husband was living, so that the price constituted a debt due from him. Lord Tenterden, C. J., in alluding to Lee v. Muggeridge, said: "The doctrine that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise is one which should be received with some limitation."

In Meyer v. Haworth, 8 A. & E. 467 (A. D. 1838), the defendant pleaded coverture to a declaration in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. The plaintiff replied that the defendant was at the time of the contract separated from her husband, and living in open adultery; that the plaintiff did not know of the marriage or adultery; and that the defendant, after her husband's death and before action brought, in consideration of the premises, promised to pay. Upon demurrer Lord Denman, C. J., said the subsequent promise was "not sufficient. The debt was never owing from her. If there was a moral obligation, that should have been shown." Littledale, J., said: "If there was any moral obligation, it should have been stated. The replication does not support the declaration. The promise in the declaration was altogether void. This is not like the case of an infant whose promise is voidable only."

Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438 (A. D. 1840), decides that a pecuniary benefit voluntarily conferred by the plaintiff and accepted by the defendant is not such a consideration as will support an action of assumpsit on a subsequent express promise by the defendant to reimburse the plaintiff. Lord Denman, C. J., commenting on Lee v. Muggeridge, said the remark of Lord Tenterden in Littlefield v. Shee, "that the doctrine that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for a subsequent promise is one which should be received with some limitation," amounts to a dissent from the authority of that case.

Cockshott v. Bennett, 2 T. R. 763 (A. D. 1788), decides that a subsequent promise to pay a note void on the ground of fraud, is a promise without consideration which will not maintain an action; and in Jennings v. Brown, 9 M. & W. 501, it was said, "A mere moral consideration is nothing."

Attempts have been made to distinguish the case of Lee v. Muggeridge from Loyd v. Lee and subsequent cases; but the doctrine of the note in Wennall v. Adney, that a mere moral obligation is not sufficient to support an express promise is generally recognized as correct.⁸⁵ Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207; Loomis v. Newhall, 15 Pick. 159; White v. Bluett, 24 E. L. & E. 434; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57; Hawley v. Farrar, 1 Vt. 420; Ingraham v. Gilbert, 20 Barb. 152; Bates v. Watson, 1 Sneed, 376; Parker v. Carter, 4 Munf. 273; *M'Pherson v. ⁸⁵ On moral obligation as consideration, see notes in 39 Am. St. Rep. 735, 53 L. R. A. 353 and 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519.

In Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 207, 209-211 (1825), Parker, C. J., said: "It is said a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration to support an express promise; and some authorities lay down the rule thus broadly; but upon examination of the cases we are satisfied that the universality of the rule cannot be supported, and that there must have been some pre-existing obligation, which has become inoperative by positive law, to form a basis for an effective promise. The cases of debts barred by the statute of limitations, of debts incurred by infants, of debts of bankrupts, are generally put for illustration of the rule. Express promises founded on such pre-existing equitable obligations may be enforced; there is a good consideration for them; they merely remove an impediment created by law to the recovery of debts honestly due, but which public policy protects the debtors from being compelled to pay. In all these cases there was originally a quid pro quo; and according to the principles of natural justice the party receiving ought to pay; but the legislature has said he shall not be coerced; then comes the promise to pay the debt that is barred, the promise of the man to pay the debt of the infant, of the discharged bankrupt to restore to his creditor what by the law he had lost. In all these cases there is a moral obligation founded upon an antecedent valuable consideration. These promises therefore have a sound legal basis. They are not promises to pay something for nothing; not naked pacts; but the voluntary revival or creation of obligation which before existed in natural law, but which had been dispensed with, not for the benefit of the party obliged solely, but principally for the public convenience. If moral obligation, in its fullest sense, is a good substratum for an express promise, it is not easy to perceive why it is not equally good to support an implied promise. What a man ought to do, generally he ought to be made to do, whether he promise or refuse. But the law of society has left most of such obligations to the interior forum, as the tribunal of conscience has been aptly called. * * * A deliberate promise, in writing, made freely and without any mistake, one which may lead the party to whom it is made into contracts and expenses, cannot be broken without a violation of moral duty. But if there was nothing paid or promised for it, the law, perhaps wisely, leaves the execution of it to the conscience of him who makes it. It is only when the party making the promise gains something, or he to whom it is made loses something, that the law gives the promise validity. And in the case of the promise of the adult to pay the debt of the infant, of the debtor discharged by the statute of limitations or bankruptcy, the principle is preserved by looking back to the origin of the transaction, where an equivalent is to be found. An exact equivalent is not required by the law; for there being a consideration, the parties are left to estimate its value; though here the courts of equity will step in to relieve from gross inadequacy between the consideration and the promise.

"These principles are deduced from the general current of decided cases upon the subject, as well as from the known maxims of the common law. The general position, that moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for an express promise, is to be limited in its application to cases where at some time or other a good or valuable consideration has existed."

But in Ferguson v. Harris, 39 So. Car. 323, 332 (1893) McIver, C. J., said: "The new departure [from the doctrine of moral consideration], as it may be called, seems to rest upon a learned note to the case of Wennell v. Adrey, 3 Bos. & P. at page 249. It seems to me, however, that a more correct view of the law is presented in a note to the case of Comstock v. Smith, 7 Johns. at page 89. All of the authorities admit that where an action to recover a debt is barred by the statute of limitations, or by a discharge in bankruptcy, a subsequent promise to pay the same can be supported by the moral obligation to pay the same, although the legal obligation is gone forever; and I am unable to perceive any just distinction between such a case and one in which there never was a legal, but only a moral obligation to pay. * * * In both cases at the time the promise sought to be enforced is made, there, is nothing whatever to support it, except the moral obligation."

In Muir v. Kane, 55 Wash. 131 (1909), it was held that though the state statute provided that any agreement authorizing an employee, as an agent or broker, to sell or purchase real estate for a commission should be void, unless the agreement or promise or some note or memorandum thereof should be in writing, a written agreement to pay the broker, executed after a sale under an oral agreement, was sustained by the moral obligation of the owner of the land to pay. Fullerton, J., for the court, said:

"The moral obligation to pay for services rendered as a broker in selling real estate under an oral contract where the statute requires such contract to be in writing is just as binding as is the moral obligation to pay a debt that has become barred by the statute of limitations; and there is no reason for holding that the latter will support a new promise to pay while the former will not. There is no moral delinquency that attaches to an oral contract to sell real property as a broker. This service cannot be recovered for because the statute says the promise must be in writing, not because it is illegal in itself. It was not intended by the statute to impute moral turpitude to such contracts. The statute was intended to prevent frauds and perjuries, and, to accomplish that purpose, it is required that the evidence of the contract be in writing; but it is not conducive to either fraud or perjury to say that the services rendered under the void contract or voluntarily will support a subsequent written promise to pay for such service. Nor is it a valid objection to say there was no antecedent legal consideration. The validity of a promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations is not founded on its antecedent legal obligation. There is no legal obligation to pay such a debt; if there were there would be no need for the new promise. The obligation is moral solely, and, since there can be no difference in character between one moral obligation and another, there can be no reason for holding that one moral obligation will support a promise while another will not. * * * A case in point on the principle involved, however, is Ferguson v. Harris, 39 S. C. 323, 17 S. E. 782, 39 Am. St. Rep. 731."

See also Bagaeff v. Prokopik, 212 Mich. 265 (1920). But see Stout v. Humphrey, 69 N. J. L. 436 (1903). On agreements unenforceable because of the statute of frauds as consideration, see 19 Ann. Cas. 1182, note, citing cases both ways. See also 53 L. R. A. 370, note; 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 524, note; 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 341, note.

In cases of bankruptcy and the statute of limitations the law only suspends the remedy. It does not extinguish the debt. Bank v. Wood, 59 N. H. 407; Badger v. Gilmore, 33 N. H. 361; Wiggin v. Hodgdon, 63 N. H. 39.⁶⁶ The contracts of infants are voidable, and may be ratified by an express promise after age.⁶⁷ In this respect they are distinguished from the contracts of married women, which, owing to the disability of coverture, are void at common law. Being void, no debt ever existed; and hence they furnish no consideration for a subsequent promise made during widowhood.

The weight of American authority is, however, decidedly against the moral consideration doctrine and in favor of the view that "the only moral obligation which affords consideration for a promise is one which has at some time been a legal duty." Scott, J., in Schwerdt v. Schwerdt, 235 Ill. 386, 390 (1908).

⁶⁶ "It was formerly held in England that a promise by a bankrupt made either before or after his discharge, to pay the unpaid balance notwithstanding his discharge, was enforceable at law, the past debt being a sufficient consideration. See Trueman v. Fenton (1777) Cowp. 544; Kirkpatrick v. Tatterall (1845), 13 M. & W. 766. The English Bankruptcy Acts of 1849 and 1861 provided that such promises should not be binding. The later Bankruptcy Acts of 1869, 1883 and 1914 contain no such provision, and yet the courts hold that the new promise is not enforceable in the absence of a new consideration. Heather v. Webb (1876), 2 C. P. D. 1; Jakeman v. Cook, (1878), 4 Ex. D. 26; Re Bonacina, [1912] 2 Ch. 394. See 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 168 (12th Ed.). The prevailing rule in the United States is that the new promise is enforceable, the past consideration being sufficient." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, p. 156, n.

Some state statutes require the new promise by the discharged bankrupt to be in writing, and many states by statute require promises to pay debts, or acknowledgments of debts to be in writing to raise or postpone the bar of the statute of limitations. Some such statutes apply only to raising the bar of the statute when it has fallen and have no applications to promises made before then. Welles-Kahn Co. v. Klein (Fla.) 88 So. 315 (1921). Local statutes should be consulted.

Watkins v. Halstead, 2 Sandf. 311; Waters v. Bean, 15 Geo. 358; 1 Pars. Cont. 435. This doctrine has received assent in this state. French v. Benton, 44 N. H. 28, 31.

It has been assumed in this discussion that the defendant's testate promised to pay the debt within six years of her death. Whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant such a finding is a question we have no occasion to consider. The defendant is entitled to judgment on the report.

BENTLEY v. MORSE.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1817. 14 Johns. 468.)

In error, on certiorari to a justice's court.

The plaintiff in error had an account, for work, against the defendant in error which the latter paid, and took the receipt of the plaintiff in error for 24 dollars and 20 cents. In November, 1815, the plaintiff in error brought an action against the defendant in error, on his account, and recovered judgment. It did not appear that any defence was made. In December, in the same year, the parties happening to be together, the defendant observed to the plaintiff that he had paid him a sum of money, and held his receipt for it, (alluding to the receipt above mentioned) and had been since compelled to pay him a second time; the defendant [plaintiff] denied any knowledge of the payment or of giving a receipt, but promised, that if the defendant had such receipt, he would repay him the amount of it. The present action was founded on that promise; and the defendant in error, who was plaintiff in the court below, at the trial produced the receipt in evidence. The defendant below offered the record of the former judgment in evidence, as a bar to the action, but it was overruled, and a verdict and judgment was rendered for the defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. In consequence of the omission of the defendant in error to make a defence in the former action against him, and to produce his receipt to show the payment of the debt, he was forever barred from maintaining an action to recover back the money he had paid; and the question now is, whether the promise to repay the amount of the money expressed in the receipt is valid in law.

The debt having been paid, the recovery in the former action was clearly unjust; and though, in consequence of his neglect, the defendant in error lost all legal remedy to recover back his money, yet there was such a moral obligation on the part of the plaintiff in error, to refund the money, as would be a good consideration to support an assumpsit or express promise to pay it. The moral obligation is as strong as any in the cases in which it has been held sufficient to revive a debt barred by statute or some positive rule of law. It is like the promise of an infant to pay a debt contracted during his non-age, or of an insolvent or bankrupt to pay a debt from which he is discharged by his certificate.

⁸⁹ In Stebbins v. Crawford County, 92 Pa. St. 289 (1879) a county treasurer had settled his accounts, there being no appeal taken from the auditor's report which when filed became a judgment and by lapse of time without appeal final and conclusive, and then, errors being discovered showing a larger amount had been payable by him, the treasurer, who had not known of the errors, promised to pay that amount. Assumpsit being brought on that promise, Church, P. J., in the lower court said: "A moral obligation is sufficient to support an express promise, where there has been a pre-existing obligation which has become inoperative by positive law. Express promises, founded on pre-existing equitable obligations, may be enforced as founded on good consideration. They merely remove an impediment erected by law to the recovery of debts honestly due, but which the statute law and public policy protect the debtors from being compelled to pay. * * * Now, applying this rule to the facts in this case, what do we have? An actual pre-existing debt owing by this defendant to the plaintiff—a debt for trust moneys, which, in foro conscientiarum, is of a higher character than the ordinary debts which arise on account of dealings between individuals. This debt is barred by positive law by a judgment entered, in which the debtor is unwittingly, but none the less positively, released. According to the common sense and feeling of mankind, the debt exists until it is actually paid; the mind of the defendant assented to this principle. He felt the obligation of the unsatisfied debt, and in the language of the verdict, specifically and definitely admitted it, and positively and unconditionally promised to pay it. There can be no doubt, therefore, that this moral obligation was a sufficient consideration upon which to base this promise of the defendant to pay the debt." And in the Supreme Court, Gordon, J., after approving the opinion below, and in affirmance of the judgment in favor of the county, said:

"That a moral obligation is sufficient to support an assumption to pay a debt, which cannot be collected by reason of the intervention of some positive law, as the statute of limitations, the operation of a judgment, or a discharge in bankruptcy, is a doctrine now so well established that a discussion of it would be mere waste of logic. In Anspach v. Brown, 7 Watts (Pa.) 140, it is admitted that there is an obligation in morals, to pay a debt barred by a judgment, which will support an express promise to that effect. Such a debt, it is true, is put upon a higher footing than one barred by the statute of limitations, for, it is said, there must be not only an acknowledgment of the debt, but a distinct and formal promise to pay; nevertheless, when these conditions are complied with, the promise is binding. What, then, though the auditors' report was equivalent to a judgment? That there was a clear mistake in it of some $1,700, is not denied; and that Stebbins acknowledged that mistake, and clearly and unconditionally promised to pay the amount thus discovered to be due the county, is found by the legal arbitrator."

"A moral obligation is an imperative duty, which would be enforceable by

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1911. 81 N. J. L. 123, 78 Atl. 1062.)

Action by Percy B. Richardson against Samuel C. Kulp. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

BERGEN, J.²⁰ This action was brought to recover the amount due upon a promissory note which the defendant had indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, and the plaintiff had judgment in the district court, from which defendant appeals. * * *

We must therefore assume that the trial court in finding for the plaintiff in this case determined that the indorser, although discharged from liability for want of proper notification, subsequently waived his right to have advantage of the neglect of the plaintiff to give him timely notice of the dishonor of the note. * * * He knew the date of maturity, and he also knew that the note had not been paid, so his promises oral and by letter must be considered as having been made with knowledge that he was released from liability for want of proper notice. A promise to pay or its equivalent, made by a person entitled to insist on want of notice of dishonor, who was then aware that he was released from liability for want of it, amounts to a waiver of the right to have the benefit of such neglect, and admits the right of action. *Tebbetts v. WILLIAM O. LUDLOW v. AUGUST HARDY.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1878. 38 Mich. 690.)

Case made from Kent.

GRAVES, J.^{} Ludlow, as plaintiff, recovered in the court below, and Hardy removed the cause to this court upon a case.

In the fall of 1874 Ludlow sold a quantity of liquors to Hardy and the sale is claimed to have been contrary to the act then in force to prevent the manufacture and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors as a beverage. After the repeal of that statute, Hardy, in consideration of the sale and of an extension of the time of payment, made a new promise and in fact paid $22. The court below allowed recovery upon this new promise, and the only question is upon the validity of that ruling. * * *

The original transaction was within the operation of the statute, and was condemned by it. As a sale it was forbidden and illegal as a gift; and although like transactions subsequent to the repeal of the statute referred to would not stand forbidden and illegal, the act in question, which occurred during the existence of the statute, has never become lawful. It had no legal vitality originally, and nothing has occurred since to breathe life into it. It has never been transformed into a valid act. Hence it has never been sufficient to afford any consideration for a promise.

The judgment is erroneous and must be reversed, and judgment must be entered here for defendant with costs below and here.

WOLFFE v. EBERLEIN.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1883. 74 Ala. 99, 49 Am. Rep. 809.)

SOMERVILLE, J.⁹⁴ The proposition is not denied, that where a debt has been discharged by a decree in a court of bankruptcy, it may, in a certain sense, be revived, so as to renew its legal obligation, by an express and unequivocal promise to pay it, made by the debtor subsequent to the date of discharge. The authorities are in perfect harmony as to this principle, the only conflict of opinion being as to cases where the debtor makes a promise to pay prior to obtaining his certificate of discharge. Evans v. Carey, 29 Ala. 99; Bishop on Contr. § 448; Allen v. Ferguson, 18 Ala. 1; Knap v. Hoyt, 57 Ia. 591; s. c. 42 Amer. Rep. 59; Nelson v. Stewart, 54 Ala. 115. This case is clearly of the former class, the promise to pay being express, and subsequent to the discharge in bankruptcy.

The present action was brought on a judgment, in defense of which the appellant, in the court below, set up by way of plea his discharge in bankruptcy. The plaintiff made replication of an express promise by defendant to pay the claim unconditionally. The main point of contention is on the form of the pleadings. It is insisted that the replication of a verbal promise is a departure from the original cause of action, which declared on a judgment, and that the action should have been based upon the new promise, and not upon the judgment, which was extinguished by the fact of defendant's discharge in bankruptcy.

There are two views of this subject, presented in the books, as to the effect of a new promise to pay in its relation to a plea of bankruptcy. The more logical and sounder view, perhaps is, that the new promise, and not the old debt, is the meritorious cause, or real foundation of the action. The old debt has become extinguished by operation of law, and no longer exists. But the moral obligation to pay still exists, and this, coupled with the antecedent valuable consideration, is sufficient to support a new promise, if clear, distinct, and unequivocal in nature. The moral obligation, uniting to the new promise, makes what was designated by Lord Mansfield, in Trueman v. Fenton, Cowp. 544, "a new undertaking and agreement." De Puy v. Swart, 3 Wend. 135; s. c., 20 Amer. Dec. 673; Fraley v. Kelly, 88 N. C. 227; s. c. 43 Amer. Rep. 743.

There is another class of cases, supported by perhaps the weight of authority, which refer the efficacy of such promises exclusively to the principle that the defendant may renounce the benefit of the law designed for his protection, and that the effect of the new promise is to waive any discharge that may be obtained in bankruptcy, at least to an extent commensurate with the promise itself. * * *

The past decisions of this court seem to have proceeded upon this theory of the law, and the prevailing system of pleading, by which the plaintiff is accustomed to declare upon the original promise, and to introduce the new promise by way of replication to the plea of bankruptcy, is manifestly an outgrowth of it. Dearing v. Moffitt, 6 Ala. 776; Branch Bank v. Boykin, 9 Ala. 320; Evans v. Carey, 29 Ala. 99, 107.

It is not required that we should decide which of these two theories is correct. The better view, in our judgment, is that suggested by Mr. Parsons, that the plaintiff may, at his election, bring suit either upon the new promise, and declare upon it, in the first instance, as the foundation of his action, thus himself assuming the onus of proving the discharge in bankruptcy, without which the new promise would be unavailing; or he may sue upon the old or original promise, and when the plea of bankruptcy is interposed as a defense, may set up the new promise in his replication to the plea, as in analogous cases involving the defense of infancy, and the statute of limitations. 1 Parsons Contr. 434-5 (6th Ed.) Note (v) and cases cited. * * *

A strong analogy is found in cases involving the plea of the statute of limitations. Bankruptcy, it is true, extinguishes the debt as a legal subsisting demand, while the operation of the statute is only to destroy the remedy. Yet it is settled in the one class of cases, as well as in the other, that the new promise is the true and real foundation of the cause of action, and strictly speaking, upon it alone can a recovery be had. Such is the settled doctrine of this court, and since the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351, decided by Judge Story more than fifty years ago, it may be regarded as the recognized doctrine in this country. Bradford v. Spyker, 32 Ala. 134; Angell on Lim. (6th Ed.) § 212. Notwithstanding this fact, the rules of pleading permit the plaintiff to declare upon the original debt, and, when the statute of limitations is pleaded, to reply the new promise. Angell on Lim. § 288. In Bradford v. Spyker, 32 Ala. 148, this feature of pleading was said to be an anomaly in the law; but the court approved it, as sanctioned by long practice rather than on principle, quoting the language of Best, C. J., in Upton v. Else, 12 Moore, 303 (22 Eng. Com. Law, 451) where he said: "Probably the new promise ought in strictness to be declared on specially; but the practice is inveterate the other way and we cannot get over it."

The practice adopted in the present action of declaring on the original debt, where bankruptcy of the defendant is pleaded, has prevailed for a long time in this state. Though an anomaly, we can see no good to result from abolishing it by judicial decision, but rather inconvenience and confusion. Admitting it to be wrong in principle, we feel justified in permitting it to stand, if for no other reason, because it is supported, with few exceptions, by the antiquity of uninterrupted practice, not only in this state, but generally in the courts of England and America. * * *

In Evans v. Carey, 29 Ala. 99, it was decided that an express promise by a bankrupt, to pay a particular debt to a creditor would "avoid the effect of such discharge, as well when the words constituting such promise are spoken to a third person as when they are spoken to the creditor personally or to his agent." On this principle, the promise made to the agent of the assignor of the present judgment must be held to enure to the benefit of the assignee. We follow this authority, although it can probably be justified solely on the theory, that the effect of the new promise is only, using the language of Mr. Parsons, "to do away with the obstruction otherwise interposed by the bankruptcy and discharge." 1 Parsons Contr. 434; Otis v. Gazlin, 31 Me. 567. It harmonizes with the practice however, of declaring upon the original debt in such cases, and of introducing the new promise by way of replication to the plea of bankruptcy. * * *

The judgment of the court below is, in our opinion, free from error, and it is accordingly

⁹⁶ "Thus it seems that [where there has been a new promise after a discharge in bankruptcy] the plaintiff may, at his election, sue either upon the new promise or the old, nor is it very apparent which is the more eligible form of declaring, though Judge Parsons [in his treatise on Contracts] seems to consider it the better course to count upon the new promise. Upon the hypothesis that the defendant will not rely upon his discharge in bankruptcy, declaring upon the old promise is the most simple and concise form of proceeding. Upon the opposite hypothesis, the only difference is that by declaring on the old promise the discharge in bankruptcy and the new promise are brought out in the plea and replication, whilst by declaring on the new they are brought out in the declaration and the plea, and thus the issue by one stage or process of pleading the sooner ended." Thompson, J., in Horner v. Speed, 2 Pat. & H. (Va.) 616, 622 (1857).

In Herrington v. Davitt et al., 220 N. Y. 162 (1917), Collin, J., for the court said:

"The action was properly brought upon the note. For the purpose of the remedy, the original debt might still be considered the cause of action. Dusenbury v. Hoyt, 53 N. Y. 521, 13 Am. Rep. 543. It might, had the plaintiff so elected, have been brought upon the new promise. It would be more accurate and consistent with the provisions of section 481 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the other sections regulating the pleadings in an action to allege the new promise as the real foundation of the action. The note was a debt provable in the bankruptcy proceedings. The legal obligation which it created or evidenced was, by virtue of the confirmation of the composition offer and the discharge in the proceedings, discharged by force of the statute, and the remedy of plaintiff existing at the time the discharge was granted to recover her debt by action barred. The right of action is given by a new and efficacious promise. The practice of bringing the action upon the original demand is, however, sanctioned by usage. The discharge in bankruptcy is, under such practice, regarded as a discharge of the debt sub modo only, and the new promise as a waiver of the bar to the recovery of the debt created by the discharge. The new promise with such other facts as are essential to constitute it a valid cause of action may, however, be alleged. See Wolffe v. Eberlein, 74 Ala. 99, 49 Am. Rep. 309; Taylor v. Hotchkiss, 81 App. Div. 470, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1042, affirmed 179 N. Y. 546, 71 N. E. 1140; Scheper v. Briggs, 23 App. Div. 115, 50 N. Y. Supp. 869."

BLISS, WILLIAMS & CO., Plaintiffs in Error, v. WILLIAM PERRY-MAN, Defendant in Error.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1838. 2 Ill. [1 Scam.] 484.)

WILSON, C. J.⁹⁶ This case originated before a justice of the peace. The bill of exceptions taken on the trial, contains all the proceedings, from which it appears that the plaintiff sued the defendant on a bond given by him for $28. The defendant pleaded infancy, and sustained his plea by proof. The plaintiff then set up a promise made by the defendant after he came of age, to pay the plaintiff $18 in lieu of the bond, but having failed in establishing this promise by disinterested testimony, he applied to the court (under the statute making the oath of the party evidence in certain cases) to have the defendant sworn to prove his subsequent promise. The court decided the evidence to be inadmissible, and refused to allow the party to

In Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, (1900), Henshaw, J., stated the California rule in reference to the statute of limitations as follows:

"(1) That when the statute of limitations has barred the remedy upon the original obligation, and an acknowledgment or a promise made after such time is relied upon, the action is not upon the original obligation, but is upon the new acknowledgment, and the implied promise raised by the law, or is upon the new express promise. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180; Chabot v. Tucker, 39 Cal. 434; Biddell v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 374; Lambert v. Schmalz, 118 Cal. 33, 50 Pac. 13.

"(2) If the acknowledgment or the promise be made while the original obligation is legally enforceable, and, if no conditions be attached to the promise, then the action, though brought after the statute of limitations would have ordinarily barred the remedy against the original obligation, is still upon the original obligation, which becomes 'a continuing contract' under section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because the bar of the statute has been lifted and removed. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 186; Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 1028; Southern Pac. Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 413, 55 Pac. 145.

"(3) But, upon the other hand, in the case of a new promise, made while the original obligation is legally enforceable, if that promise be not a general promise to pay the obligation according to its tenor and terms, but is a promise coupled with any condition, and an action is brought after the statute of limitations would have barred the remedy upon the original obligation, the action of plaintiff is then upon the substituted, conditional promise, and not upon the original obligation. Such substituted, conditional promise must be pleaded, the breach of it averred, and the recovery had after such showing. Curtis v. City of Sacramento, 70 Cal. 412, 11 Pac. 748."

Whether the action is brought on the old promise or the new, recovery is limited by the conditions of the new promise. That would necessarily be true where the new promise is sued upon, and has been held to be true in Massachusetts where the old promise is sued upon. Gillingham v. Brown, 178 Mass. 417 (1901). On promises to pay when able, as tolling the statute of limitations, see 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 300, note; L. R. A. 1918A, 902, note. On the effect of conditional promises on the statute of limitations, see 102 Am. St. Rep. 775, note.

be sworn. To reverse which opinion this writ of error is prosecuted.

It is clear that the plaintiff has mistaken the contract upon which he ought to have brought his action, and that the evidence which he offered was properly rejected. This evidence went to establish a different and distinct cause of action, from that upon which suit was brought. The action was instituted upon a contract under seal for the payment of a specific sum of money, while that sought to be established on trial, by the testimony which was rejected, was a parol agreement, entered into at a different time, and for the payment of a different amount. The admission of such testimony would not only have changed the character of the action, and the nature of the defense, but would have been a surprise on the defendant. The plaintiff should have brought his action upon the subsequent parol promise, and not upon the bond. An infant cannot bind himself by bond, even for necessities, and when the plaintiff relies upon a new promise made after full age, it is always necessary that he should declare upon the simple contract, which the new promise was meant to establish; and the infant will then be bound to the extent of his promise, even if the consideration of the original contract, (for which the latter is substituted) was not for necessities.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.⁹⁷

ARMSTRONG v. LEVAN.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1885. 109 Pa. St. 177, 1 Atl. 204.)

PAXSON, J.⁹⁸ The defendant below was sued for breach of official duty as prothonotary in not properly entering a judgment, by means whereof its lien was postponed and the plaintiff suffered a loss.

The defendant pleaded the general issue and the statute of limitations. To meet the plea of the statute the plaintiff called a witness, who testified as follows: "After I discovered that there was no judgment in favor of Hannah Levan against Enoch Rohrbach, but there was one against Enoch Rothenberger, which I knew from the number to be meant as the one against Rohrbach, I went to see Mr. Armstrong in reference to the matter. I said to him that he had made this mistake, or if not he his clerk, and that unless this matter was fixed up, I would be obliged to sue. He then made ⁹⁷ But on the other hand, "It may well be answered that the promise of an infant when he becomes of age operates only to remove the legal bar to a recovery on a contract made before. The suit is on the original contract . . . It is not necessary, therefore, that there should be a new contract, according to the technical definition of a contract. There is no need of a new bargain between the creditor and debtor. The infant may ratify after he is of age, even against the consent of the other party." Parker, C. J., in Holt v. Underhill, 10 N. H. 220, 221-222 (1839).

the remark that he would have to see his lawyer first, Mr. Reber. On the afternoon of the same day, I think it was, he came to my office, alone that time, and he said that I should see Mr. Reber; and I said to him again what I said in the morning in reference to suing. He said that I should not sue; that if Mrs. Levan suffered any loss by reason of this mistake, he would make it good to her; that she should not lose anything through his mistake. That was in the spring of 1879, I think during the first days of April."

The court below held that this evidence, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to bar the running of the statute; and that the six years would only commence to run from the date of such promise.

The plaintiff in error has given us an elaborate argument to show that a promise to pay after the statute has run will not revive a tort, and has cited numerous authorities in support of this proposition. We concede his law to be sound; his authorities fully sustain his point.⁹⁹ The difficulty in his way is they do not meet his case. It was not the question of the revival of a tort by a promise to pay made after six years. The conversation referred to occurred before the statute had run, and it was a distinct promise to pay in consideration that the plaintiff below would not sue. If, therefore, she relied upon this promise; if she was thereby lulled into security, and thus allowed the six years to go by before she commenced her suit, with what grace can the defendant now set up the statute? The promise operated not to revive a dead tort, but as by way of estoppel. It has all the elements of an estoppel. The plaintiff relied and acted upon it; she has been misled to her injury; but for the defendant's promise she would have commenced her action before the six years had expired. We think the learned judge below was right in holding that the six years would only commence to run from the date of the promise. * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*¹⁰⁰

⁹⁹ As to torts the bar of the statute of limitations is not removed by a new promise. Nelson v. Petterson, 229 Ill. 240 (1907). See 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 912, note. As to contracts under seal there is a conflict of authority. It is held not removed as to them in Toothaker v. Boulder, 13 Colo. 219 (1889) because the subsequent promise is of less solemnity. It is held removed as to them, but with action only on the new promise in assumpsit in Trustees of St. Mark's Evangelical Lutheran Church v. Miller, 99 Md. 23 (1904), though in Carll v. Hart, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 565, action was allowed on the bond on the theory that the new promise, and the part payment made, rebutted the presumption of payment in full. So as to judgments there is a conflict of authority. The statute of limitations is held not removed as to them by a new promise or part payment in City of Harper, Kans. v. Daniels, 211 Fed. 57 (1914); Olson v. Dahl, 99 Minn. 433 (1906); Berkson v. Cox, 73 Miss. 339 (1895). But contra see Olcott v. Scales, 3 Vt. 173 (1831) where the new promise was replied to the plea of the statute in debt on the judgment and the court held the replication good. See 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 440, note.

T. P. SHEPARD & CO. v. JAMES A. RHODES and Another.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1863. 7 R. I. 470, 84 Am. Dec. 573.)

Assumpsit to recover the sum of two thousand dollars, due from the defendants to the plaintiffs. The declaration contained a special count to which the defendants demurred, generally.

BULLOCK, J.¹⁰¹ The count demurred to states, in substance, that the plaintiff had discharged the defendants from a certain debt, then due and owing from them to the plaintiffs, in consideration of dividends to be received from the proceeds of certain stock assigned by the defendants; and that, subsequent to such discharge, the defendants feeling themselves honorably bound to pay to the plaintiffs this debt, in consideration thereof and of one dollar to them paid, made the following new promise, to wit, to pay to the plaintiffs in one year after a final dividend, any difference that might then exist between their full debt and interest and the amount of any dividend or dividends the plaintiffs might have previously received. The count further states, that more than one year has elapsed since the plaintiffs received notice that no dividend would be paid them from the assigned effects.

This statement of the cause of action shows, in effect, two separate and distinct considerations, as the foundation of the new promise; first, a moral consideration, that the defendants, notwithstanding their discharge, felt themselves in honor bound to pay the plaintiffs' debt; and second, the valuable consideration of one dollar, paid to the defendants by the plaintiffs when the new promise was made.

Are these considerations, as stated, sufficient in law to sustain the promise? Passing by the earlier cases, referred to at length in a note to the report of Wennall v. Adney, 3 Bos. & Pul. 249, and some of which hold to the opposite, it may now be deemed settled that no action can be maintained upon a promise founded upon a mere moral consideration. Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207; Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & Ell. 438; Beaumont v. Reeve, 8 Ad. & Ell. (N. S.) 483; s. c. 55 Eng. C. L. 483. It has been said that such a doctrine is not creditable to the common law; but the rule has its origin in the widely diversified character of moral duties and the consequent difficulty of measuring them with exactness, and determining which are so high and obligatory in their nature as to demand, in their performance, the payment of money.

There is a class of cases which, for the most part, have been regarded as not falling within the rule, that a mere moral consideration will not support a promise. Of such is the case of a promise barred by the statute of limitations, where the party is under no legal liability to pay when the promise is made. And so, of the promise of an infant, made after he becomes of age, to pay a debt incurred during his minority, and which debt he is then at liberty to ratify or avoid. Upon the same principle a promise to pay a debt originally usurious, where usury avoids the contract, but freed from all usury at the time the new promise is made, is binding, because the original contract is not void, but voidable only at the election of the borrower. And so, the promise of a bankrupt, made after certificate of discharge granted, may be enforced, although now, in England, by statute (6 Geo. IV, c. 16) the promise must be in writing. But it is settled, that such considerations as love, friendship, natural affection, even the close relation existing between parent and child, are not, of themselves sufficient to support an express promise. * * *

The principle, recognized in, and which, almost without exception, has controlled this class of cases, is this: That when the precedent original consideration was sufficient to sustain the promise, but the right of action was suspended or barred by some positive rule of statutory or common law, the debtor might, by a subsequent promise, waive the exemption which the law has interposed indirectly for his benefit, but, mainly, from reasons of sound policy.

The case here is one where the original right of action was extinguished, not by the act of the law, but by the act of the parties. It was a voluntary release of the debt by the creditor to the debtor. In Willing v. Peters, 12 S. & R. 179, the question arose how far a promise to pay a debt, thus discharged might be enforced; and, because of the analogy between waiving a discharge created by act of law and one created by act of the parties the court upheld the action. Shaw, C. J., in Valentine v. Foster, 1 Metc. 522, admits the closeness of the analogy, and suggests, if the rule be not narrow that allows the waiver in the one case to bind the party and rejects it in the other; but he adds, that the Pennsylvania authority is the only one he has been able to find in support of the doctrine; and in the case then before him, ruled, that when a creditor released a debtor to make him a witness, the subsequent promise of the debtor was not binding. Considering his own decision, and that the case of Willing v. Peters was subsequently overruled in the same court, in Snevily v. Read, 9 Watts, 396, while in other courts it has been repeatedly adjudicated that after the voluntary release of a debt, an express promise does not revive it, nor does it form a sufficient consideration to support a new promise, we may affirm that such, at present is the settled law. Warren v. Whitney, 24 Me. 561; Stafford v. Bacon, 1 Hill. 533.¹⁰²

¹⁰² See Grant v. Porter, 63 N. H. 229 (1884).

In Taylor v. Hotchkiss, 81 App. Div. 470, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1042 (1903, affirmed, 179 N. Y. 546 (1904)) and in Straus v. Cunningham, 159 App. Div. 718, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1014 (1913) it was held that if in the case of a voluntary extinguishment of his debts the debtor before and at the time of such extinguishment expressly reserves a moral obligation to pay them in full, if able, or in any event, such moral obligation will serve as consideration to support a subsequent promise by him to pay.

So if in the bankruptcy proceeding the creditors accept a composition offered

But the plaintiffs aver an additional consideration for the defendant's promise, and this raises another question: because the former consideration not being illegal, but only insufficient, the latter may sustain the by the debtor, the duress inherent in the situation leaves the debtor's moral obligation to pay intact. In Herrington v. Davitt, 220 N. Y. 162 (1917), Collin, J., for the court, said:

"The letter of the defendant's testator constituted a distinct and unqualified promise to pay the debt [discharged in bankruptcy proceeding after creditors had accepted debtor's offer of a composition]. * * * The rule of law is well-nigh universal that such a promise made has an obligating and validating consideration in the moral obligation of the debtor to pay. The debt is not paid by the discharge in bankruptcy. It is due in conscience, although discharged in law, and this moral obligation, uniting with the subsequent promise to pay, creates a right of action. Dusenbury v. Hoyt, 53 N. Y. 521, 13 Am. Rep. 543. The appellant asserts that the rule does not obtain or have applicability where, as in the present case, there was a composition between the bankrupt and his creditors, assented to and accepted by the creditors seeking to enforce the unpaid debt. The clear weight of judicial opinion and correct reasoning declare such assertion erroneous. In Cohen v. Lachenmaier, 147 Wis. 649, 133 N. W. 1099, the facts, in the particular under consideration, were as are the facts here. The trial court awarded judgment for the balance unpaid on the note. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin in affirming the judgment said:

"It is further contended that each promise, if made, is nudum pactum, because the plaintiff, as one of the creditors, joined with the majority of the creditors in number and amount in accepting the defendant's offer of a composition with the creditors in settlement of their claims. This claim is based upon the ground that a discharge in bankruptcy in a composition is not a discharge by operation of law but is one effected by the voluntary assent of the creditors. The adjudications are to the effect that a debt which has been extinguished by a voluntary agreement of the debtor and creditor will not support a new promise and that one discharged by operation of law will support one. The proceeding resulting in the discharge of a debtor from liability, based on a composition after bankruptcy proceedings are instituted, is not in its nature such a voluntary act of the creditor as is considered in law as being a voluntary assent of the creditor to the satisfaction of the debt."

"In Matter of Merriman's Estate, 44 Conn. 587, the court * * * enunciated that * * * a discharge by performance of the terms of a bankruptcy composition is a discharge by operation of law; the composition is as to the assenting creditor both a voluntary act and an act of the law, but its efficiency is derived from the compulsory power of the law. * * * In Zavelo v. Reeves, 227 U. S. 625, 33 Sup. Ct. 365, 57 L. Ed. 676, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 664, the plaintiffs accepted the composition offer of the defendant in bankruptcy proceedings. Thereafter the defendant promised plaintiffs, upon a loan to them of $500, that he would pay the balance of their claim proved in the proceedings. The action was to recover such balance. The plaintiffs recovered. Mr. Justice Pitney in the opinion of the court recognized the general rule that a discharge, while releasing the bankrupt from legal liability to pay a debt that was provable in the bankruptcy, leaves him under a moral obligation that is sufficient to support a new promise to pay the debt, and ignored the composition and its acceptance. The reasoning and the conclusions of those decisions are harmonious with and applicable to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898."

promise declared upon. This additional consideration is one dollar, for which, it is alleged, the defendants promised, &c., to pay a sum greater than $1,000.

Ordinarily courts do not go into the question of equality or inequality of considerations; but act upon the presumption that parties capable to contract are capable, as well, of regulating the terms of their contracts, granting relief only when the inequality is shown to have arisen from mistake, misrepresentation, or fraud. A different rule would, in every case, impose upon the court the necessity of inquiring into, and of determining the value of the property received by the party giving the promise. Such course is obviously impracticable. In all cases, therefore, where the assumption or undertaking is founded upon the sale or exchange of merchandise or property, or upon other than a money consideration, and the promise has been deliberately made, the law looks no further than to see that the obligation rests upon a consideration, that is, one recognized as legal, and of some value. But the reason of the rule ceases, and, hence, the rule ceases, when applied to contracts to pay money and founded solely upon a money consideration. How far a forbearance to sue, or the giving of time, or the mere waiver of some rights, may support a promise, we do not consider, since the question does not arise. Nor for the like reason, do we consider how far the rule is qualified or limited by special statutes regulating interest; or in that class of cases peculiar to the law merchant, as bottomry, respondentia, and the course of exchange. Aside from these and some other exceptions, at common law a contract for the exchange of unequal sums of money at the same time, or at different times, when the element of time is no equivalent, is not binding; and, in such cases, courts may and do enquire into the equality of the contract; for its subject-matter, upon both sides, has not only a fixed value, but is itself the standard of all values; and so for the difference of value, there is no consideration. In this principle, the earliest prohibitions,—earlier even than the time of Alfred,—and the later legislative enactments against usury, both in England and in this country, have their origin. The rule is deemed to be founded in good policy.

In the case before us, the only legal consideration the defendants received was one dollar, for which they engaged to pay a much larger sum. The case, therefore, falls within the principle adverted to. The consideration was not only unequal, but grossly so. It was a mere nominal consideration; if even received by the defendants, it was, no doubt, regarded as such by them, and intended as such by the promisees. It was, at best, purely technical and colorable, and obviously is wanting in that degree of equitable equality sufficient to support the promise declared upon.

The demurrer to the first count is therefore sustained.

SCHNELL v. NELL.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1861. 17 Ind. 29, 79 Am. Dec. 453.)

PERKINS, J. Action by J. B. Nell against Zacharias Schnell, upon the following instrument:

"This agreement, entered into this 13th day of February, 1856, between Zach. Schnell, of Indianapolis, Marion County, State of Indiana, as party of the first part, and J. B. Nell, of the same place, Wendelin Lorenz, of Stilesville, Hendricks County, State of Indiana, and Donata Lorenz, of Frickinger, Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany, as parties of the second part, witnesseth: The said Zacharias Schnell agrees as follows: whereas his wife, Theresa Schnell, now deceased, has made a last will and testament, in which, among other provisions, it was ordained that every one of the above named second parties should receive the sum of $200; and whereas the said provisions of the will must remain a nullity, for the reason that no property, real or personal, was in the possession of the said Theresa Schnell, deceased, in her own name, at the time of her death, and all property held by Zacharias and Theresa Schnell jointly therefore reverts to her husband; and whereas the said Theresa Schnell has also been a dutiful and loving wife to the said Zach. Schnell, and has materially aided him in the acquisition of all property, real and personal, now possessed by him; for, and in consideration of all this, and the love and respect he bears to his wife; and, furthermore, in consideration of one cent, received by him of the second parties, he, the said Zach. Schnell, agrees to pay the above named sums of money to the parties of the second part, to wit: $200 to the said J. B. Nell; $200 to the said Wendelin Lorenz; and $200 to the said Donata Lorenz, in the following installments, viz., $200 in one year from the date of these presents; $200 in two years, and $200 in three years; to be divided between the parties in equal portions of $66⅔ each year, or as they may agree, till each one has received his full sum of $200.

"And the said parties of the second part, for, and in consideration of this, agree to pay the above named sum of money (one cent), and to deliver up to said Schnell, and abstain from collecting any real or supposed claims upon him or his estate, arising from the said last will and testament of the said Theresa Schnell, deceased.

"In witness whereof, the said parties have, on this 13th day of February, 1856, set hereunto their hands and seals.

strument, outside of those expressed in it; and did not aver that the one cent agreed to be paid had been paid or tendered.

A demurrer to the complaint was overruled.

The defendant answered, that the instrument sued on was given for no consideration whatever.

He further answered, that it was given for no consideration, because his said wife, Theresa, at the time she made the will mentioned, and at the time of her death, owned, neither separately, nor jointly with her husband, or any one else (except so far as the law gave her an interest in her husband's property), any property, real or personal, &c.

The will is copied into the record, but need not be into this opinion.

The court sustained a demurrer to these answers, evidently on the ground that they were regarded as contradicting the instrument sued on, which particularly set out the considerations upon which it was executed. But the instrument is latently ambiguous on this point. See Ind. Dig., p. 110.

The case turned below, and must turn here, upon the question whether the instrument sued on does express a consideration sufficient to give it legal obligation, as against Zacharias Schnell. It specifies three distinct considerations for his promise to pay $600:

1. A promise, on the part of the plaintiffs, to pay him one cent.
2. The love and affection he bore his deceased wife, and the fact that she had done her part, as his wife, in the acquisition of property.
3. The fact that she had expressed her desire, in the form of an inoperative will, that the persons named therein should have the sums of money specified.

The consideration of one cent will not support the promise of Schnell. It is true, that as a general proposition, inadequacy of consideration will not vitiate an agreement. Baker v. Roberts, 14 Ind. 552. But this doctrine does not apply to a mere exchange of sums of money, of coin, whose value is exactly fixed, but to the exchange of something of, in itself, indeterminate value, for money, or perhaps, for some other thing of indeterminate value. In this case, had the one cent mentioned been some particular one cent, a family piece, or ancient, remarkable coin, possessing an indeterminate value, extrinsic from its simple money value, a different view might be taken: As it is, the mere promise to pay six hundred dollars for one cent, even had the portion of that cent due from the plaintiff been tendered, is an unconscionable contract, void, at first blush, upon its face, if it be regarded as an earnest one. Hardesty v. Smith, 3 Ind. 39. The consideration of one cent is, plainly, in this case, merely nominal, and intended to be so.¹⁰⁴ As the will and testament of Schnell's wife

¹⁰⁴ In Velle Motor Car Co. v. Kopmeier Motor Car Co., 194 Fed. 324, 331 (1912) Kohlsaat, J., for the court said:

"The phrase of the contract which reads 'and of $1.00 each to the other imposed no legal obligation upon him to discharge her bequests out of his property, and as she had none of her own, his promise to discharge them was not legally binding upon him, on that ground. A moral consideration, only, will not support a promise. Ind. Dig., p. 13. And for the same reason, a valid consideration for his promise cannot be found in the fact of a compromise of a disputed claim; for where such claim is legally groundless, a promise upon a compromise of it, or of a suit upon it, is not legally binding. Spahr v. Hollingshead, 8 Blackf. 415. There was no mistake of law or fact in this case, as the agreement admits the will inoperative and void. The promise was simply one to make a gift. The past services of his wife, and the love and affection he had borne her, are objectionable as legal considerations for Schnell's promise, on two grounds: 1. They are past considerations. Ind. Dig., p. 13. 2. The fact that Schnell loved his wife and that she had been industrious, constituted no consideration for his promise to pay J. B. Snell, and the paid,' etc., imports no consideration. As said by the trial judge, it may well mean the exchange of the same dollar."

In Roark v. Turner, 29 Ga. 455 (1859), where an indorsee was suing an indorser and it was held that recovery could not be reduced by showing that the indorsement of the note was made on a sale of it for less than its face, Stephens, J., for a majority of the court said of the argument that there must be an equipoise of values whenever the nature of the case permits (pp. 457-458): "If the consideration on both sides was money, this reasoning might do, for in that case an exact equipoise of values might be had; but the fallacy of the reasoning when applied to other cases, consists in assuming that in such other cases, equality of values is attainable. When a man gives his due-bill for a hundred dollars in consideration of only fifty dollars which he receives cash in hand, who can say he has necessarily made a bad trade? There are some men who would make exactly fifty dollars by every such operation which they could get a chance to perform. There are others who would lose fifty and others still who would probably come out about even, for their estates after death (an event which might well happen before payment of their due-bills) would pay about fifty dollars in the hundred. A promise is a species of property, a chose in action, and has no more fixed money value than a horse or a negro [slave] has. The value of each is a matter of judgment. It is not pretended that the law can ascertain the exact equivalent for a horse, and how can it ascertain the exact value of a promise? I understand the rule of law to be that the obligation of the promise is not limited by the size of the consideration (where there is any consideration at all, as there is in this case) but only by its own terms. For the reason that the law cannot weigh the value of the promise, it leaves the parties to adjust it by their contract. Where there is any consideration, the contract of the parties is the law of the case, unless the contract is against law." But the judge was there speaking of a contract, where the parties intended to exchange equivalents (compare Riegel v. Wolkenshlager, (Cal. App.) 193 Pac. 160 (1920)) and not of a contract like that in Schnell v. Neil, where they did not so intend.

By § 25 of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law "value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract." On the adequacy of monetary consideration as affecting the law of bills and notes, see a comment in 21 Col. L. Rev. 461.

Lorenzes, a sum of money. Whether, if his wife, in her lifetime, had made a bargain with Schnell, that, in consideration of his promising to pay, after her death, to the persons named, a sum of money, she would be industrious, and worthy of his affection, such a promise would have been valid and consistent with public policy, we need not decide. Nor is the fact that Schnell now venerates the memory of his deceased wife a legal consideration for a promise to pay any third person money.¹⁰⁵

The instrument sued on, interpreted in the light of the facts alleged in the second paragraph of the answer, will not support an action. The demurrer to the answer should have been overruled. See Stevenson v. Druley, 4 Ind. 519.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is reversed with costs. Cause remanded, etc.

FILCOCKS and HOLTS Case.

(Court of Exchequer, 1591. 1 Leon. 240.)

In an action by Filcocks against Holt, administrator of A, the plaintiff declared, how that the husband of the defendant, who died intestate, was indebted to the plaintiff in ten pounds by bill, and that the defendant in consideration, that the plaintiff would permit the defendant to take letters of administration, and give to her further day for the payment of the said ten pounds, promised to pay the said ten pounds to the plaintiff at the day; and upon a writ of error brought in the Exchequer, upon a judgment in the King's Bench, in that case, it was assigned for error, that here is not any consideration, for by the law she is to have administration, being wife of the intestate; and as to the giving of further day for the payment of the ten pounds, the same will not make it good, for it doth not appear that she was administratrix at the time of the promise made, and that she is not chargeable, and then, &c. And such was the opinion of the court. * * *

¹⁰⁵ "The consideration of blood, or natural love and affection, is sufficient in a deed, against all persons but creditors and bona fide purchasers; and yet there is no case where a personal action has been founded on an executory contract, where a consideration was necessary, in which the consideration of blood, or natural love and affection, has been held sufficient. In such a case, the consideration must be a valuable one, for the benefit of the promisor, or to the trouble, loss, or prejudice of the promisee." Spencer, C. J., in Fink v. Cox, 18 Johns. (N. MORRIS v. NORTON.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1896. 75 Fed. 912, 21 C. C. A 553.)

This is a writ of error to review a judgment rendered by the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Michigan in favor of Elizabeth Norton, administratrix of John D. Norton, against Frank H. Morris, on two promissory notes. The action was begun by Morris against John D. Norton, then living, to recover the proceeds of the sale of certain real estate in Mississippi, belonging to Morris, which had come into Norton's hands as agent or trustee for Morris. The amount of these proceeds was undisputed, and the liability of Norton to account for them to Morris was conceded. The controversy arose over the right of Norton to set off against this claim two promissory notes—one for $500, and the other for $4,500—made by Morris to Norton, and held by the latter, and to have judgment for the remainder against Morris, as permitted under the common-law practice in Michigan. The defense which Morris made to the notes was that they were given for an illegal consideration; that they were given in a gambling transaction, to wit, the buying of options in oil, with no intention of acquiring property in oil, but merely to bet on the rise and fall in the market; and that they were therefore void. * * *

The court directed the jury to return a verdict for defendant, Norton, for the difference between the amounts due Morris from Norton for the land sold, and the amount of the notes. To these rulings of the court, counsel for Morris duly excepted.

Taft, J.¹⁰⁶ * * * We are of opinion, therefore, that there was evidence before the jury tending to show that Norton gave Morris $4,000 to gamble with in margins on oil; that the investment was successful, in that, according to the agreement of the brokers [Merriman & Rockefeller,] he was entitled to $5,000; that no proceeds were realized, however, because of the failure of the brokers; and that Morris, with Norton's knowledge and acquiescence, then assumed the loss into which he had led Norton by recommending the brokers, and gave him his note for the same. The evidence leaves it a question, upon which reasonable minds may differ, whether in the agreement of settlement it was stipulated as the consideration for the notes that Norton should transfer to Morris all his beneficial interest in the claim against the Rockefeller firm, [the brokers], or whether the assumption by Morris was merely a matter of honor, based on no valuable consideration at all. The decision of the question involves disputable inferences of fact, and is peculiarly within the province of the jury to decide. It is to be observed with reference to these alternative conclusions that there is a distinction between consideration and motive. "The motive for making a promise may be something entirely different from the act, or forbearance or promise thereof, which is offered and accepted in exchange for the promise." Wald, Pol. Cont. (2d Ed.) Am. editor's note, p. 9; Philpot v. Gruninger, 14 Wall. 570, 577.¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁷ In Philpot v. Gruninger, cited in the text, supra, Strong, J., said: "It is, however, not to be doubted that there is a clear distinction sometimes between the motive, that may induce to entering into a contract and the consideration of the contract. Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties. It is the price voluntarily paid for a promisor's undertaking. An expectation of results often leads to the formation of a contract, but neither the expectation nor the result is 'the cause or meritorious occasion requiring a mutual recompense in fact or in law.'"

In Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 389 (1872), it was held that a promise by a creditor to forbear to sue his debtor on a note was not consideration for the defendant's indorsement of the note, even though the creditor forbore because of the indorsement, if the forbearance agreement was not made at his request or communicated to him at or before the time of the making of the indorsement.

"Thus in Philpot v. Gruninger, 14 Wall. 570, 577, it is stated that 'nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties.' To constitute a valid agreement there must be a meeting of minds upon every feature and element of such agreement, of which the consideration is one. The mere presence of some incident to a contract which might under certain circumstances be upheld as a consideration for a promise does not necessarily make it the consideration for the promise in that contract. To give it that effect, it must have been offered by one party and accepted by the other as one element of the contract." Brown, J., in Fire Ins. Assoc., Ltd. v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 564, 579 (1891).

"In the case at bar, of course, the building and operating of the railroad was a sufficient detriment or change of position to constitute a consideration if the other elements were present. But the other elements are that the promise and the detriment are the conventional inducements each for the other. No matter what the actual motive may have been, by the express or implied terms of the supposed contract, the promise and the consideration must purport to be the motive each for the other, in whole or at least in part. It is not enough that the promise induces the detriment or that the detriment induces the promise if the other half is wanting." Holmes, J., in Wisconsin & Mich. Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 386 (1903).

In E. F. Spears & Sons v. Winkle (Ky.), 217 S. W. 691, 692 (1920), Thomas, J., said:

"There is quite a difference in law between what constitutes an 'inducement' for entering into a contract and what constitutes the 'consideration' for the contract. * * * In other words, the term "inducement" implies only that which influences an act, while 'consideration' means the parting with something by the one from whom it moves."

But Professor Corbin asserts that "there are many cases justifying the statement that consideration may consist of acts in reliance upon a promise even though they are not specified as the agreed equivalent and inducement, provided the promisor ought to have foreseen that such action would take place and the promisee reasonably believes it to be desired." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, p. 124, n.

On the distinction between condition and consideration, see Wald's Pollock on Contracts, Williston's Ed., 216, note 24, where the learned editor says: "If A

A sense of honor might have induced Morris to agree with Norton that, in consideration of a transfer of his claim against the Rockefeller firm, he would give the note. In that case the legal consideration would be the transfer, and the sense of honor only the motive. On the other hand, if Morris had said to Norton, "I'll assume this obligation of the broker, because I feel in honor bound to do so," and accordingly gave him the note, without any agreement between them as to the claim against the brokers, the sense of honor would have been, not only the motive, but also the consideration. "Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties." Wald, Pol. (2d Ed.) 9; Ellis v. Clark, 110 Mass. 389; Sterne v. Bank, 79 Ind. 549, 551; Holmes, Com. Law, 293, 295. Hence the question as to the real consideration for this note is to be determined by what the parties regarded as the consideration when the notes were given, and that depends on what they said and did at the time. This is wholly a matter of conjecture from the circumstances, the conduct of the parties, and the correspondence afterwards in regard to the giving of the notes. It is our province to consider the rights of the parties on each of the alternative hypotheses above suggested. The transfer of Norton's claim against the brokers for his winnings, on a gambling transaction would be a good consideration to support the obligation of Morris' note. This would be so on two grounds: First, the assignment of the right to the fruits of an illegal transaction after the transaction has been closed is not illegal. The assignment would not be in furtherance of the illegal purpose of the original contract, and no public policy forbids a transfer of the unenforceable rights which may grow out of such a contract after the contract and its purpose are things of the past. McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. 231, 235, 237; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 269; Rothrock v. Perkinson, 61 Ind. 39; Buchanan v. Bank, 5 C. C. A. 83, 6 U. S. App. 566, 577, 55 Fed. 223; Wald, Pol. Cont. (2d Ed.) 325; Greenh. Pub. Pol. 36. In such a case there is the possibility that the person owing the illegal debt may not rely on the illegality as a defense, and considering it a matter of honor, may pay it. This possibility makes the assignment of the claim a valuable consideration. More than this, under the act of 1882 (79 Ohio Laws, p. 118), and section 4270 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, as construed by the Supreme Court of Ohio in Lester v. Buel, 49 Ohio St. 240, 30 N. E. 821, Norton would have the right to recover back the $4,000 from the brokers with whom the gambling was done; and we see no reason why an assignment by Norton of his says to B, I will give you $100 if you break your leg, it is not probable that A means to require B to break his leg, as the exchange or equivalent for the promise. The breaking of the leg is merely the event upon the happening of which A will give a gratuity. In theory any act may be stated either as the condition or the consideration of a promise. See Langdell Summ. Cont. § 66; Holmes Common Law, p. 292; but the courts favor the construction of consideration."

claim against the brokers would not carry this right with it. The right to recover $4,000 from the brokers would certainly constitute a good and valuable consideration to support Morris' note. On the hypothesis that the jury may find from the evidence that the note was given by Morris for the consideration that he felt in honor bound to reimburse the loss Norton had made through trust in brokers recommended by him, and that there was no stipulation as to the transfer of the claim from Norton to Morris, a different result follows. The note could not be enforced, because Morris' sense of honor was not a valuable consideration. Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adol. & E. 438, 446; Mills v. Wyman, 3 Pick. 207; Dodge v. Adams, 19 Pick. 429; Wiggins v. Keizer, 6 Ind. 252; Hendricks v. Robinson, 56 Miss. 694; Dearborn v. Bowman, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 155; Updike v. Titus, 13 N. J. Eq. 151; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57; Wald. Poh. Cont. (2d Ed.) 169. More than this, the note would be void for illegality, because it would merely be evidence of Morris' assumption of the brokers' obligation to pay a gambling debt, without any consideration. It would be the same debt, with only a change of debtors, and would be subject to the same defense of illegality by the new debtor as by the old. Coulter v. Robertson, 14 Smedes & M. 18; Edwards v. Skirving, 1 Brev. 548; Blasdel v. Fowle, 120 Mass. 447.

The result of our consideration of this case is that upon the testimony admitted, and which should have been admitted, there was evidence enough to sustain a special verdict by the jury, upon which judgment would have to be entered in favor of Morris on the question of the legality and binding effect of the two notes in suit, which were only renewals of the original note. The action of the court below in excluding evidence, and in directing a verdict for Norton's administratrix, was therefore erroneous. The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, at the costs of defendant in error, with directions to order a new trial.

WHEATLEY v. LOW.

(Court of King's Bench, 1623. Cro. Jac. 668.)

Action on the case. Whereas he was obliged to J. S. in £40 for the payment of £20, and the bond being forfeited, he delivered £10 to the defendant to the intent he should pay it to J. S. in part of payment sine ullâ morâ; that in considerations inde the defendant assumed, etc., and assigns for breach, that he had not paid, whereupon the other had sued him for this debt, etc.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and verdict for the plaintiff.

It was moved in arrest of judgment that this is not any consideration, because it is not alleged that he delivered it to the defendant upon his request, and the acceptance of it to deliver to another sine morâ cannot be any benefit to the defendant to charge him with this promise.

Sed non allocatur, for being that he accepted this money to deliver, and promised to deliver it, it is a good consideration to charge him. Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff. A writ of error being brought, and this matter only assigned for error, the judgment was WOLFORD v. POWERS, Administratrix.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1882. 85 Ind. 294, 44 Am. Rep. 16.)

ELLIOTT, J.¹⁰⁹ The appellant's complaint is founded upon a promissory note executed by the appellee's intestate. The answer of the appellee alleges that the only consideration for the note sued on was the sum of $40 paid to the intestate by the appellant, and the agreement of the latter to bestow upon one of his children the name of Charles Lehman Wolford. [Reply setting out consideration in more detail. Demurrer to reply sustained. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appealed.] * * *

It is the general rule that where there is no fraud, and a party gets all the consideration he contracts for, the contract will be upheld. In Hardesty v. Smith, 3 Ind. 39, it was said: "When a party gets all the consideration he honestly contracted for, he cannot say that he gets no consideration, or that it has failed. If this doctrine be not correct then it is not true that parties are at liberty to make their own contracts." * * * In Pollock's Principles of Contract, the author quotes approvingly from a philosophic treatise this statement: "The value of all things contracted

¹⁰⁸ In Brown v. Ray, 10 Ire. L. (N. C.) 72 (1849), where the defendant, an execution debtor, promised the sheriff, who had sold the debtor's corn under executions, that he would attend to the measuring and delivery of the corn to the purchasers because it was inconvenient for the sheriff to do so, but afterwards refused to let the plaintiff have the corn he had purchased at the sale, Farson, J., said: "Nobody could have compelled the defendant to undertake to measure out and deliver the corn, when applied for; but as the trust was reposed in him, and he kept the corn, and undertook to deliver it, he is bound to do so, and is liable to this action for refusing, whether he had used the corn or still has it in his crib. In the language of Lord Holt, [in Coggs v. Barnard, 2 Raym. 909, 919] 'the owner trusted him with the goods, and he entered upon the trust.' But for this promise, the plaintiff would have required the sheriff to deliver the corn. This puts the plaintiff to inconvenience, and there is an expressed trust, and an undertaking to do the act. If one undertakes to lead my horse to Statesville, and turns him loose on the road or refuses to deliver him, he is liable, although no compensation was to be given; for he has entered upon the trust, and I have been put to inconvenience by reason of his undertaking."

for is measured by the appetite of the contractors, and, therefore, the just value is that which they be contented to give." An examination of the decided cases will prove this to be an unusually accurate statement of the law. In the case of Sturlyn v. Albany, 1 Cro. Eliz. 67, where the defendant promised the plaintiff that if he would show him a lease he would pay him a certain sum, the contract was held valid. The report of the decision reads thus: "But it was adjudged for the plaintiff: for when a thing is to be done by the plaintiff, be it never so small, this is a sufficient consideration to ground an action." It is laid down in an old book that, "If A, in consideration that B will deliver to him a recognizance to read over, assumes and promises within six days to redeliver the same to B, or to pay him £1,000, this is a good promise, upon which B may have an action against A, for the consideration is sufficient." 1 Bacon's Abridgement, 420. In Bainbridge v. Firmstone, 8 A. & E. 743, the defendant promised the plaintiff that if he would allow him, the defendant, to weigh certain boilers, he would return them within a reasonable time, and the consideration was held sufficient, Lord Denman saying: "The defendant had some reason for wishing to weigh the boilers; and he could do so only by obtaining permission from the plaintiff, which he did obtain by promising to return them in good condition. We need not inquire what benefit he expected to derive." In Haigh v. Brooks, 10 A. & E. 309, Lord Denman said, in speaking of the sufficiency of the consideration of a contract: "Both" (of the parties) "being free and able to judge for themselves, how can the defendant be justified in breaking this promise, by discovering afterwards that the thing in consideration of which he gave it did not possess that value which he supposed to belong to it? It cannot be ascertained that that value was what he most regarded. He may have had other objects and motives; and of their weight he was the only judge." This case came up on appeal and Lord Abinger, C. B., speaking for the court, said: "The actual surrender of the possession of the paper to the defendant was a sufficient consideration, without reference to its contents."¹¹⁰ Brooks v. Haigh, 10 A. & E. 323, 334. In the argument the case of Wilkinson v. Oliveria, 1 Bing. N. C. 490, was cited, wherein it was held that the surrender of a letter would support a promise to pay £1,000. Turning from the English to the American courts, we find many illustrations of the principle under discussion. In Hempler

¹¹⁰ The paper was a guaranty in the sum of £10,000. The defendant set up that the guaranty was void and its surrender to him constituted no consideration for his promise to see paid at maturity certain bills of exchange aggregating £9666 odd. The judges of the Exchequer Chamber thought that the guaranty was not void, but for the majority of them Lord Abinger, C. B., made the statement quoted in the principal case. That view is supported by other cases.

Yet it has been held in Alabama that there is no consideration for a note given for paper of no value under the mistaken belief that it was of value. McCollum v. Edmonds, 109 Ala. 322 (1895). And see Anderson v. Nystrom, 103 Minn. 168 (1908).

v. Schneider, 17 Mo. 258, the consideration for the promise was the agreement that a third person should return to St. Louis within fifty days; and it was held sufficient, the court saying: "This court is not aware of any law which would justify it in releasing men from their lawful contracts, unless in cases of fraud, imposition, accident, or mistake in their creation. The plaintiff may have sustained no damages in consequence of Nauman not having returned in fifty days, but there was a sufficient consideration for his undertaking, and he must abide the consequences of his own bargain deliberately entered into." In Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 380, it is said: "So if A promises B to pay him a certain sum of money, if he will call for it at a particular time, and B calls accordingly, the promise is binding, the calling for the money being a sufficient consideration. For any gain to the promisor or loss to the promisee, however trifling, is a sufficient consideration to support an express promise." The Supreme Court of South Carolina said: "Every man was free to make a contract, and free to refuse it; but when once made, he was bound by it, where there was no fraud, concealment, or latent defect. * * * Inadequacy of consideration is not alone any ground for setting aside a contract solemnly entered into." Whitefield v. McLeod, 1 Am. Dec. 650. * * *

There are, it is commonly but not altogether accurately said, two exceptions to the general rule we have stated:

First. Where the sole consideration is money, and the amount is greatly disproportioned to the value of the promise.

Second. Where the consideration is so grossly disproportionate to the value of the promise as to indicate fraud, shock the conscience of the court, and make the enforcement of the contract unconscionable.

Of these in their order:

First. A money consideration is capable of exact and definite admeasurement; its value is fixed and unalterable, and there cannot be any uncertainty as to its adequacy or inadequacy. The parties really exercise no judgment in passing upon its value, for that never is in doubt. Courts can, therefore, pass upon its sufficiency without infringing the rule that where the parties have for themselves determined the sufficiency of the consideration, courts will not review their decision. Schnell v. Nell, 17 Ind. 29; Shepard v. Rhodes, 7 R. I. 470. But where the consideration is something else than money, there must be some exercise of judgment in ascertaining and settling its value.

Second. Where the consideration is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience, courts will interfere, although there has been some exercise of judgment by the parties in fixing it. But it will be found upon an analysis of the cases that courts interfere upon the ground of fraud, and not upon the ground of inadequacy of consideration. The courts never do interfere unless the consideration is so grossly inadequate as to amount to fraud or oppression. Mr. Pomeroy has given the subject careful investigation, and concludes his discussion with this remark: "Even then fraud, and not inadequacy of price, is the true and only cause for the interposition of equity and the granting of relief." Pomeroy Eq. Jur. § 927. Judge Story is still more emphatic in his statement of the rule. "Mere inadequacy of price, or any other inequality in the bargain, is not, however, to be understood as constituting, per se, a ground to avoid a bargain in equity. For courts of equity, as well as courts of law, act upon the ground that every person who is not, from his peculiar condition or circumstances, under disability, is entitled to dispose of his property in such manner and upon such terms as he chooses; and whether his bargains are wise and discreet, and profitable or unprofitable, or otherwise, are considerations, not for courts of justice, but for the party himself to deliberate upon. Inadequacy of consideration is not, then of itself, a distinct principle of relief in equity. The common law knows no such principle. The consideration, be it more or less, supports the contract." 1 Story Eq. Jur., §§ 244, 245. * * *

The consideration in the case before us was, except as to the $40 paid in money, an indeterminate one, and one which the parties alone were competent to measure and determine * * * No person in the world, other than the promisor, can estimate the value of an act which arouses his gratitude, gratifies his ambition, or pleases his fancy. * * * The cases of Schnell v. Nell [17 Ind. 29] and Shepard v. Rhodes [7 R. I. 470] decide that where the consideration is money and nothing else, courts may determine its adequacy; but they both declare that where the consideration is an indeterminate one, the rule is otherwise. * * *

The surrender, at the intestate's request, of the right or privilege of naming the appellant's child, was the yielding of a consideration. The right to give his child a name was one which the father possessed, and one which he could not be deprived of against his consent. If the intestate chose to bargain for the exercise of this right, he should be bound, for by his bargain he limited and restrained the father's right to bestow his own or some other name upon the child. We can perceive no solid reason for declaring that the right with which the father parted at the intestate's request was of no value. It is difficult, if not impossible, to invent even a plausible reason for affirming that such a right or privilege is absolutely worthless. The father is the natural guardian of his child, and entitled to its services during infancy, and within this natural right must fall the privilege of bestowing a name upon it. In yielding to the intestate's request, and in consideration of the promise accompanying it, the appellant certainly suffered some deprivation and surrendered some right. * * * Conceding that the intestate derived no benefit, still, as the appellant suffered some detriment and yielded a right, there is a legal consideration.

The concession that the intestate secured no benefit is one that cannot be justly made, for he himself determined that the act done by the appellant, at his request, was a benefit to him. It is not necessary that the consideration for a promise should be a property one. It is true that the courts and text-writers use the words "valuable consideration," but this is done for the purpose of distinguishing the consideration from a good one, that is, one based upon love and affection, and from one resting on a purely moral obligation. "It is a familiar doctrine," says the Supreme Court of Texas, in Hendricks v. Snediker, 30 Tex. 296, "that there need be no pecuniary benefit passing to the vendor to make a consideration valuable." In most of the cases cited in discussing the first branch of this case, the consideration was something else than one having a pecuniary or property value. Others may be added. Thus, in Gurvin v. Cromartie, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 174, the consideration was the undertaking of the plaintiff to take a wife and have a child born unto him. In Adams v. Honness, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 326, the consideration was the removal of the promisee to a place near the home of the promisor; and this was also the consideration in Halsa v. Halsa, 8 Mo. 303, and Rumbolds v. Parr, 51 Mo. 592. In Worrell v. First Presbyterian Church, etc., 23 N. J. Eq. 96, the consideration was the resignation of the position of pastor of a church. In Anson on Contracts, 64 cases are collected upon this general subject, and the author says that courts "will not ask whether the thing which forms the consideration does in fact benefit the promisor, or a third party, or is of any substantial value to any one. It is enough that something is promised, done, forbore, or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made, as consideration for the promise made to him." We find scattered through the books cases where devises of property are made upon conditions having no pecuniary value at all, and yet they are always enforced; and so we find men in life making subscriptions to colleges on condition that they shall bear their names, or endowing professorships upon condition that they shall be given their names, and, so far as our observation has extended, the validity of such conditions has never been challenged. It is evident that the naming of a college, professorship or the like has always been considered as a matter of importance and value, for to declare otherwise would be to affirm that courts and law-writers have for ages been solemn respecters of worthless trifles. It will not do to say that the bestowal of a name is a valueless act, and if once it be granted to be of some value, then, in the absence of fraud or oppression, it must be held to possess the value placed upon it by the contracting parties. * * *

BROOKS v. BALL.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1830. 13 John. 337.)

Ball brought an action of assumpsit against Brooks, in the court below. The declaration contained a special count, stating that the plaintiff claimed of the defendant the sum of $100, which the defendant denied that he owed to the plaintiff, but promised that if the plaintiff would make oath to the correctness of his claim, he, the defendant, would pay the amount thereof; and averred that the plaintiff did make oath to the truth and correctness of his claim, but that the defendant, notwithstanding his promise, refused to pay the $100, etc. The declaration also contained the common money counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue.

After the plaintiff's counsel had stated his case, the defendant's counsel insisted that admitting the facts stated to be proved, they were not sufficient to support the action, because the promise of the defendant was without consideration and void, and the plaintiff could not lawfully support his claim on his own affidavit. He, therefore, moved that the plaintiff should be nonsuited, but the objection was overruled by the court. The plaintiff then went into the evidence in support of his case. It was proved that the defendant made the promise alleged; that the plaintiff had made the affidavit and demanded payment of the $100; and that the defendant had admitted his liability to pay the money, and intended to pay, but was advised to the contrary.

The defendant's counsel then offered to prove that the plaintiff, in his affidavit, had sworn falsely, or was grossly mistaken. This evidence was objected to and overruled by the court. And the counsel for the defendant tendered a bill of exceptions. The jury, under the direction of the court, found a verdict for the plaintiff for $110.50.

SPENCER, C. J. The principal question presented by this case is, whether a promise to pay a sum claimed to be due by one party and denied by the other, if the party claiming would swear to the correctness of the claim, and he does so swear, is a valid promise. Another question was made on the trial whether it was competent to the defendant below to prove that the plaintiff below either swore falsely or was grossly mistaken in the affidavit which he made.

It has been frequently decided that a promise to pay money, in consideration that the plaintiff would take an oath that it was due, was a valid and binding promise. Thus in Bretton v. Prettiman (T. Raym. 153) the plaintiff declared that the defendant promised, in consideration that the plaintiff would take an oath that money was due to him, he would pay him, and the plaintiff averred that he swore before a master in chancery. On demurrer it was adjudged for the plaintiff, and, as the reporter states, because it was not such an oath for which he may be indicted. In Anin & Andrews (1 Mod. 166) there was a promise to pay, if the plaintiff would bring two witnesses before a justice of the peace, who should depose that the defendant's father was indebted to the plaintiff; and two judges against one thought it not a profane oath, because it tended to the determining a controversy, and the plaintiff had judgment. This case occurred before the Statute of Frauds; the promise would now be holden to be void unless in writing, it being to pay the debt of a third person. The case of Bretton v. Prettiman is differently stated in 1 Sid. 283 and 2 Keb. 26, 44. It is there stated to be a promise to pay, if the plaintiff would procure a third person to make oath that the money was due. But this makes no difference in principle, for in either case the oath was extra-judicial.

In Stevens and Others v. Thacker (Peake's N. P. Rep. 187) the defendant was sued as the acceptor of a bill, and alleged it to be a forgery, and offered to make affidavit that he never had accepted it. The plaintiff agreed not to sue the defendant if he would make the affidavit. The affidavit was drawn, but not sworn to. Lord Kenyon said that had the defendant sworn to the affidavit, he should have held that he had discharged himself, though the affidavit had been false; for the plaintiffs who had agreed to accept that affidavit, as evidence of the fact, should not, after having induced the defendant to commit the crime of perjury maintain an action on the bill. In Lloyd v. Willan (1 Esp. Rep. 178) the defendant's attorney proposed to the plaintiff's attorney that the defendant should pay the demand, if the plaintiff's porter would make an affidavit that he had delivered the goods in question to the defendant. The affidavit was made, and Lord Kenyon held it to be conclusive, and that the defendant was precluded from going in to any defense in the case.

These cases, which stand uncontradicted, abundantly show that such a promise as the present is good in point of law, and that the making the proof or affidavit, whether by a third person or by the party himself, is a sufficient consideration for the promise. It is not making a man a judge in his own case, but it is referring a disputed fact to the conscience of the party. It is begging the question to suppose that it will lead to perjury. If the promise is binding, because the making the proof or affidavit is a consideration for it, the defendant must necessarily be precluded from gainsaying the fact. He voluntarily waives all other proof; and to allow him to draw in question the verity or correctness of the proof or affidavit would be allowing him to alter the conditions of his engagement and virtually to rescind his promise.

MANSON & MACPHEE v. FLANAGAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1919. 233 Mass. 150, 123 N. E. 614.)

Action by Manson & MacPhee against Bridget M. Flanagan. Verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

CARROLL, J.¹¹² The defendant made a contract with Louis Fisher to build a four-family house for the sum of $7,000. Fisher was to furnish all material and provide all the labor. The plaintiffs agreed with Fisher to do the stair work on the premises, furnishing labor and material for the entire price of $120. The work was completed September 28, 1915; demand for payment was made on Fisher, and refused. Within 30 days from the completion of the work, on October 26, 1915, one of the plaintiffs called on the defendant and informed her that he would place a lien on the premises unless she agreed to pay their claim. Thereupon the defendant agreed in writing to pay the amount due on the contract. * * *

There was evidence that * * * at the time when the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiffs they could have filed a valid lien for the labor performed or furnished, under their contract, in the erection of the building. The defendant's promise to pay the plaintiffs was based upon a legal consideration, and although the lien could be enforced for the labor only, and the value of the labor formed but a small part of the entire claim, the mere inadequacy of the consideration, in the absence of fraud, is no defense to the plaintiff's right to recover. Dean v. Carruth, 108 Mass. 242.

 LUING v. PETERSON.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1919. 143 Minn. 6, 172 N. W. 692.)

Action by John Luing, as guardian, etc., against M. O. Peterson. Judgment for plaintiff in part, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

¹¹² The statement of facts and part of the opinion are omitted.

"Adequacy or inadequacy of consideration is a subject to be considered by the parties at the time they make the contract. There is no law regulating the amount of consideration necessary to support a particular promise. If the parties have capacity to contract and there is no fraud or misplaced confidence, and there is any valuable consideration, the courts will enforce the contract according to its terms." Atkinson, J., in Atlanta & West Point R. R. Co. v. Camp, 130 Ga. 1, 4 (1907).

PER CURIAM. Defendant is a collector at Canby, Minn. He held for collection more than a score of claims against Barney Sorrenson, amounting in the aggregate to over $1,400. In April, 1916, Barney Sorrenson desired to go to Rochester, Minn., for medical treatment. For the purpose of paying his expenses his mother, Ragnhild Sorrenson, applied to defendant for a loan of $200, offering to give a mortgage on certain real estate. Defendant agreed to make the loan if Ragnhild Sorrenson would "secure up the debts of Barney" which he held for collection, by a mortgage on the same property, and she assented. Defendant made the loan, and Ragnhild Sorrenson gave two notes and mortgages, one for $1,015, securing the loan and part of the claims, the other for $635.60 securing the balance of the claims. Both mortgages bore the same date and were executed at the same time and as part of the same transaction. Both notes were payable one year after date. There is no evidence that defendant had any authority to extend the time of the payment of the claims held by him. Ragnhild Sorrenson was then an old lady 88 years old. She was not then under guardianship. Plaintiff has since been appointed guardian of her estate. He brought this action to set aside the notes and mortgages. The court granted this relief, except as to the money advanced by defendant.

There is no claim made on this appeal that plaintiff was incompetent at the time of the giving of the mortgages, or that she was imposed upon. Apparently the security she had would have secured the loan she wanted from any money lender. She is said to have stated at the time of the loan that she intended that her son should have this property. The sole ground of the court's decision was that the notes and mortgages were without consideration except to the extent of the amount advanced by defendant. This is the question on this appeal.

A naked collateral promise of Ragnhild Sorrenson to pay her son's debts would be unenforceable. Security Bank of Minnesota v. Bell, 32 Minn. 409, 21 N. W. 470; Turle v. Sargent, 63 Minn. 211, 65 N. W. 349, 56 Am. St. Rep. 475. To support a promise to pay the debt of another previously incurred, there must be some new consideration. An agreement to extend the time of payment or to forbear to sue would furnish such a consideration (Nichols & Shepard Co. v. Dedrick, 61 Minn. 513, 63 N. W. 1110), but it is not shown that the agreement for extension was binding on the owners of these claims. See Mason v. Edward Thompson, 94 Minn. 472, 103 N. W. 507.

A majority of the court are of the opinion that the making of the new loan to Ragnhild Sorrenson was not a sufficient consideration for her promise to pay the debts of her son which defendant held for collection, and that the notes and mortgages which she gave therefor are void and unenforceable obligations.

Justices HALLAM and DIBELL dissent. They are of the opinion that the loan of money to Ragnhild Sorrenson was a sufficient consideration to support, not only a promise to repay the money loaned, but to support the promise to pay the other debts as well. See Bennett v. Morse, 6 Colo. App. 122, 39 Pac. 582; Barton v. Farmer National Bank, 122 Ill. 352, 13 N. E. 503; Loewen v. Forsee, 137 Mo. 29, 38 S. W. 712, 59 Am. St. Rep. 489.

*Judgment affirmed.*¹¹⁴

¹¹⁴ A difference of judicial opinion has developed in regard to options. In Miller v. Kimmel, 76 Okla. 233, 184 Pac. 762, 765 (1919), Rainey, J., said: "An option contract based upon an adequate consideration is not voidable on the ground that one party is bound and the other is not.

"Was $100 an adequate consideration for the option contract? There are cases which hold that a nominal consideration, such as 50 cents and $1, is inadequate; but the weight of authority seems to be that $1 is an adequate consideration for an option to run a reasonable period in the absence of fraud or undue influence. Twenty-five dollars has been held to be a sufficient consideration for an option to purchase real estate within four weeks for $4,975. Mueller v. Nortmann, 116 Wis. 468, 93 N. W. 538, 96 Am. St. Rep. 997; Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580. In Guyer v. Warren, the consideration expressed in the option was $1; the real consideration was $50 to purchase in one year a farm for $8,000, which was held adequate."

Twenty-five cents down served in Marsh v. Lott, 8 Cal. App. 384, 97 Pac. 163 (1908) and $1.00 in Smith v. Baugham, 156 Cal. 359 (1909), Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328 (1898) and Morrison v. Johnson (Minn.) 181 N. W. 945 (1921). But that $1.00 is insufficient, see Murphy, Thompson & Co. v. Reed, 125 Ky. 585 (1907) where O'Rear, C. J., said (pp. 589-591):

"The consideration for the agreement to give the optionee the definite time within which to exercise his choice, called the 'option,' is in these cases the $1 recited. It might have been more, or an entirely different consideration. Though there are authorities holding a consideration of $1 as sufficient to uphold such an agreement, we are not disposed to go so far. Such consideration is so flagrantly disproportionate to the value of the privilege in these cases—the options extending over a year—that it is merely nominal. It is not substantial, and the parties could not have regarded it as in any sense an equivalent of the privilege which was being contracted for. While upon demurrer the courts will be slow to say that a recited consideration is no consideration, if it has any appearance of having been regarded by the parties as the agreed value of the thing contracted for, where the stated consideration is so manifestly inadequate and disproportionate to the value of the thing being sold (the privilege or option) as to represent no value, or only a nominal value, it will be construed on demurrer, as a matter of law, as not having a consideration at all. If there is doubt about the matter, then the question of its value or adequacy is a defense to be pleaded. An option, to be binding upon the owner, in the sense that it is irrevocable upon him during the period for which it is given, must be upon a valuable and sufficient consideration. It may consist in money paid or to be paid for it, or in property, services, or counter benefits accruing to the owner, or disadvantage incurred by the optionee. In short, it may be such consideration as will support any other sort of contract. In this view of the matter, the options in these cases were not supported by sufficient consideration to have bound the owners not to withdraw them during the term for which they were given. They could have been withdrawn before acceptance, without liability to the giver of the options. But, as they were not withdrawn, they constituted, instead of binding options, voluntary

BOLTON v. MADDEN.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1873. L. R. 9 Q. B. D. 55.)

Declaration for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request. Plea, never indebted. Issue thereon. Plaintiff nonsuited, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for £7 7s. Rule nisi to enter a verdict for plaintiff.

BLACKBURN, J.¹¹⁵ * * * There was no dispute as to the facts. The plaintiff and defendant were both subscribers to a charity, the objects of which are elected by the subscribers who have votes proportioned in number to the amount they have subscribed. The plaintiff and defendant expressly agreed that if the plaintiff would give twenty-eight votes for an object of charity whom the defendant favoured, the defendant would at the next election give twenty-eight votes for such object of charity as the plaintiff should then favor. The plaintiff performed his part of this agreement, and voted for the candidate favoured by the defendant; but the defendant made default, and did not furnish any votes for the candidate favoured by the plaintiff at the next election. The plaintiff in consequence subscribed £7 7s. to the charity so as to obtain twenty-eight more votes in his own right, which he used in lieu of those which the defendant had promised to supply him.

There can be no doubt that there was an express promise by the defendant and a breach of that promise; but the doubt raised was, whether the consideration was such as to make that promise enforceable at law.

The general rule is, that an executory agreement, by which the plaintiff agrees to do something on the terms that the defendant agrees to do something else, may be enforced, if what the plaintiff has agreed to do is "either for the benefit of the defendant or to the trouble or prejudice of the plaintiff;" see Com. Dig. Action on the case in assumpsit, B. 1. If it be either, the adequacy of the consideration is for the parties to consider at the time of making the agreement, not for the court when it is sought to be enforced.

The argument for the defendant was that the subscriber to a charity is under an obligation to give his votes for the best object, and that the plaintiff, if he gave his votes at the first election to what he thought the best candidate, incurred neither trouble nor prejudice, so that there was in that point of view no consideration; and if he gave his votes to the candidate whom he did not think the best, the whole agreement is void as against public policy.

But though some of us, at least, much disapprove of this kind of trafoffers to sell, which, like any other valid offer, were, when accepted, binding upon the person making them." See also Axe v. Tolbert, 179 Mich. 556 (1914).

fic, we can find no legal principle to justify us in holding that the subscriber to a charity may not give his votes as he pleases, answering only to his own conscience and reputation for the way he exercises his power.

We think, therefore, the nonsuit cannot be supported, and as there was evidence justifying the jury in assessing the damages as they have done, the rule must be made absolute to enter verdict for the plaintiff.

Rule absolute.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF ALBANY v. COOPER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1889. 112 N. Y. 517, 20 N. E. 352, 3 L. R. A. 468, 8 Am. St. Rep. 767.)

Appeal from order of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the third judicial department, made the first Tuesday of May, 1887, which reversed a judgment in favor of plaintiff, entered upon the report of a referee, and ordered a new trial. (Reported below, 45 Hun, 453.)

This was a reference under the statute of a disputed claim against the estate of Thomas P. Crook, defendant's intestate. The claim arose under a subscription paper, of which the following is a copy:

"We, the undersigned, hereby severally promise and agree to and with the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church in this city of Albany, in consideration of $1 to each of us in hand paid and the agreements of each other in this contract contained, to pay on or before three years from the date hereof to said trustees the sum set opposite to our respective names, but upon the express condition, and not otherwise, that the sum of $45,000 in the aggregate shall be subscribed and paid in for the purpose hereinafter stated; and if within one year from this date said sum shall not be subscribed or paid in for such purpose, then this agreement to be null and of no effect. The purpose of this subscription is to pay off the mortgage debt of $45,000, now a lien upon the church edifice of said church, and the subscription or contribution for that purpose must equal that sum in the aggregate to make this agreement binding.

"Dated May 18th, 1884."

The defendants' intestate made two subscriptions to this paper, one of $5000 and the other of $500. He paid upon the subscription $2000. The claim was for the balance.

ANDREWS, J. It is, we think, an insuperable objection to the maintenance of this action, that there was no valid consideration to uphold the subscription of the defendant's intestate. It is, of course, unquestionable that no action can be maintained to enforce a gratuitous promise, however worthy the object intended to be promoted. The performance of such a promise rests wholly on the will of the person making it. He can refuse to perform, and his legal right to do so cannot be disputed, although his refusal may disappoint reasonable expectations, or may not be justified in the forum of conscience. By the terms of the subscription paper the subscribers promise and agree to and with the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Albany, to pay to said trustees, within three years from its date, the sums severally subscribed by them, for the purpose of paying off "the mortgage-debt of $45,000 on the church edifice," upon the condition that the whole sum shall be subscribed or paid in within one year. It recites a consideration—viz., "in consideration of $1 to each of us (subscribers) in hand paid and the agreement of each other in this contract contained." It was shown that the $1 recited to have been paid was not in fact paid, and the fact that the promise of each subscriber was made by reason of and in reliance upon similar promises by the others constitutes no consideration as between the corporation for whose benefit the promise was made and the promisors. The recital of consideration paid does not preclude the promisor from disputing the fact in a case like this, nor does the statement of a particular consideration which, on its face, is insufficient to support a promise, give it any validity, although the fact recited may be true.

It has sometimes been supposed that when several persons promise to contribute to a common object, desired by all, the promise of each may be a good consideration for the promise of others, and this although the object in view is one in which the promisors have no pecuniary or legal interest, and the performance of the promise by one of the promisors would not in a legal sense be beneficial to the others. This seems to have been the view of the chancellor as expressed in Hamilton College v. Stewart when it was before the court of Errors (2 Den. 417), and dicta of judges will be found to the same effect in other cases. (Trustees, etc., v. Stetson, 5 Pick. 508; Watkins v. Eames, 9 Cush. 537.) But the doctrine of the chancellor, as we understand, was overruled when the Hamilton College Case came before this court (1 N. Y. 581), as have been also the dicta in the Massachusetts cases, by the court in that state, in the recent case of Cottage Street Methodist Episcopal Church v. Kendall (121 Mass. 528). The doctrine seems to us unsound in principle. It proceeds on the assumption that a stranger both to the consideration and the promise, and whose only relation to the transaction is that of donee of an executory gift, may sue to enforce the payment of the gratuity for the reason that there has been a breach of contract between the several promisors and a failure to carry out as between themselves their mutual engagement. It is in no proper sense a case of mutual promises, as between the plaintiff and defendant.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁶ Yet in New York, as elsewhere, a different view is entertained in the case of compositions with creditors. As was said by Earl, J., in White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518, 524 (1887): "It is a general rule of law that the acceptance of a lesser sum or an agreement to accept it, does not bar a demand for a greater sum. There is an exception to this general rule, however, in the

In the disposition of this case we must, therefore, reject the consideration recited in the subscription paper as ground for supporting the promise of the defendant's intestate, the money consideration, because it had no basis in fact, and the mutual promise between the subscribers, because there is no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the promisors. Some consideration must, therefore, be found other than that expressly stated in the subscription paper, in order to sustain the action. It is urged that a consideration may be found in the efforts of the trustees of the plaintiff during the year, and the time and labor expended by them during that time to secure subscriptions in order to fulfill the condition upon which the liability of the subscribers depended. There is no doubt that labor and services, rendered by one party at the request of another, constitute a good consideration for a promise made by the latter to the former, based on the rendition of the service. But the plaintiff encounters the difficulty that there is no evidence, express or implied, on the face of the subscription paper, nor any evidence outside of it, that the corporation or its trustees did or undertook to do anything upon the invitation or request of the subscribers. Nor is there any evidence that the trustees of the plaintiff, as representatives of the corporation, in fact did anything in their corporate capacity, or otherwise than as individuals, interested in promoting the general object in view.¹¹⁷

Leaving out of the subscription paper the affirmative statement of the consideration (which, for reasons stated, may be rejected), it stands as a naked promise of the subscribers to pay the several amounts subscribed by them for the purpose of paying the mortgage on the church property upon a condition precedent limiting their liability. Neither the case of a composition by a debtor with his creditors, in which they agree to accept less than their entire demands. Such an agreement, if entered into by a debtor with a number of creditors, each acting on the faith of the engagement of the others, will be binding upon them, for each in that case has the undertaking of the rest as a consideration for his own undertaking."

By the weight of authority the view that the promise of each is the consideration for the promises of the others, if so intended, is accepted as applied to charitable subscriptions. On consideration for subscriptions to charity, see 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 785, note.

¹¹⁷ In Keuka College v. Ray, 167 N. Y. 96, 100 (1901), Gray, J., said that in First Presbyterian Church v. Albany, supra. "Judge Andrews re-asserts the doctrine, as laid down in the earlier cases, that a naked promise to pay money, bare of any condition, accepted by the promisee, to do something, will not be sustained; but he, very distinctly, recognizes the rule that where there is a request to the promisee to go on and render services, or to incur liabilities, on the faith of a subscription, which request is complied with, the subscription would be binding. It may be observed that the difficulty in the case last mentioned, and which prevented the maintenance of the action upon the defendant's subscription, was, as Judge Andrews stated, that there was 'no evidence, express or implied, on the face of the subscription paper, nor any evidence outside of it, that the corporation, or its trustees, did, or undertook to do, anything on the invitation or request of the subscribers.'" church nor the trustees promise to do any thing, nor are they requested to do anything, nor can such a request be implied. It was held in Hamilton College v. Stewart (1 N. Y. 581) that no such request could be implied from the terms of the subscription in that case, in which the ground for such an implication was, to say the least, as strong as in this case. It may be assumed from the fact that the subscriptions were to be paid to the trustees of the church for the purpose of paying the mortgage, that it was understood that the trustees were to make the payment out of the moneys received. But the duty to make such payment, in case they accepted the money, would arise out of their duty as trustees. This duty would arise upon the receipt of the money, although they had no antecedent knowledge of the subscription. They did not assume even this obligation by the terms of the subscription, and the fact that the trustees applied money, paid on subscriptions, upon the mortgage debt, did not constitute a consideration for the promise of the defendant's intestate. We are unable to distinguish this case in principle from Hamilton College v. Stewart (1 N. Y. 581). There is nothing that can be urged to sustain this subscription that could not, with equal force, have been urged to sustain the subscription in that case. In both, the promise was to the trustees of the respective corporations. In each case the defendant had paid part of his subscription and resisted the balance. In both, part of the subscription had been collected and applied by the trustees to the purpose specified. In the Hamilton College Case (which in that respect is unlike the present one) it appeared that the trustees had incurred expense in employing agents to procure subscriptions to make up the required amount, and it was shown, also, that professors had been employed upon the strength of the fund subscribed. That case has not been overruled, but has been frequently cited with approval in the courts of this and other states. The cases of Barnes v. Perine (12 N. Y. 18) and Roberts v. Cobb (103 id. 600) are not in conflict with that decision. There is, we suppose, no doubt that a subscription invalid at the time for want of consideration may be made valid and binding by a consideration arising subsequently between the subscribers and the church or corporation for whose benefit it is made. Both of the cases cited, as we understand them, were supported on this principle. There was, as was held by the court in each of these cases, a subsequent request by the subscriber to the promisee to go on and render service or incur liabilities on the faith of the subscription, which request was complied with, and services were rendered or liabilities incurred pursuant thereto. It was as if the request was made at the very time of the subscription, followed by performance of the request by the promisor. Allen, J., in his opinion in Barnes v. Perine, said, "the request and promise were, to every legal effect, simultaneous," and he expressly disclaims any intention to interfere with the decision in the Hamilton College Case. In the present case it was shown that individual trustees were active in procuring subscriptions.

But, as has been said, they acted as individuals, and not in their official capacity. They were deeply interested, as was Mr. Crook, in the success of the effort to pay the debt on the church, and they acted in unison. But what the trustees did was not prompted by any request from Mr. Crook. They were co-laborers in promoting a common object. We can but regret that the intention of the intestate in respect to a matter in which he was deeply interested, and whose interest was manifested up to the very time of his death, is thwarted by the conclusion we have reached. But we think there is no alternative, and that the order should be affirmed.

All concur.

Order affirmed and judgment accordingly.

BROKAW v. McELROY.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1913. 162 Ia. 288, 143 N. W. 1087, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 835.)

This is an action on four promissory notes. It is brought on behalf of the Kansas City University against the administrator of John W. Murphy, deceased, the maker of the notes. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no consideration for any of the notes. Judgment was entered against plaintiff for costs, and he appeals. Reversed.

EVANS, J.¹¹⁸ Four notes are involved. The first note was for $2,000, dated September 24, 1904. The second was for $4,000, dated July 24, 1908. The third was for $4,000, dated October 22, 1908. The fourth was for $10,000, dated June 18, 1909. The following is a copy of the first note: "For value received by me, and for the purpose of securing a fund for the endowment of the Kansas City University, of Kansas City, Kansas, I hereby bind myself, and my heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay to the order of the treasurer of said Kansas City University, of Kansas City, Kansas, the sum of two thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of 1/10 of 1 per cent. per annum from the date hereof. The principal sum hereby secured shall be due and payable on or before the expiration of one year after my decease. Date: September 24, 1904. Post office: Murphy, Jasper County, Iowa. [Signed] John W. Murphy." The others were all drawn in like form. These notes were each delivered at or about the date thereof and were accepted by the payee. The purpose of the maker was to contribute the amounts named to the payee to carry out the purpose of its organization as a university. The special purpose for which such funds were to be used was indicated upon the face of the notes, and to some extent by letters. This was that the proceeds of the first three notes should be used for the purpose of securing an endowment fund. The proceeds of the fourth note were to be used for "erecting a building on the campus." Other subscriptions were subsequently solicited by the university and received from other contributors. Previous gifts, including those of Murphy, were made public as an inducement to subsequent contributions. This was done, to some extent, at least, with the express consent of Murphy.

In view of the directed verdict below, we are only concerned with the question whether the evidence in the record affirmatively discloses want of consideration so as to justify the trial court in taking the case from the jury. We reach a conclusion contrary to such ruling of the trial court * * *

I. A sufficient consideration in such a case as this may assume various forms. It is not necessary that the benefit accrue to the promisor. It is frequently, if not usually, true that written promises of this kind are made for the purpose of assisting in the maintenance of the beneficiary institution within the scope of the purpose for which it was organized. Other assistance from other sources is expected. A contribution by one naturally operates as an inducement to contributions by others. It is not unusual that publicity is given to contributions already made as an inducement to others. If it is within the contemplation of a contributor that the fact of his contribution may be announced to others as an inducement to contributions by them, and if additional contributions be made by reason of such inducement even in part, it operates as a sufficient consideration for the promise of the first contributor. It is not essential, in such a case, that the additional contributions thus induced should be devoted to the same fund or to the erection of the same building. If the original promise, when made, was intended to induce activities and expenditures by the beneficiary in pursuance of the purpose of its organization, and if such activities and such expenditures were induced thereby even in part, it is a sufficient consideration. In either case, it is not necessary that such promise be the sole inducement either to additional contributions by other contributors or to burdensome activities and substantial expenditures by the beneficiary and its appropriate officers. It is not indispensable that direct evidence be had that such activities and expenditures or additional contributions were thus induced, or that such inducement was within the contemplation of the parties. If these facts can be found by fair inference from all the circumstances in evidence, it is sufficient at least to make a jury question.

Such an institution as the beneficiary herein is necessarily supported by the co-operation of many people who have a common and unselfish interest in its success. Ordinarily, one man could not carry the load alone. Co-operation is usually within the contemplation of each contributor. His gift would become mere waste if it must stand alone. A contribution, therefore, may be in the nature of a response to a previous contribution by another, or it may be in the nature of an invitation to future contributions by others, or it may partake of the nature of both. All this may become a question of fact in a particular case. It would be manifestly unjust to permit a promisor of a contribution to withdraw his promise after it had served the function of inducing other contributors to incur obligations to the same beneficiary and for the same general purpose. We think that notes of this kind rest upon a somewhat different foundation from a note executed in a transaction, in contemplation of a pecuniary benefit to the maker or to some other person selected by him, other than the payee. Such notes are frequently, if not usually, executed, not as evidence of a promise to make a future gift, but for the specific purpose of creating a present asset for its beneficiary. A very substantial part of the assets of such institutions exist in this form. To lightly withhold judicial sanction from such obligations would be to destroy millions of assets of the most beneficent institutions in our land, and to render such institutions helpless to carry out the purpose of their organization. Undoubtedly, authorities are in conflict at this point, and some courts have applied a very narrow rule to this class of obligations. We think the trend of modern judicial opinion is in the other direction.

A case somewhat similar to the case at bar was considered by the Supreme Court of Ohio in Irwin v. Lombard University, 56 Ohio St. 9, 46 N. E. 63, 36 L. R. A. 239, 60 Am St. Rep. 727. We quote from the opinion: "It is equally apparent from that, prompted by the promises and gifts of Gilpin and others, 'responsibility has been undertaken' by the university. It did not abandon the educational enterprise which these donors and promisors were desirous of promoting. Whether the object of the promisors was to secure the opportunity of educating their own children under such influences as they desired, or more generally to contribute to the public welfare by increasing the facilities for higher education, it has been accomplished. It has been accomplished by the expenditure of money and the incurring of obligations in reliance upon their promises and similar promises from others. Institutions of this character are incorporated by public authority for defined purposes. Money recovered by them on promises of this character cannot be used for the personal and private ends of an individual, but must be used for the purposes defined. To this use the university is restricted, not only by the law of its being, but as well by the obligations arising from its acceptance of the promise. A promise to give money to one, to be used by him according to his inclination and for his personal ends, is prompted only by motive. But a promise to pay money to such an institution, to be used for such defined and public purposes, rests upon consideration. The general course of decisions is favorable to the binding obligation of such promises. They have been influenced, not only by such reasons as those already stated, but in some cases, at least, by state policy as indiated by constitutional and statutory provisions. The policy of this state, as so indicated, is promotive of education, religion, and philanthropy. In addition to the declarations of the Constitution upon the subject, the policy of the state is indicated by numerous legislative enactments providing for the incorporation of colleges, churches, and other institutions of philanthropy, which are intended to be perpetual, and which, not only for their establishment, but for their perpetual maintenance, are authorized to receive contributions from those who are in sympathy with their purposes, and methods—the only source from which, in view of their nature, their support can be derived. Looking to the plainly declared purpose of the lawmaking department, promises made with a view to discharging the debts of such institutions, to providing the means for the employment of teachers, to establishing endowment funds to give them greater stability and efficiency, and whatever may be necessary or helpful to accomplish their purposes or secure their permanency, must be held valid. A view which omits considerations of this character is too narrow to be technically correct. It is not contemplated by the parties, nor is it required by the law, that in cases of this character the institution shall have done a particular thing in reliance upon a particular promise. Not only do the law and the parties contemplate the permanency of the institution, but all promisors understand that the proceeds of their promises will be mingled with prior and subsequent donations, and together constitute the financial support of the enterprise. The case must be rare indeed in which such contributions or promises would be made if others had not been made before and rarer still in which they would be made but for the belief that others will be made afterwards. The requirements of the law are satisfied, the objects of the parties secured, and the perpetration of frauds prevented by the conclusion that the consideration for the promise in question is the accomplishment, through the university, of the purposes for which it was incorporated, and in whose aid the promise was made. The defense properly failed because there was neither allegation nor proof of abandonment of those purposes. * * * Indeed, the validity of such promises is supported by all the cases in which it has been held that subscriptions for public purposes of such a nature are enforceable. For the law, regarding the substance rather than the form, permits no distinction because of the promises being in one instrument or several instruments. And the mutuality of the interests of the several promisors is not to be determined as a matter of time from the dates of their promises, but from the continuity and perpetuity of the object to be accomplished."

This case was followed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Albert Lea College v. Brown, 88 Minn. 524, 93 N. W. 672, 60 L. R. A. 870. We quote from the opinion of that court: "One of the first cases to depart from the earlier decisions, which held strictly to the necessity of a pecuniary consideration moving to the promisor, is Collier v. Society, 8 B. Mon. [Ky.] 68. In that case a promissory note was given, whereby the maker promised and agreed to pay the Kentucky Baptist Educational Society the sum of $250, to further the interests and aid in the payment of the expenses of its management. The maker refused to pay the note when due, and an action was brought against him to recover thereon. There was no pecuniary consideration moving to him nor does it appear that the society to which it was given ever incurred any debts or obligations upon the strength of it; but the court held the maker of the note liable, on the ground that as the charter of the society authorized it to accept and receive such donations and gifts, and it was required, under the law, to carry out the directions of donor, a sufficient consideration was shown. A well-considered case (also a departure from the old rule) is Trustees of Troy Academy v. Nelson, 24 Vt. 189. In that case defendant, with others, signed a subscription paper, thereby promising to pay to the trustees of the academy the sum of $100 for the purpose of enabling them to pay its debts, provided the sum of $20,000 was subscribed for the same purpose by a certain date. This amount was fully subscribed. Defendant paid one-half of his subscription, but refused to pay the balance. The court held that the obligations imposed upon and assumed by the trustees of the academy to make application of the money as directed by the subscribers to the fund so consummated the contract that defendant could not avoid payment on the ground that there was no consideration for his promise, and that, whether the relation each subscriber bore to the other, or the relation each bore to the academy itself, be considered, defendant was estopped from denying the obligation of the contract. It will be observed in that case that the executory promise of defendant was for the purpose of raising a fund to discharge a past-due indebtedness of the academy, and nothing appears to have been done by the officers in reliance on the promise. In the case of Trustees v. Cowls, 6 Pick. [Mass.] 427, 17 Am. Dec. 387, the court held a promissory note by defendant, by which he agreed to pay plaintiff, an educational institution, a sum of money to further its objects and purposes, viz., to educate indigent young men of promising talents and hopeful piety, valid and enforceable, though it does not appear that any particular obligations were contracted by the officers of the institution on the faith of the promise. The court said: 'Was there a consideration for the note? In one sense there was not—that is, the promisor receiving nothing from the payee at the time it was given which was of pecuniary value; but it was sufficient to create a consideration that the other party, the payee, should have assumed an obligation in consequence of receiving the note, which he was compellable, either at law or equity, to perform, unless the promisor should be able to show, when sued, that the payee had refused, or was unable or had unreasonably neglected to perform the engagement on his part, in which case a defense might be raised on the ground of no consideration.' * * * In the case at bar the trustees, upon the delivery of the note to them, expressly accepted the same, and thereby assumed the obligations imposed by the terms of the promise; and upon the strength of this promise, and others, were enabled to continue the purposes of the college, when, without it, it would have been necessary that they suspend operations and dissolve the corporation. As already stated, plaintiff was incorporated as an educational institution, and depended for its support, and to enable it to carry out its purposes, upon donations of philanthropists and other charitably disposed persons. Such institutions are expressly authorized, under the provisions of the statute under which plaintiff was incorporated, to accept and receive such donations, and may be compelled and required by the courts to carry out faithfully the purposes of a particular donation. Money contributed to it for the purpose of an endowment fund may not be diverted from that purpose, and its application may be compelled by proper judicial proceedings. Many of the colleges of the present day depend almost wholly upon voluntary contributions for their support, and philanthropists who contribute thereto are impelled to do so by their sentiments of charity, benevolence, and good will; and the opportunity amply repays the outlay, and to them is far greater than any considerations of a pecuniary nature."

None of our own previous cases are decisive of the case at bar. In the conflict of authority, we think the foregoing presents the sounder and perhaps the more modern view. Such view has also the merit that it is direct and practical, in that it gives legal sanction to the voluntary conduct and manifest purpose of the parties to the notes. The purpose to be thus subserved has the sanction of the law in a special and statutory sense, and there is no apparent reason of public policy why the consideration of such notes should be lightly impeached, or should be determined by artificial tests foreign to the purpose of the parties. Of course, if fraud or deceit or undue influence or breach of obligation were charged, the fact that the consideration was wholly altruistic would be a circumstance proper to be considered and would be available to the defendant as such. In the case at bar, there was evidence that, in reliance on these notes and others, the beneficiary enlarged its plans and increased its work and incurred added expenditures therefor, all of which was done within the scope of its corporate purpose. We think such evidence tended to show consideration.

II. It is urged by the appellant that it incurred expenses in the form of commissions in obtaining these very contributions from Mr. Murphy. It contends that these very expenditures for commissions are a sufficient consideration to support the notes. The suggestion is quite abhorrent, and we know of no legal principle, to justify it. Such an expenditure cannot be deemed a consideration. Such an expenditure is essentially different in its nature and in its equity from expenditures and obligations incurred in carrying on the enterprise for which the institution was organized, in reliance upon the promise in question. * * *

The judgment below must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

RICKETTS v. SCOTHORN.

(Supreme Court of Nebraska, 1898. 57 Neb. 51, 77 N. W. 365, 42 L. R. A. 794, 78 Am. St. Rep. 491.)

SULLIVAN, J. In the District Court of Lancaster county, the plaintiff, Katie Scothorn, recovered judgment against the defendant, Andrew D. Ricketts, as executor of the last will and testament of John C. Ricketts, deceased. The action was based upon a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "May the first, 1891. I promise to pay to Katie Scothorn on demand, $2,000, to be at 6 per cent. per annum. J. C. Ricketts." In the petition the plaintiff alleges that the consideration for the execution of the note was that she should surrender her employment as bookkeeper for Mayer Bros., and cease to work for a living. She also alleges that the note was given to induce her to abandon her occupation, and that, relying on it, and on the annual interest, as a means of support, she gave up the employment in which she was then engaged. These allegations of the petition are denied by the administrator.

The material facts are undisputed. They are as follows: John C. Ricketts, the maker of the note, was the grandfather of the plaintiff. Early in May—presumably on the day the note bears date—he called on her at the store where she was working. What transpired between them is thus described by Mr. Flodene, one of the plaintiff's witnesses: "A. Well, the old gentleman came in there one morning about nine o'clock, probably a little before or a little after, but early in the morning, and he unbuttoned his vest, and took out a piece of paper in the shape of a note; that is the way it looked to me; and he says to Miss Scothorn, 'I have fixed out something that you have not got to work any more.' He says, none of my grandchildren work, and you don't have to. Q. Where was she? A. She took the piece of paper and kissed him, and kissed the old gentleman, and commenced to cry." It seems Miss Scothorn immediately notified her employer of her intention to quit work, and that she did soon after abandon her occupation. The mother of the plaintiff was a witness, and testified that she had a conversation with her father, Mr. Ricketts, shortly after the note was executed, in which he informed her that he had given the note to the plaintiff to enable her to quit work; that none of his grandchildren worked, and he did not think she ought to. For something more than a year the plaintiff was without an occupation, but in September, 1892, with the consent of her grandfather, and by his assistance, she secured a position as bookkeeper with Messrs. Funke & Ogden. On June 8, 1894, Mr. Ricketts died. He had paid one year's interest on the note, and a short time before his death expressed regret that he had not been able to pay the balance. In the summer or fall of 1892 he stated to his daughter, Mrs. Scothorn, that if he could sell his farm in Ohio he would pay the note out of the proceeds. He at no time repudiated the obligation.

We quite agree with counsel for the defendant that upon this evidence there was nothing to submit to the jury, and that a verdict should have been directed peremptorily for one of the parties. The testimony of Flodene and Mrs. Scothorn, taken together, conclusively establishes the fact that the note was not given in consideration of the plaintiff pursuing, or agreeing to pursue, any particular line of conduct. There was no promise on the part of the plaintiff to do, or refrain from doing, anything. Her right to the money promised in the note was not made to depend upon an abandonment of her employment with Mayer Bros., and future abstention from like service. Mr. Ricketts made no condition, requirement, or request. He exacted no quid pro quo. He gave the note as a gratuity, and looked for nothing in return. So far as the evidence discloses, it was his purpose to place the plaintiff in a position of independence, where she could work or remain idle, as she might choose. The abandonment by Miss Scothorn of her position as bookkeeper was altogether voluntary. It was not an act done in fulfillment of any contract obligation assumed when she accepted the note.

The instrument in suit, being given without any valuable consideration, was nothing more than a promise to make a gift in the future of the sum of money therein named. Ordinarily, such promises are not enforceable, even when put in the form of a promissory note. Kirkpatrick v. Taylor, 43 Ill. 207; Phelps v. Phelps, 28 Barb. 121; Johnson v. Griest, 85 Ind. 503; Fink v. Cox, 18 Johns. 145. But it has often been held that an action on a note given to a church, college, or other like institution, upon the faith of which money has been expended or obligations incurred, could not be successfully defended on the ground of a want of consideration. Barnes v. Perine, 12 N. Y. 18; Philomath College v. Hartless, 6 Or. 158; Thompson v. Board, 40 Ill. 379; Irwin v. Lombard University, 56 Ohio St. 9, 46 N. E. 63. In this class of cases the note in suit is nearly always spoken of as a gift or donation, but the decision is generally put on the ground that the expenditure of money or assumption of liability by the donee on the faith of the promise constitutes a valuable and sufficient consideration. It seems to us that the true reason is the preclusion of the defendant, under the doctrine of estoppel, to deny the consideration. Such seems to be the view of the matter taken by the Supreme Court of Iowa in the case of Simpson Centenary College v. Tuttle, 71 Iowa, 596, 33 N. W. 74, where Rothrock, J., speaking for the court, said: "Where a note, however, is based on a promise to give for the support of the objects referred to, it may still be open to this defense [want of consideration], unless it shall appear that the donee has, prior to any revocation, entered into engagements, or made expenditures based on such promise, so that he must suffer loss or injury if the note is not paid. This is based on the equitable principle that, after allowing the donee to incur obligations on the faith that the note would be paid, the donor would be estopped from pleading want of consideration." And in the case of Reimensnyder v. Gans, 110 Pa. St. 17, 2 Atl. 425, which was an action on a note given as a donation to a charitable object, the court said: "The fact is that, as we may see from the case of Ryerss v. Trustees, 33 Pa. St. 114, a contract of the kind here involved is enforceable rather by way of estoppel than on the ground of consideration in the original undertaking."¹⁹⁰ It has been held that a note given in expectation of the payee performing certain services, but without any contract binding him to serve, will not support an action. Hulse v. Hulse, 84 E. C. L. 709. But when the payee changes his position to his disadvantage in reliance on the promise, a right of action does arise. McClure v. Wilson, 43 Ill. 356; Trustees v. Garvey, 53 Ill. 401.

Under the circumstances of this case, is there an equitable estoppel which ought to preclude the defendant from alleging that the note in controversy is lacking in one of the essential elements of a valid contract? We think there is. An estoppel in pais is defined to be "a right arising from acts, admissions, or conduct which have induced a change of position in accordance with the real or apparent intention of the party against whom they are alleged." Mr. Pomeroy has formulated the following definition: "Equitable estoppel is the effect of the voluntary conduct of a party whereby he is absolutely precluded, both at law and in equity, from asserting rights which might, perhaps, have otherwise existed, either of property, of contract, or of remedy, as against another person who in good faith relied upon such conduct, and has been led thereby to change his position for the worse, and who on his part acquires some corresponding right, either of property, of contract, or of remedy." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 804. According to the undisputed proof, as shown by the record before us, the plaintiff was a working girl, holding a position in which she earned a salary of $10 per week. Her grandfather, desiring to put her in a position of independence, gave her the note, accompanying it with the remark that his other grandchildren did not work, and that she would not be obliged to work any longer. In effect, he suggested that she might abandon her employment, and rely in the future upon the bounty which he promised. He doubtless desired that she should give up her occupation, but, whether he did or not, it is entirely certain that he contemplated such action on her part as a reasonable and probable consequence of his gift. Having intentionally influenced the plaintiff to alter her position for the worse on the faith of the note being paid when due, it would be grossly inequitable to permit the maker, or his executor, to resist payment on the ground that the promise was given without consideration. The petition charges the elements of an equitable estoppel, and the evidence conclusively establishes them. If errors intervened at the trial, they could not have been prejudicial. A verdict for the defendant would be unwarranted. The judgment is right, and is Affirmed.

But "Reliance upon a promise gives it no new validity when such reliance is not the conventional inducement of the promise; that is to say, when it is not contemplated by the terms of the bargain as the equivalent of the promise." Holmes, C. J., in French v. Boston National Bank, 179 Mass. 404, 408 (1901). See note to Morris v. Norton, ante, p. 319.

AUGUSTUS B. MARTIN and Others v. WILLIAM MELES and Others.

HOLMES, C. J. This is an action to recover the contribution promised by the following paper, which was signed by the defendants and others: "January 21, 1896, We, the undersigned, manufacturers of leather, promise to contribute the sum of five hundred (500) dollars each, and such additional sums as a committee appointed by the Massachusetts Morocco Manufacturers Association may require; in no case shall the committee demand from any manufacturer or firm a total of subscriptions to exceed the sum of two thousand (2,000) dollars, such sum to be employed for legal and other expenses under the direction of the committee, in defending and protecting our interests against any demands or suits growing out of Letters Patent for Chrome Tanning, and in case of suit against any of us the committee shall take charge thereof and apply as much of the fund as may be needed to the expense of the same."

The plaintiffs are the committee referred to in the agreement, and subscribers to it. They were appointed and did some work before the date of the agreement, and then prepared the agreement which was signed by nine members of the association mentioned, and by the defendants, who were not members. They went on with their work, undertook the defence of suits, and levied assessments which were paid, the defendants having paid $750. In November, 1896, the defendants' firm was dissolved, and two members of it, Meles and Auerbach, ceased tanning leather. The defendants notified the plaintiffs of the dissolution, and on June 23, 1897, upon demand for the rest of their subscription, refused to pay the same. The main questions insisted upon, raised by demurrer and by various exceptions, are whether the defendants' promise is to be regarded as entire and as supported by a sufficient consideration.

It will be observed that this is not a subscription to a charity. It is a business agreement for purposes in which the parties had a common interest and in which the defendants still had an interest after going out of business, as they still were liable to be sued. It contemplates the undertaking of active and more or less arduous duties by the committee, and the making of expenditures and incurring of liabilities on the faith of it. The committee by signing the agreement promised by implication not only to accept the subscribers' money but to perform those duties. It is a mistaken construction to say that their promise, or indeed their obligation, arose only as the promise of the subscribers was performed by payments of money.

If then the committee's promise should be regarded as the consideration, as in Ladies' Collegiate Institute v. French, 16 Gray, 196, 201 (see Maine Central Institute v. Haskell, 75 Maine, 140, 144), its sufficiency hardly would be open to the objection which has been urged against the doctrine of that case, that the promise of trustees to apply the funds received for a mere benevolence to the purposes of the trust imposes no new burden upon them. Johnson v. Otterbein University, 41 Ohio St. 527, 531. See Presbyterian Church of Albany v. Cooper, 112 N. Y. 517. Neither would it raise the question whether the promise to receive a gift was a consideration for a promise to make one. The most serious doubt is whether the promise of the committee purports to be the consideration for the subscriptions by a true interpretation of the contract.

In the later Massachusetts cases more weight has been laid on the incurring of other liabilities and making expenditures on the faith of the defendant's promise than on the counter-promise of the plaintiff. Cottage Street Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528; Sherwin v. Fletcher, 168 Mass. 413. Of course the mere fact that a promisee relies upon a promise made without other consideration does not impart validity to what before was void. Bragg v. Danielson, 141 Mass. 195, 196. There must be some ground for saying that the acts done in reliance upon the promise were contemplated by the form of the transaction either impliedly or in terms as the conventional inducement, motive, and equivalent for the promise. But courts have gone very great lengths in discovering the implication of such an equivalence, sometimes perhaps even having found it in matters which would seem to be no more than conditions or natural consequences of the promise. There is the strongest reason for interpreting a business agreement in the sense which will give it a legal support, and such agreements have been so interpreted. Sherwin v. Fletcher, ubi supra.¹²¹

¹²¹ In Sherwin v. Fletcher, 168 Mass. 413 (1897), an action of contract on

What we have said justifies, in our opinion, the finding of a consideration either in the promise or in the subsequent acts of the committee, and it may be questioned whether a nicer interpretation of the contract for the purpose of deciding which of the two was the true one is necessary. It is true that it is urged that the acts of the committee would have been done whether the defendants had promised or not, and therefore lose their competence as consideration because they cannot be said to have done in reliance upon the promise. But that is a speculation upon which courts do not enter. When an act has been done, to the knowledge of another party, which purports expressly to invite certain conduct on his part, and that conduct on his part follows, it is only under exceptional and peculiar circumstances that it will be inquired how far the act in truth was the motive for the conduct, whether in case of consideration (Williams v. Carwardine, 4 B. & Ad. 621; see Maine Central Institute v. Haskell, 75 Maine, 140, 145), or of fraud. Windram v. French, 151 Mass. 547, 553. In Cottage Street Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, the form of the finding in terms excluded subsequent acts as consideration, and therefore it did not appear whether the facts were such that reliance upon the promise would be presumed. In Bridgewater Academy v. Gilbert, 2 Pick. 579, the point was that merely signing a subscription paper without more did not invite expenditure on the faith of it. See Amherst Academy v. Cows, 6 Pick. 427, 438; Ives v. Sterling, 6 Met. 310, 316. In this case the paper indisputably invited the committee to proceed.

A more serious difficulty if the acts are the consideration is that it seems the following agreement, was brought by trustees selected under article 2 thereof, namely:

"We, the undersigned subscribers, do hereby agree to pay the sum set against our respective names, the same to be payable under and in accordance with the following conditions, namely:

"1. The money by us subscribed is to be used for the purpose of erecting a building in the town of Ayer, to be used for the manufacture of boots and shoes.

"2. The details regarding the plan under which the subscribers hereto shall organize themselves, and upon which said building shall be erected and rented, shall be hereafter fixed and determined by a majority in numbers and interest of the subscribers hereto, at a meeting to be duly called for that purpose.

"3. No subscription hereto shall be binding until the sum of twelve thousand ($12,000) dollars shall have been raised.

"Samuel W. Fletcher. $200."

Allen, J., for the court, said: "The written agreement signed by the defendant was virtually a promise to pay to such person or persons as should be fixed at a meeting of the subscribers. This promise was at the outset an offer, but when steps were taken in pursuance of Article 2, and a plan was fixed and determined as therein provided, and the plaintiffs were chosen trustees, they became the promisees; and when they proceeded to erect a building in reliance upon the subscriptions of the defendant and others, and before any withdrawal or retraction by him, that supplied a good consideration, and the promise became valid and binding in law."

to lead to the dilemma that either all acts to be done by the committee must be accomplished before the consideration is furnished, or else that the defendant's promise is to be taken distributively and divided up into distinct promises to pay successive sums as successive steps of the committee may make further payments necessary and may furnish consideration for requiring them. The last view is artificial and may be laid on one side. In the most noticeable cases where a man has been held entitled to stop before he has finished his payments, the ground has not been the divisibility of his undertaking but the absence of consideration, which required the court to leave things where it found them. In re Hudson, 54 L. J. Ch. 811; Presbyterian Church of Albany v. Cooper, 112 N. Y. 517. As against the former view, if necessary, we should assume that the first substantial act done by the committee was all that was required in the way of acts to found the defendants' obligation. See Amherst Academy v. Cows, 6 Pick. 427, 438. But if that were true, it would follow that as to the future conduct of the committee their promise, not their performance, was the consideration, and when we have got as far as that, it may be doubted whether it is not simpler and more reasonable to set the defendants' promise against the plaintiffs' promise alone. We are inclined to this view, but do not deem a more definitive decision necessary, as we are clearly of opinion that, one way or the other, the defendants must pay.

What has been said pretty nearly disposes of a subordinate point raised by the defendants. It is argued that, by notice pending performance that they would not go on with the contract, the defendants, even if they incurred a liability to damages, put an end to the right of the plaintiffs to go on and to recover further assessments, as in the case where an order for work is countermanded at the moment when performance is about to begin under the contract (Davis v. Bronson, 2 No. Dak. 300), or when at a later moment the plaintiff was directed to stop (Clark v. Marsiglia, 1 Den. 317), followed by many later cases in this country. See Collins v. Delaporte, 115 Mass. 159, 162. We assume that these decisions are right in cases where the continuance of work by the plaintiff would be merely a useless enhancement of damages. But we are of opinion that they do not apply. In the first place it does not appear that such a notice was given. The first definite notice and the first breach was a refusal to pay on demand. At that time the liability was fixed, and the damages were the sum demanded.

In the next place, if a definite notice had been given by the defendants in advance that they would not pay, whatever rights it might have given the plaintiffs at their election (Ballou v. Billings, 136 Mass. 307), it would not have been a breach of the contract (Daniels v. Newton, 114 Mass. 530), and it would not have ended the right of the plaintiffs to go on under the contract in a case like the present, where there was a common interest in the performance, and where what had been done and what remained to do probably were to a large extent interdependent. Davis v. Campbell, 93 Ia. 524; Gibbons v. Bente, 51 Minn. 499; Cravens v. Eagle Cotton Mills

Co., 120 Ind. 6. See Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111, 112; Johnstone v. Milling, 16 Q. B. D. 460, 470, 473; Dalrymple v. Scott, 19 Ont. App. 477; John A. Roebling's Sons' Co. v. Lock Stitch Fence Co., 130 Ill. 660, 666; Davis v. Bronson, 2 No. Dak. 300, 303.

Before leaving the case it is interesting to remark that the notion rightly exploded in Cottage Street Church v. Kendall, 121 Mass. 528, 530, 531, that the subscription of others than the plaintiff may be a consideration, seems to have remained unquestioned with regard to agreements of creditors to accept a composition. Compare the remarks of Wells, J., in Perkins v. Lockwood, 100 Mass. 249, 250 (Farrington v. Hodgdon, 119 Mass. 453, 457; Trecy v. Jeffs, 149 Mass. 211, 212; Emerson v. Gerber, 178 Mass. 130), with what he says in Athol Music Hall Co. v. Carey, 116 Mass. 471, 474.

It is not argued that whatever contract was made was not made with the plaintiffs. Sherwin v. Fletcher, 168 Mass. 413.

LORENA A. STEELE, Guardian and next friend of JAMES H. STEELE, infant, and others v. NICHOLAS W. STEELE.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1892. 75 Md. 477, 23 Atl. 959.)

This appeal is taken from an order of the Orphans' Court allowing and passing the claim of the appellee against his father's estate.

ROBINSON, J.¹²² * * * This is a claim based upon a verbal promise by the father that, if the appellee would purchase a certain woolen factory, then advertised for sale, he (the father) would contribute $5,000 towards the payment of the purchase money; and, relying upon this promise, the appellee bought the property. The right of the appellee to enforce the payment of such a claim as this depends—First, upon whether the promise was in fact made by the father; and, if so, was the property purchased by the son upon the faith of the promise? and, secondly, was the purchase of the property upon the faith of this promise, and the liability thereby incurred a sufficient consideration to make it a binding contract?

First. We fully agree that a promise of this kind ought to be established by the clearest and most satisfactory proof. At the same time, however, no one, it seems to us, can read the testimony in the record without being satisfied beyond question that the promise was made by the father, and that the property was purchased by the son on the faith of the promise.

* * * The father was a person of large means, and Nicholas was his only son. The property was a woolen mill, and he had implicit confidence in his son's ability to manage and conduct the business, and it was but natural that he should be willing and anxious to assist him in its purchase.

¹²² Parts of the opinion are omitted.

And this brings us to the question whether the purchase of the property upon the faith of the promise on the part of the father is a sufficient consideration to make it a valid contract. And in regard to this question there cannot be, it seems to us, any difficulty. Without going through the long list of cases in which the question as to the sufficiency of consideration has been considered, it is sufficient to say it is well settled that if one incurs a legal liability, as by entering into a contract with a third person, the liability thereby incurred is a sufficient consideration to support a promise by the person at whose request it was incurred. Thus, for instance, where a person contracts in his own name to purchase property upon the promise by another to provide the money to pay for it, the consideration is sufficient to support the contract. Leake, Cont. 628; 1 Chitty, Cont. p. 64. The case comes, we think, directly within the principle laid down in Skidmore v. Bradford, L. R. 8 Eq. 134, in which the vice-chancellor said: "If Edward Bradford were a mere volunteer, there is no principle on which he would be entitled to come to this court to have the testator's bounty completed, and the balance of the purchase money paid out of the assets. But if, on the failure of the testator's representations, he has involved himself in any liability, or has incurred any obligation, he cannot be regarded as a volunteer, and, if so, the testator's assets are liable to make good the representation on the faith of which the nephew has entered into this contract. * * * The case therefore is one in which the purchaser became liable to be sued, and incurred that liability on the faith of the representations of the testator that he would give him the warehouse which was the subject-matter of the contract, and would provide the purchase money." The purchase of the property in this case by the appellee upon the faith of the promise made by his father to give him $5,000 to assist him in the payment of the purchase money is therefore a sufficient consideration to support the contract, and the order must be ¹²² "If A promises to buy a house for his nephew, that is nothing; but if A promises to buy a house for his nephew and request the nephew to enter into a contract of purchase in the nephew's name and the nephew does so, the law implies a promise on the part of A to reimburse the nephew any part of the purchase-money which he may be called upon to pay. Skidmore v. Bradford, L. R. 8 Eq. 134." Evans, P. J., in Y. M. C. A. v. Estill, 140 Ga. 291, 296 (1913).

On the other hand, "If A says, 'I will give you, B, £1000' and B, in reliance on that promise, spends £1000 in buying a house, B cannot recover the £1000 from A." Pearson, J., in Re Hudson, 64 L. J., Ch. 811 (1885).

KIRKSEY v. KIRKSEY.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1845. 8 Ala. 131.)

Assumpsit by the defendant, against the plaintiff in error.

The plaintiff was the wife of defendant's brother, but had for some time been a widow, and had several children. In 1840, the plaintiff resided on public land, under a contract of lease, she had held over, and was comfortably settled, and would have attempted to secure the land she lived on. The defendant resided in Talladega County, some sixty or seventy miles off. On the 10th October, 1840, he wrote to her the following letter:

"Dear Sister Antillico,—Much to my mortification, I heard that brother Henry was dead, and one of his children. I know that your situation is one of grief and difficulty. You had a bad chance before, but a great deal worse now. I should like to come and see you, but cannot with convenience at present. * * * I do not know whether you have a preference on the place you live on or not. If you had, I would advise you to obtain your preference, and sell the land and quit the country, as I understand it is very unhealthy, and I know society is very bad. If you will come down and see me, I will let you have a place to raise your family, and I have more open land than I can tend; and on account of your situation, and that of your family, I feel like I want you and the children to do well."

Within a month or two after the receipt of this letter, the plaintiff abandoned her possession, without disposing of it, and removed with her family, to the residence of the defendant, who put her in comfortable houses, and gave her land to cultivate for two years, at the end of which time he notified her to remove, and put her in a house, not comfortable, in the woods, which he afterwards required her to leave.

A verdict being found for the plaintiff, for $200, the above facts were agreed, and if they will sustain the action, the judgment is to be affirmed, otherwise it is to be reversed.

ORMOND, J. The inclination of my mind is that the loss and inconvenience which the plaintiff sustained in breaking up and moving to the defendant's, a distance of sixty miles, is a sufficient consideration to support the promise to furnish her with a house, and land to cultivate, until she could raise her family. My brothers, however, think that the promise on the part of the defendant was a mere gratuity, and that an action will not lie for its breach. The judgment of the court below must therefore be reversed, pursuant to the agreement of the parties.¹²⁴

¹²⁴ "It is often a matter of great difficulty to discern the line which separates promises creating legal obligations from mere gratuitous agreements. Each case depends so much on its own peculiar facts and circumstances that it affords but little aid in determining other cases of differing facts. The promise or agreement, the relation of the parties, the circumstances surrounding them, and their intent, as it may be deduced from these, must determine the inquiry. If the purpose is to confer on the promisee a benefit from affection and gen-

JOHN SEMMES DEVECMON v. ALEXANDER SHAW and CHRISTIAN DEVRIES, Executors of John S. Combs.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1888. 69 Md. 199, 14 Atl. 464, 9 Am. St. Rep. 422.)

BRYAN, J. John Semmes Devecmon brought suit against the executors of John S. Combs, deceased. He declared in the common counts, and also filed a bill of particulars. After judgment by default, a jury was sworn to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff. The evidence consisted of certain accounts taken from the books of the deceased, and testimony that the plaintiff was a nephew of the deceased, and lived for several years in his family, and was in his service as clerk for several years. The plaintiff then made an offer of testimony, which is thus stated in the bill of exceptions: "that the plaintiff took a trip to Europe in 1878, and that said trip was taken by said plaintiff, and the money spent on said trip was spent by the said plaintiff at the instance and request of said Combs, and upon a promise from him that he would reimburse and repay to the plaintiff all money expended by him in said trip; and that the trip was so taken and the money so expended by the said plaintiff, but that the said trip had no connection with the business of said Combs; and that said Combs spoke to the witness of his conduct in being thus willing to pay his nephew's expenses as liberal and generous on his part." On objection, the court refused to permit the evidence to be given, and the plaintiff excepted.

It might very well be, and probably was the case, that the plaintiff would not have taken a trip to Europe at his own expense. But whether this be so or not, the testimony would have tended to show that the plaintiff incurred expense at the instance and request of the deceased, and upon an express promise by him that he would repay the money spent. It was a burden incurred at the request of the other party, and was certainly a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay. Great injury might be done by inducing persons to make expenditures beyond their means, on express promises of repayment, if the law were otherwise. It is an entirely different case from a promise to make another a present; or render him a gratuitous service. It is nothing to the purpose that the plaintiff was benefited by the expenditure of his own money. He was induced by this promise to spend it in this way, instead of some other mode. If it is not fulfilled, the expenditure will have been procured by a false pretence.

As the plaintiff, on the theory of this evidence, had fulfilled his part of the contract, and nothing remained to be done but the payment of the money by the defendant, there could be a recovery in indebitatus assumpsit; and it was not necessary to declare on the special contract. The fifth count in the declaration is for "money paid by the plaintiff for the defendants' erosity, the agreement is gratuitous. If the purpose is to obtain a quid pro quo—if there is something to be received, in exchange for which the promise is given, the promise is not gratuitous, but of legal obligation." Brickell, C. J., in Bibb v. Freeman, 59 Ala. 612, 616-617 (1877).

testator in his lifetime, at his request." In the bill of particulars, we find this item: "To cash contributed by me, J. Semmes Devecmon, out of my own money, to defray my expenses to Europe and return, the said John S. Combs, now deceased, having promised me in 1878 'that if I would contribute part of my own money towards the trip, he would give me a part of his, and would make up to me my part,' and the amount below named is my contribution, as follows," etc. It seems to us that this statement is a sufficient description of a cause of action covered by the general terms of the fifth count. The evidence ought to have been admitted.

The defendants offered the following prayer, which the court granted:

"The defendants, by their attorneys, pray the court to instruct the jury that there is no sufficient evidence in this case to entitle the plaintiff to recover the interest claimed in the bill of particulars, marked, 'Exhibit No. 1 Bill of Particulars.'"

The only evidence bearing on this question is the account taken from the books of the deceased, which was offered in evidence by the plaintiff. This account showed on its face a final settlement of all matters embraced in it. In the absence of proof showing errors of some kind, the parties must be concluded by it in all respects. We think the prayer was properly granted.

*Judgment [for defendant] reversed, and new trial ordered.*¹²⁵

(Court of Exchequer, 1853. 23 L. J., Ex., (N. S.) 36.)

Action upon a promissory note made payable to J. Bluett, the testator. Plea that the said J. Bluett, the testator, was the father of the defendant, and that in the lifetime of the said J. Bluett, the defendant complained to his said father that he, the defendant, had not received at his hands so much money or so many advantages as the other children of the said J. Bluett, and certain controversies arose between the defendant and his said father, concerning the premises, and the said J. Bluett afterward admitted

Y. 538 (1891). Or will attend a university as a student. Hosbor v. Kuntz, 19 Wash. 258 (1898). Even though the young man is benefitted by what he does, he suffers a legal detriment. The only problem is whether a contract should be found or a promise of gift upon condition.

In Earle v. Angell, 157 Mass. 294 (1892) a promise by an aunt to a nephew was in substance: "If you will agree to attend my funeral in Massachusetts, coming from your home near Philadelphia, I will pay all expenses and give you $500." The nephew was found to have promised and the arrangement was sustained as a contract.

and declared to the defendant that his, the defendant's, said complaints were well founded, and, therefore, afterward, etc., it was agreed by and between the said J. Bluett and the defendant that the defendant should forever cease to make such complaints, and that in consideration thereof, and in order to do justice to the defendant, and also out of his, the said J. Bluett's, natural love and affection toward the defendant, he, the said J. Bluett, would discharge the defendant of and from all liability in respect of the causes of action to which this plea is pleaded, and would accept the said agreement on his, the defendant's, part in full satisfaction and discharge of the said last-mentioned causes of action; and the defendant further saith, that afterward, and in the lifetime of the said J. Bluett, and before this suit, he, the said J. Bluett, did accept of and from the defendant the said agreement as aforesaid, in full satisfaction and discharge of such mentioned causes of action.

Demurrer and joinder.

[During the argument Parke, B., asked: Is an agreement by a father, in consideration that his son will not bore him, a binding contract?]

POLLOCK, C. B.† The plea is clearly bad. By the argument a principle is pressed to an absurdity, as a bubble is blown until it bursts. Looking at the words merely, there is some foundation for the argument, and, following the words only, the conclusion may be arrived at. It is said the son had a right to an equal distribution of his father's property, and did complain to his father because he had not an equal share, and said to him, "I will cease to complain if you will not sue upon this note." Whereupon the father said, "If you will promise me not to complain I will give up the note." If such a plea as this could be supported, the following would be a binding promise: A man might complain that another person used the public highway more than he ought to do, and that the other might say, "Do not complain, and I will give you £5." It is ridiculous to suppose that such promises could be binding.¹⁸⁶ So, if the holder of a bill of exchange were

† The statement of facts is abbreviated and the opinions of Parke B and Alderson B are omitted.

¹⁸⁶ In Dunton v. Dunton, 18 Vict. L. R. 114 (1892) the court divided in opinion as to whether a promise by a divorced wife that she would conduct herself with sobriety and in a respectable, orderly and virtuous manner was consideration for the husband's promise to make certain payments. The dissenting judge said the promise seemed to him "about as vague a promise as can well be imagined," but the majority judges held that the agreement was binding and Williams, J., explained White v. Bluett, supra, as a case which went "upon the express ground that the son had no right to complain of the father's distribution of the property" and therefore "the son's abstaining from doing what he had no right to do could be no consideration." Of the plaintiff in Dunton v. Dunton, Higginbotham, C. J., said: "In the present case the plaintiff was released by the decree for the dissolution of marriage from her conjugal obligation to the defendant to conduct herself with sobriety, and in a respectable, orderly, and virtuous manner; and conduct of an opposite character would not necessarily involve a breach on her part of any human law other than the law suing the acceptor, and the acceptor were to complain that the holder had treated him hardly, or that the bill ought never to have been circulated, and the holder were to say, "Now if you will not make any more complaints I will not sue you." Such a promise would be like that now set up. In of marriage, which had ceased to bind her. She was legally at liberty, so far as the defendant was concerned, to conduct herself in these respects as she might think fit, and her promise to surrender her liberty and to conduct herself in the manner desired by the defendant constituted, in my opinion, a good consideration for his promise to pay her the stipulated amount." And Williams, J., said: "She [the plaintiff] was under no legal obligation to the defendant, or to any one, not to get drunk in her own or any friend's house. She was under no legal obligation to the defendant, or to any one, not to consort with persons, male or female, of bad moral character. She was under no legal obligation to the defendant, or to any one, not to allow a paramour to have sexual connection with her. She was entitled in these and other respects to pursue her own course of conduct."

The contract in Dunton v. Dunton, where the parties were divorced, is not open to objections sometimes urged against contracts between husband and wife who are to continue to live together whereby payments to the wife are conditioned on her good conduct.

In Miller v. Miller, 78 Iowa 177 (1889), for instance, the action was by a wife against her husband to recover on a contract between them, whereby it was agreed to drop all matters of dispute, to refrain from scolding, fault finding, and anger, and live together as husband and wife; that the wife should keep her home in comfortable condition; and that the husband should provide all the necessary expenses of the family, and pay the wife in addition a certain sum per month. The court sustained a judgment for the defendant. Granger, J., said: .

"It is said in argument that in this case the husband had been guilty of such conduct as to justify the wife in leaving him, and would have been entitled to a separate support, and it was because of this contract that she consented to live with defendant, and that the amount was settled upon the wife in pursuance of the agreement. Stripped of the conditions upon which payment is to be made, such a contract might not be questioned. The enforcement of this contract as to payments involves an inquiry into just the facts which we have been urging as against public policy. The payments are to be made 'so long as Mrs. Miller shall faithfully observe the terms and conditions of their contract.' If, then, she seeks to compel payment, she must do so by averring her compliance in general terms, and the husband may answer, putting in issue the facts, and then follows the inquiry if at some time she did not scold or find fault. Was she not at some time angry? Has she kept the family in a comfortable condition? * * * It needs no argument to show that such inquiries in public would strike at the very foundations of domestic life and happiness. Public policy dictates that the door of such inquiries shall be closed; that parties shall not contract in such a manner as to make such inquiries essential to their enforcement. What element could be introduced into a family that would tend more directly to breed discord than this contract? A failure to pay from any cause not her fault renders the husband liable to judgment, and this from month to month, or from year to year. No misfortune frees him from this obligation save that of the loss or misconduct of his wife. In the very nature of things, a demand for such a payment would engender ill feelings and provoke complaints as to conduct that would otherwise pass reality, there was no consideration whatever. The son had no right to complain, for the father might make what distribution of his property he liked; and the son's abstaining from doing what he had no right to do can be no consideration.

JAMIESON v. RENWICK.

(Supreme Court of Victoria, 1891. 17 Vict. L. Rep. 124.)

HIGINBOTHAM, C. J.* This is an appeal from * * * [a judgment on] a verdict for the plaintiff for £25. The action was brought on a document purporting to be an agreement. * * *

The next ground of objection is that this promise is a voluntary one, a promise to make a gift; that, in fact, no consideration for making the promise is shown by the instrument, and that therefore the agreement is not one on which an action can be brought. The agreement is an extremely peculiar one, and not easy of comprehension. It opens with a recital that "John Renwick, of his own free will, as and by way of gift, and subject to the proviso and agreement hereinafter contained, doth agree to pay to the said John Jamieson the annual sum of £25." That promise is subject to this proviso: "Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, that if the said John Jamieson shall reside, attempt, claim, or threaten to reside in Sandhurst aforesaid, or shall visit, annoy, or interfere in any way with the said John Renwick, either personally, or by letter or messenger, or shall claim, or attempt to claim, any interest or right to the land of the said John Renwick, or to occupy the same, or shall, in the opinion of the said John Renwick, not conduct himself in a proper and becoming manner as a member of society, then the said John Renwick shall be entitled to put an end absolutely to this agreement, and shall be at liberty to refuse any further payment to the said John Jamieson." This proviso constitutes a condition for the payment of money by the defendant; the fulfilment of the conditions of the proviso constitutes the promises made on his part by the plaintiff.

Some of these promises constitute a good consideration for the promise of unnoticed, or at least without attention. An effort at compulsory payment would almost certainly bring before the courts allegations of misconduct, based upon incidents of little moment, to be magnified or belittled in the interest of success in court."

¹²⁷ "In the absence of a command from the father, the son would be privileged to make complaints. A forbearance to exercise this privilege seems to be perfectly definite and to be worth the money." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, p. 129 n. Compare Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29 (1885); Crawley v. Blackman, 81 Ga. 775 (1888). But see Howlett v. Howlett, 115 Mich. 75 (1897). On vagueness and uncertainty of promise, see Dunshee v. Dunshee, 255 Ill. 296 (1912).

* The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

the defendant. The first condition or promise, that Jamieson shall not reside, nor attempt, claim, or threaten to reside in Sandhurst, relates to an act or acts which the plaintiff is at liberty to do or not to do, and the performance of which would not amount to any wrong done to the defendant.¹²⁰ The second condition, that the plaintiff shall not personally, or by letter or messenger, claim or attempt to claim any interest in defendants' land, relates to an act which the plaintiff is at perfect liberty to do without committing any wrong. The plaintiff can advance any legal claim which he is advised is a good one. The promise not to visit the defendant is a valid promise. To annoy or interfere with the defendant is an unlawful act, and therefore the promise to forbear from so doing is not one which constitutes a good consideration. The principles guiding the court in cases like this appear in Bracewell v. Williams, L. R. 2 C. P. 196. There it was held that a promise not to apply for costs under the Bankruptcy Act was a sufficient consideration to support a contract to pay the amount of such costs; but that a promise to conduct proceedings in bankruptcy so as to injure as little as possible the debtor's credit, was not a good consideration to support a contract. Erle, C. J., says, at page 198: "The second count is, I think, also bad; it really amounts to this; in consideration that I do not abuse the process of the court for a purpose other than that for which it was intended—viz., the recovery of my debt, by using it as a means of exposure of you, you will perform your promise. The consideration, therefore, is really the abstaining from an abuse of the process of the court." A promise that a person will not do what he lawfully may is a good consideration. But a promise not to do what is unlawful does not constitute a good consideration. In the present case we think that there are sufficient promises constituting a good consideration to support the promise made by the defendant. A promise not to annoy is nugatory. The second objection therefore fails in our opinion.

In dealing with the third objection, that the judgment was against evidence, * * * we think that all the evidence shows that there is no reason for coming to the finding that the defendant has not honestly and fairly exercised the power given to him by the agreement, [to put an end to it, "Provided that the said John Jamieson shall, in the opinion of the said John Renwick, not conduct himself in a proper and becoming manner as a member of society,"] and he has been therefore justified in putting an end to the agreement and refusing to pay money under it to the plaintiff. A review of the whole of the evidence strengthens the judgment formed by the defendant that the plaintiff did not conduct himself in a proper manner as a member of society in accordance with the terms of the agreement. We think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge was against the evidence, and on this ground a new trial will be allowed, unless the plaintiff within one week elect to accept a nonsuit with costs. If he do not so elect, then new trial on the usual terms, and appeal allowed with costs.¹²⁹

HOGAN v. STOPHLET.

Action to recover a reward offered for the apprehension and conviction of a criminal. A judgment in the Circuit Court for plaintiff was reversed by the Appellate Court. Plaintiff appealed.

MAGRUDER, J.¹³⁰ * * * The appellant was the sheriff of Pulaski county. The arrest of Howard [the criminal] was made in Pulaski county, and for a felony committed by Howard in that county, Howard also being a resident of that county. It was therefore appellant's duty to make the arrest. * * * It being true that it was the official duty of the appellant, as sheriff, to make the arrest of the guilty party, and that the fees, which he is entitled to charge for the performance of his official duties, are fixed by law, it follows, upon well established principles, that the appellant was not entitled to the reward sued for in this case. It is against public policy to allow a man to recover a reward for doing his duty as a public officer. It is also against public policy and illegal for a sheriff to receive for services, for which fixed compensation is prescribed by law, any other or further fees, although extraordinary diligence may have been exercised by him in the discharge of his duty. (Pool v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 219; Murfree on Sheriffs, § 1070.) A promise to pay an officer a reward for doing what it is his duty to do under the law is a promise without any consideration to support it.

In Matter of Russell's Application, 51 Conn. 577, the facts showed, that an inhabitant of the city of Hartford, whose house was broken into in the night, offered a reward for the detection of the burglar; that certain policemen, during the hours allotted them for rest, discovered the burglar, and obtained information which led to his conviction; that policemen in that city were required by law to report all violations of law, and to arrest without warrant persons guilty of criminal offenses where the offenders were taken in the act, or on the speedy information of others; to render all possible assistance to the ministers of the law, and to exert themselves to prevent the commission of crime, etc.; and it was held by the court that to allow them to receive the reward would be both in violation of the city ordinances, and against public policy. In that case the court said: "It has been held from a very early period, that a promise to pay an officer a sum of money for doing a thing, which the law will not suffer him to take anything for, is merely void, however freely and voluntarily it may appear to have been made. * * * And it is now well settled that a public officer, whose compensation is fixed or whose fees are prescribed by law, cannot legally contract for or demand a larger compensation or higher fees in the form of a reward or in any other form, for services rendered in the line or scope of his official duties."

¹²⁹ "The general principle is, that if part of a consideration be merely void, the contract may be supported by the residue of the consideration, if good per se (Bradburne v. Bradburne, Cro. Eliz. 149; Tisdale's Case, ibid., 758; Crisp v. Gamel, Cro. Jac. 128), but if any part of a consideration be illegal, it vitiates the whole. Featherstone v. Hutchinson, Cro. Eliz. 199; Bridge v. Cage, Cro. Jac. 103; Scott v. Gilmore, 3 Taunt. 226; Woodruff v. Hinman, 11 Vt. 592; 2 Saund. R. (Patteson & Wms. Edit.), 136, note 2. A promise by a party to do what he is bound in law to do is not an illegal consideration, but is the same as no consideration at all, and is merely void, in other words, it is insufficient, but not illegal." Kellogg, J., in Cobb v. Cowdery, 40 Vt. 25, 28 (1867). But if an offer of a unilateral contract calls for several acts, some void, but not illegal, and some valid, there is, on principle, no acceptance unless all are furnished.

¹³⁰ The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

In Pool v. City of Boston, supra, it was held, that a watchman of the city of Boston, who, while in the discharge of his duty as such, discovered a person setting fire to a building and prosecuted him to conviction, was not entitled to claim a reward offered by the city government for the detection and conviction of the incendiary.

In Davis v. Burns, 5 Allen (Mass.) 349, it was held, that an officer of the customs of the United States, who found smuggled goods, while assisting the inspectors in charge of a vessel and examining the passengers and their luggage, although he was not in discharge of the specific duty assigned to him, could not maintain an action to recover a reward, offered by the owners of the vessel to any person giving information to their agents or officers of any goods smuggled or concealed or intended to be smuggled therefrom. In the latter case the decision of the court was put upon the broad ground of public policy which forbids an officer to receive extra compensation for doing what his official duty requires him to do. * * *

In Lees v. Colgan, 120 Cal. 262, where a captain of police of the city and county of San Francisco apprehended a murderer in such city and county for a murder committed in another county, it was held that the captain made the arrest of the murderer in the line of his official duty and that it was against sound public policy to receive a reward offered by the government of the state for the arrest and conviction of the murderer; and in that case the court say: "The courts, both in this country and in England, are practically unanimous in declaring that a public officer working for a fixed compensation, or whose fees are prescribed by law, cannot demand or contract for a reward for services rendered in the line or scope of his official duty." (See also Marking v. Needy & Hatch, 8 Bush. (Ky.) 22; Ex parte Gore, 57 Miss. 251; Monroe County v. Bell, 18 So. 121; Thornton v. Railway Co., 42 Mo. App. 58; Kick v. Merry, 23 Mo. 74; Weaver v. Whitney, 1 Hopk. 13; Hatch v. Mann, 15 Wend. [N. Y.] 45.)

such cases for the charge of extra compensation. In Hatch v. Mann, supra, it was said: "That a public officer, whose fees are prescribed by law, may maintain an action to recover an additional sum promised him by a party for doing his official duty, is a monstrous proposition, fraught with every kind of mischief. The pretense, that it is for extra services, would cover any conceivable corruption or extortion. * * * If a constable for making extraordinary efforts to perform an ordinary official act, may not only receive, but may also collect by law a compensation beyond what the statute allows for the act, any other officer may do the same; and sheriffs, legislators and judges might, and soon would, put their 'extraordinary efforts' in the market, to be had by the highest bidder. This is a sickening and revolting view of the subject."

There are some decisions which hold to the contrary of the views herein expressed, but these decisions will be found upon examination to be cases where the officer arrested the offender beyond his territorial jurisdiction, or cases arising under particular statutes, which did not make it the duty of the officer to make the arrest. Many of these decisions are reviewed in the very able opinion delivered by the Supreme Court of Connecticut In the Matter of Russell's Application, supra, and are there distinguished from such cases as that which is presented by the present record.

The principles, announced by the authorities above referred to, have always been recognized as sound by this court. * * *

Judgment [of Appellate Court]

¹⁸¹ But doing or agreeing to do more than one's official duty will serve as consideration. "I think there may be services which the constable is not bound to render, and which he may therefore make the ground of a contract," said Denman, C. J., in England v. Davidson, 11 A. & E. 856, 8 (1840). For instance, in Hartley v. Inhabitants of Granville, 216 Mass. 38 (1913) detective duties were held not to be within the scope of a constable's official obligation and he was allowed to recover a reward for ferreting out offenders. But compare Somerset Bank v. Edmond, 76 Oh. St. 396 (1907). And in Reif v. Page, 55 Wis. 496 (1882) a fireman was allowed to recover a reward offered by a husband to any one who would rescue his wife from a burning building, dead or alive, because at great peril to his life and health he accomplished the rescue of her dead body and because the court found that as a fireman of the city he was not legally bound to risk his life in that rescue.

"It has been repeatedly held that public policy does not permit an officer to claim a reward for merely doing his duty. Elkins v. Wyandotte Co., 91 Kan. 518, 520, 138 Pac. 578, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 638, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 257. The question as applied to a claim for reward is discussed in the opinion in Smith v. Fenner, 102 Kan. 830, 172 Pac. 514, L. R. A. 1918E, 348; and see Marsh v. Express Co., 88 Kan. 538, 129 Pac. 168, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 133, and authorities cited there. In the recent case of Thacker v. Smith, 103 Kan. 641, 175 Pac. 983, it was held that a deputy sheriff could not lawfully receive any part of such a reward, and also that others who had acted with him under a division agreement were not entitled to recover because the agreement itself was void and inseparable. In some of the cited cases what are called 'nonpay officers' were

KEITH & HASTINGS, Admrs., &c. v. ALFRED MILES.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi, 1860. 39 Miss. 442, 77 Am. Dec. 685.)

HARRIS, J. The defendant in error, when about ten or twelve years old, left the house of his guardian, Alexander Miles, plaintiffs' intestate, and went to the house of his uncle by marriage, "and there in the neighborhood remained until his guardian persuaded him to go and live with him, making him the following promises; that he, the guardian, would not charge him, the said defendant, any board; that he would send him to school and make no charge for the same." The defendant went to live with plaintiffs' intestate, his said guardian, and remained there about twelve months.

On final settlement of the guardianship account, plaintiffs in error claimed allowance of sixty dollars for the board of defendant, and also amounts paid for tuition.

Exceptions were filed to these items in the court below, and sustained by the court. This writ of error is now prosecuted here to revise that judgment.

It appears in this record that the defendant paid no board at his uncle's house during his stay there; and upon this ground, we suppose, it was thought, in the court below, a sufficient consideration arose to sustain the promise of the guardian to board and school the defendant without charge.

Between adults, or where no duty of obedience existed, a promise made under these circumstances would doubtless be obligatory, upon the ground that injury and loss would otherwise be occasioned to defendant by his abandonment of his uncle's house, where he paid no board. But a different permitted to recover because it was not their duty to cause the arrest." Porter, J., in Taft v. Hyatt, (Kans.) 180 Pac. 213, 215 (1919).

In Hayden v. Songer, 56 Ind. 42, 49 (1877) the court intimates that if to earn a reward by making an arrest a man unnecessarily gets himself appointed special constable the fact that he is such constable will not prevent his recovery of the reward if he complies with the terms of the offer. The court did not have to decide the matter, however, as under the facts of the case a special constable as such had no authority, and was under no duty, to make the arrest.

On right of public officer to reward, see 10 Ann. Cas. 729, note.

In Ryder v. Stockwell, 14 Cal. 134 (1869), in defense of an action to recover a reward for information that would lead to the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who set fire to defendant's house, the defendant insisted that plaintiff could not recover because he was bound as a good citizen to render the services without reward, but Baldwin, J., for the court said (pp. 135-136): "But this position is not tenable. * * * It can hardly be said that every citizen is bound, however meritorious the task may be, to quit his own business, and devote his time to the discovery of crime and bring criminals to justice. Nor, that if a man who has lost his property agrees to give another a sum of money to go with him to discover or arrest the thief and recover the goods, he is not bound to pay that other if the latter performs the service."

More troublesome questions arise in regard to the duties of a finder to return lost goods and whether the finder may earn a reward offered.

rule is held in cases where it is the legal duty of the promisee to do, without reward, the act induced by the promise sought to be enforced.

No action will lie to enforce a promise for doing that which it was the party's legal duty to do, without such promise or reward, "for this would be extortion and illegal." 2 Tucker's Lect. 137; 2 Burr. R. 924; 2 Black. R. 204; Chitty on Con. 54.

The ward in this case, being under the legal control of his guardian, had no right to rebel against his authority, leave his house, or refuse obedience to his lawful directions. It was his legal duty, as well as his highest interest, to submit himself cheerfully to the directions of his guardian; and he cannot be permitted to exact a reward for the performance of a duty so obviously incumbent on him. The law will not presume that injury or loss could arise to him in the discharge of that duty, and hence no consideration for the promise to board and school him could arise to support it, against his guardian.

The promise relied on to avoid the items of board and tuition claimed in the account of plaintiff's intestate being without consideration is void. The court therefore erred in rejecting these items on that ground.

Let the judgment and decree of the court below be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.¹²²

LATTIMORE v. HARSEN.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1817. 14 Johns. 330.)

This was a motion to set aside the report of referees. It appeared from the affidavits which were read that the plaintiffs entered into an agreement under seal dated November 14th, 1815, with Jacob Harsen and the defendant, Cornelius Harsen, by which the former, in consideration of the sum of $900, agreed to open a cartway in Seventieth Street, in the city of New York, the dimensions and manner of which were stated in the agreement, and bound themselves under the penalty of $250 to a performance on their part. Some time after the plaintiffs entered upon the performance they became dissatisfied with their agreement, and determined to leave off the work, when the defendant, by parol, released them from their covenant, and promised them that if they would go on and complete the work and find materials he would pay them for their labor by the day. The plaintiffs had received more than the sum stipulated to be paid to them by the original agreement. The action was brought for the work and labor and materials found by the plaintiffs under the subsequent arrangement, and the referees reported the sum of $400.05 in favor of the plaintiffs. The case was submitted to the court without argument.

PER CURIAM. The only question that can arise in the case is whether there was evidence of a contract between the plaintiff and the present defendant to perform the services for which this suit is brought. From the evidence it appears that a written contract had been entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant, together with his father, Jacob Harsen, for the performance of the same work, and that after some part of it was done the plaintiffs became dissatisfied with their contract, and determined to abandon it. The defendant then agreed if they would go on and complete the work he would pay them by the day for such service and the materials found without reference to the written contract.

This is the allegation on the part of the plaintiffs, and which the evidence will very fairly support. If the contract is made out there can be no reason why it should not be considered binding on the defendant. By the former contract the plaintiffs subjected themselves to a certain penalty for the non-fulfilment, and if they chose to incur this penalty they had a right to do so, and notice of such intention was given to the defendant, upon which he entered into the new arrangement.¹²³ Here was a sufficient con-

¹²³ The distinction between an alternative contract and liquidated damages must not be overlooked. In Stewart v. Bedell, 79 Pa. St. 336, 339 (1875), "Per Curiam", it was said: "The defendant's covenant not to engage in business within prescribed limits, and the covenant, if he should do so, that he would pay $10,000 liquidated damages, are not alternative; the latter being merely the agreed consequence of a breach of the former. If covenants be alternative and either be performed there is no breach. An election is given to the covenantor to perform either. But here a breach of the former covenant is necessary to give effect to the latter. Hence there is no election in such case, except that which arises from a determination to suffer the consequences of a breach." Although in form a penalty the provision in Lattimore v. Harsen was doubtless one for liquidated damages. The contract was not one giving the plaintiffs the legal choice between performing the work and paying the liquidated damages sum in any other sense than exists in the case of any contract, which the courts will not enforce specifically. The issue is still sharply drawn between those who agree with Lord Coke and Justice Holmes that one has a legal "right," i. e., legal privilege, to break his contract and pay damages, if the contract will not be enforced specifically, and those who insist that he has no such legal "right," i. e., legal privilege. Physical ability and legal privilege are not synonymous, as any hold-up man may demonstrate. For a vigorous attack on the position of Lord Coke and Justice Holmes, see note by Professor Willard T. Barbour in 16 Mich. L. Rev. 106.

For a somewhat humorous phase of the contention in Lattimore v. Harsen, see Gewirtz v. Gewirtz, 178 N. Y. Supp. 738 (1919), where the court held that after a separation decree providing for alimony to the wife had been rendered, a so-called agreement of separation between the husband and wife entered into after the husband's default in paying the alimony provided in the decree was without consideration as well as void as against public policy. The consideration point arose because the husband, in the words of Page, J., who wrote the opinion, "threatened to suffer confinement rather than pay [the decreed alisideration for this promise; all payments made on the former contract have been allowed, and perfect justice appears to have been done by the referees, and no rules or principles of law have been infringed. The motion to set aside the report, therefore, ought to be denied.

*Motion denied.*¹³⁴

mony]; in fact he expressed a keen desire to go to jail rather than pay." Under the agreement the husband was to pay and did pay only a sum already due under the alimony decree which the wife agreed to accept in full for her support, maintenance and alimony for the past and in the future, and to show consideration relied on his privilege to go to jail. The motion being one to punish the husband for contempt in failing to pay instalments of alimony falling due under the decree after the contract, Page, J., said of the husband: "He complains that he waived his desire to go to jail for contempt of court. He being again in contempt, the opportunity of fulfilling that desire will be restored to him by the granting of this motion" (p. 740).

¹³⁴ "It would doubtless be competent for parties to cancel an existing contract and make a new one to complete the same work at a different rate of compensation, but it seems that it would be essential to its validity that there should be a valid cancellation of the original contract. Such was the case of Lattimore v. Harsen (14 Johns. 330)." Ruger, C. J., in Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392, 402 (1883).

"The parol promise, it is contended, was without consideration. This depends entirely upon the question whether the first contract was waived. The plaintiff having refused to perform that contract, as he might do, subjecting himself to such damages as the other parties might show they were entitled to recover, he afterwards went on upon the faith of the new promise and finished the work. This was a sufficient consideration. If Payne and Perkins [the defendants] were willing to accept his relinquishment of the old contract and proceed on a new agreement, the law, we think, would not prevent it." Per Curiam in Monroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 298, 305 (1839). Cf. Rollins v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 116 (1880).

"But calling an agreement an agreement for rescission does not do away with the necessity of consideration, and when the agreement for rescission is coupled with a further agreement that the work provided for in the earlier agreement shall be completed and that the other party shall give more than he originally promised, the total effect of the second agreement is that one party promises to do exactly what he had previously bound himself to do, and the other party promises to give an additional compensation therefor. If, [however], for a single moment the parties were free from the earlier contract so that each of them could refuse to enter into any bargain whatever relating to the same subject-matter, a subsequent agreement on any terms would be good." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 130a, p. 279.

LAMAR, J.* Davis & Co. employed Morgan for one year at $40 per month. After the contract had been in force for some time, Morgan received an offer of $65 per month from a company in Florida, and mentioned the fact to Davis, saying that of course he would not go without consent. Davis insists that he then said, if Morgan would stay out the balance of the term, and work satisfactorily, he would give him $120 at the end of the year. Morgan says that Davis stated "I will add $10 a month from the time you began, and owe you $120 when your time is up." Davis & Co. discharged Morgan two or three weeks before the end of the term, because the latter had gone to Florida for several days without their consent. Morgan insists that he told Davis that he was going, and the latter made no objection. He claimed that he was discharged without proper cause, and brought suit for the extra compensation promised. The jury found a verdict in his favor, and, the court having refused to grant a new trial, Davis & Co. excepted.

If the promise contemplated that Davis & Co. were to pay Morgan $10 per month for that part of the year which had already passed; and as to which there had been a settlement, it was manifestly nudum pactum; for a past transaction, the obligation of which has been fully satisfied, will not sustain a new promise. Gay v. Mott, 43 Ga. 254. And the result is practically the same whether Morgan or Davis was correct in the statement of the conversation. Both proved a promise to give more than was due, and to pay extra for what one was already legally bound to perform. The employer, therefore, received no consideration for his promise to give the additional money at the end of the year. Morgan had agreed to work for 12 months at the price promised, and if during the term he had agreed to receive less, the employer would still have been liable to pay him the full $40 per month. On the other hand, the employer could not be forced to pay more than the contract price. He got no more services than he had already contracted to receive, and according to an almost unbroken line of decisions the agreement to give more than was due was a nudum pactum, and void, as having no consideration to support the promise. The case is something like that of Buah v. Rawlins, 89 Ga. 117, 14 S. E. 886, where the landlord agreed to give the tenant certain property if he would pay his rent promptly; and it was held that such a promise was a gratuity, and void, as without consideration to support it. And see Tatum v. Morgan, 108 Ga. 336, 33 S. E. 940 (2); Civ. Code 1895, § 3735. It is also within the principle of Stilk v. Myrick, 2 Campbell, 317, where Lord Ellenborough held that an agreement to pay seamen extra for what they were bound by their articles to do was void. And so in Bartlett v. Wyman, 14 Johns. 260, a similar ruling was made in a case where a master agreed to give more wages if the seamen would not abandon the ship. See, also, Ayres v. C. R. I. Ry. Co., 52 Iowa, 478, 3 N. W. 522. There are cases holding that a new promise is binding where one of the parties to a contract refuses to perform, and, to save a loss, the innocent party agrees to pay more than the original contract price, if the actor will perform as originally agreed. Goebel v. Linn, 47 Mich. 489, 11 N. W. 284, 41 Am. Rep. 723. But even if that line of cases should not be disregarded as tending to encourage a breach of contract, they do not affect the rights of Morgan here, because he does not bring himself within their ruling. Had there been a rescission or formal cancellation (Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 402) of the old contract by mutual consent, and if a new contract with new terms had been made; or if there had been any change in the hours, services, or character of work, or other consideration to support the promise to pay the increased wages it would have been enforceable. But, as it was, Morgan proved that Davis promised to pay more for the performance of the old contract than he had originally agreed. Such a promise was not binding.

It was argued that the moral obligation would support the promise here, and undoubtedly there are cases in which such consideration has been held to be sufficient. For example, that arising from the duty of a father to support his bastard child. Hargrove v. Freeman, 12 Ga. 342. At one time Lord Mansfield was quoted as having said that all promises deliberately made should be held binding, but Lord Denman, in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adol. & E. 438, attempts to show that this was either a misquotation, or that, if such a doctrine could have been deduced from whatever he said, the court had refused to follow it in Littlefield v. Shee, 2 Barn. & Ad. 811. The cases holding in conformity with Lord Mansfield's supposed statement, while set out in Hargrove v. Freeman, supra, are not adopted as law, because the court finally held that the principle to be adduced from the general current of authorities is that, for a moral obligation to constitute a sufficient consideration to support an express promise, it must be founded upon an antecedent valuable consideration, though respectable authority can be adduced on the other side. In an agreement by one partner to pay the other for extra work (Gray v. Hamil, 82 Ga. 375, 10 S. E. 205, 6 L. R. A. 72); in the promise by a landlord to refund to tenant's money paid by them for worthless fertilizer (Parrott v. Johnson, 61 Ga. 475); and in the agreement by a brother to account to a sister for her interest as an heir at law in land which he had improperly induced the father to convey (Brown v. Latham, 92 Ga. 280, 18 S. E. 421)—the court recognized that there was a moral obligation to support the promise, but in each of the cases there was something very close akin to a legal obligation or to a trust. In Pittman v. Elder, 76 Ga. 371, it was shown that an agreement to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations, or discharged in bankruptcy, was not supported by what was formerly called a "moral obligation," but by the antecedent obligation; the new promise to pay amounting simply to a waiver of the statute or of the discharge. Civ. Code 1895, § 3658, defines a good consideration to be such as is founded on natural duty and affection or "on a strong moral obligation." In the light of the authorities, however, the strong moral obligation here referred to seems to be one supported either by some antecedent legal obligation, though unenforceable at the time, or by some present equitable duty. The section, however, does not relate to the moral obligation which inheres in every promise. Austell v. Humphries, 99 Ga. 416, 27 S. E. 736. While all courts recognize the obligation arising from any undertaking, they are, from the necessity of the case, forced to hold that naked promises must depend for their performance solely upon the will of the promisor, and not upon the tribunals which are organized to perform the "duty of government to protect person and property," and in pursuance thereof to award money damages for breaches of contracts. Civ. Code 1895, § 5699. But they cannot enforce promises binding on the conscience, except in those cases where some pecuniary damage flows from the breach or where, in addition to the moral obligation, the promise is also supported by a consideration. When one receives a naked promise, and such promise is broken, he is no worse off than he was. He gave nothing for it, he has lost nothing by it, and on its breach he has suffered no damage cognizable by courts. No benefit accrued to him who made the promise, nor did any injury flow to him who received it. Such promises are not made within the scope of transactions intended to confer rights enforceable at law. They are lightly made, dictated by generosity, courtesy, or impulse, often by ruinous prodigality. To enforce them by a judgment in favor of those who gave nothing therefor would often bring such imperfect obligations into competition with the absolute duties to wife and children, or into competition with debts for property actually received, and make the law an instrument by which a man could be forced to be generous before he was just. * * *

JOHNSON'S ADMR. v. SELLERS' ADMR.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1858. 33 Ala. 265.)

Action on a verbal contract. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

WALKER, J.¹³⁶ * * * The 9th and 10th charges assert the proposition, that if Johnson contracted [with the Wilcox Female Institute at Camden, Ala.] to bring and associate his wife with him in teaching the school, and ¹³⁵ "A promise by a party to do what he is bound in law to do is not an illegal consideration, but is the same as no consideration at all, and is merely void, in other words, it is insufficient but not illegal." Kellogg, J., in Cobb v. Cowdery, 40 Vt. 25, 28 (1867).

¹³⁶ The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

then refused to comply with the contract, a promise by Sellers [the defendant's intestate] to give him $2,500 in order to induce him to comply, would be without consideration. In our judgment, these charges are correct. Johnson, by his contract, was legally bound to bring his wife to teach in the school, if the contract was such as the charge supposes. He had no right to violate that contract, and compensate the injured party in damages. It is true, the law would not interpose to compel the performance of the contract; but this is not because he had a right to violate his contract, but because the law supposes the injury done by the violation of it can be sufficiently compensated in damages. A man may commit trespass, for which the law would merely give an action to recover damages; but it does not therefore follow that he had a right to commit the trespass, being responsible for the damages, or that a promise made him to induce him either to commit or not to commit it, would be valid. Renfro v. Heard, 14 Ala. 23.

If two parties make a contract, one of them may waive the performance of the contract by the other, and assume some new and additional obligation as the consideration of the performance by the other. Such obligation would be binding. Within this principle falls the cases of Stoudenmeier v. Williamson, 29 Ala. 558; Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298; and Lattimore v. Hanson, 14 Johns. 330; also, Spangler v. Springer, 22 Penn. St. R. 454; Whiteside v. Jennings, 19 Ala. 784; Thomason v. Dill, 30 Ala. 444. These cases rest upon the ground, that it is competent for the parties to a contract to modify or rescind it, or to waive their right growing out of it as originally made, and engraft new terms upon it. Here, while there is a subsisting contract with the trustees, and a subsisting obligation to perform it, the proposition of the appellant is, that a promise by a third party to induce its performance, or rather to prevent its breach, was supported by a valid consideration. We do not think the law so regards such a promise.¹⁸⁷

¹⁸⁷ In modern jurisprudential language the problem here dealt with is stated in Professor Arthur L. Corbin's edition of Anson on Contracts, p. 146, n., as follows:

"The weight of American authority is in favor of the view that the performance or promise to perform an existing contract with A. is not a good consideration for a promise by B. Johnson's Admr. v. Sellers Admr. (1858) 33 Ala. 265; Arend v. Smith (1897) 151 N. Y. 502; Robinson v. Jewett (1889), 116 N. Y. 40; Havana, etc. Co. v. Ashurst (1894), 148 Ill. 115; Reynolds v. Nugent (1865), 25 Ind. 328; Schuler v. Myton (1892), 48 Kan. 282; Putnam v. Woodbury (1878), 68 Me. 58; Sherwin v. Brigham (1893), 39 O. St. 137; Gordon v. Gordon (1875), 56 N. H. 170; Wimer v. Overseers (1883), 104 Pa. 317; Davenport v. First Cong. Soc. (1873), 33 Wis. 387; Hanks v. Barron (1895), 95 Tenn. 275.

"It appears to the present editor that both performance and a promise to perform ought to be held to be sufficient consideration. Such performance is an actual detriment, because it might be much more beneficial to break the contract with the third party and to risk payment of damages. But if this is a detriment that should not be recognized by the law on grounds of policy, still

(Court of Common Pleas, 1600. Cro. Eliz. 700.)

Assumpsit. Whereas he sold to the defendant's son certain weights of cheese; the defendant, in consideration the plaintiff would deliver the said cheese to his said son, assumed, that if the son did not pay for them, then he would; and for non-payment the action was brought. Upon non-assumpsit pleaded, and found for the plaintiff, it was moved by Godfrey in arrest of judgment, that this was not any consideration; for it is no more than what the law appoints, to deliver that which he sold, the property the performer was privileged to go to his other obligee and induce him to rescind the contract by mutual agreement. By performance he forbears to exercise his privilege, and destroys the power of offering a mutual rescission. Thus, the promisor gets the benefit of the performance, which was that for which he gave his promise; and the promisee has incurred some legal detriment in return for the promise and within the contemplation of the parties. It is immaterial that this detriment is not equivalent in amount with the benefit derived by the promisor. The New York Court of Appeals has adopted this view in the case of DeCicco v. Schweizer (1917), 117 N. E. 807, where the facts were almost exactly like those in Shadwell v. Shadwell, supra. In McDevitt v. Stokes (1917), 192 S. W. 681, the Kentucky Court of Appeals adhered to the generally prevailing rule.

"Where the contract is bilateral, it should be enforced for the same reasons that any other bilateral contract is enforced. Neither logic nor public policy invalidates those reasons where the consideration is a promise to perform in accordance with a pre-existing contract with a third person. Such a bilateral contract brings the contractor under two separate duties to the several promisees, none the less separate because one performance will discharge them both. A mutual rescission in the case of one would have no effect whatever upon the other.

"If A has contracted with B to do a thing, and then A promises C to do that same thing in return for an executed consideration on C's part, C can maintain an action on A's promise to him. This is a unilateral contract. It makes no difference whether A's promise is consideration for what C did. What C did is none the less consideration for A's promise.

"For a detailed discussion of this problem, see Arthur L. Corbin, 'Does a Pre-existing Duty Defeat Consideration?' (1918) 27 Yale Law Journal, 362."

In considering this specific contract problem, it is well to bear in mind also that teachers of jurisprudence are not agreed on the meaning of "privilege." Professor Corbin has accepted the Hohfeld terminology, but Professor Kocourek insists that Professor Hohfeld used the term "privilege" to include a variety of meanings. Albert Kocourek, The Hohfeld System of Fundamental Legal Concepts, 15 Illinois L. Rev. 24, 35 n. In reply see Arthur L. Corbin, Jural Relations and Their Classification, 30 Yale L. J. 226.

¹²² "In the case of Johnson, Admr. v. Sellers, 33 Ala. 265, it is said, 'a promwhereof is in the son by the sale. But Gawdy and Fenner held it to be a good consideration; for it is an ease to the bargainee to have them without suit, which peradventure otherwise he could not have had. And although the bargainee may take them in this case, the bargainor is not bound to deliver them; and there is a new act done by him upon this agreement, and it is an ease to the vendee; and 12 Hen. 7 is, that to deliver the goods of the party himself at another place, is a good accord. Wherefore, caeteris justitiariis absentibus, they adjudged it for the plaintiff.

BAGGE v. SLADE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1614. 3 Bulstrode, 162.)

Writ of error to reverse a judgment.

COKE, C. J. The case was this, two men were bound in a bond for the debt of a third man; the obligation being forfeited, so that they both of them were liable to pay this. The plaintiff here in this writ of error said to the other, "Pay you all the debt, and I will pay you the moiety of this again," the which he paid accordingly, and so made his request to have a repayment made to him of the moiety according to his promise, which to do he refused. Upon this he brought his action upon the case against the plaintiff upon his promise, and upon non assumpsit pleaded, he had a verdict and judgment, and upon this judgment a writ of error was brought. In this case and in the declaration there is a good consideration set forth, the party's own contract here shall bind him, he hath no remedy for the money paid, but when this is paid, here is good assumpsit grounded upon a good consideration for repayment of the moiety by the plaintiff.

HAUGHTON, J. Notwithstanding this contract he is still least in danger of the first bond.

COKE. I have never seen it otherwise, but when one draws money from another that this should be a good consideration to raise a promise.

DODDERIDGE, J. If the consideration puts the other to charge, though it be no ways at all profitable to him who made the promise, yet this shall be a good consideration to raise a promise.

ise by defendant to plaintiff made to induce the latter to comply with an existing contract between him and other persons is without consideration.' We are not disposed to depart from the rule as here stated, but we are not willing to extend it so that if the party making the second contract is directly interested in the result, and is to be benefited, he can not employ the same party for the protection of his own interest. If two persons are jointly indicted, and put upon trial, or if only one is upon trial, and either employs counsel to defend him, the fact that an acquittal of the one employing counsel must result in acquittal of the other, will not render a contract of employment [of the same counsel] by the latter null and void." Coleman, J., in Humes v. Decatur Land Improvement & Furnace Co., 98 Ala. 461, 473 (1893).

Coke agreed with him herein: also if a man be bound to another by a bill in £1000 and he pays unto him £500 in discharge of this bill, the which he accepts of accordingly, and doth upon this assume and promise to deliver up unto him his said bill of £1000, this £500 is no satisfaction of the £1000, but yet this is good and sufficient to make a good promise, and upon a good consideration, because he hath paid money, £500, and he hath no remedy for this again.

Another matter was moved, that the entry of the judgment was not good, the same being in this manner, Ideo consideratum fuit, adtunc, & ibidem hic ad eandem curiam, quod prædictus querens recuperet.

The whole court agreed this judgment to be well entered, and that the consideration here is good, and sufficient to raise the promise, & accordingly the rule of the court was quod judicium affirmetur.¹²⁹

STILK v. MYRICK.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1809. 2 Camp. 317.)

This was an action for seaman's wages, on a voyage from London to the Baltic and back.

By the ship's articles, executed before the commencement of the voyage, the plaintiff was to be paid at the rate of £5 a month; and the principal question in the cause was, whether he was entitled to a higher rate of wages. In the course of the voyage two of the seamen deserted, and the captain, having in vain attempted to supply their places at Cronstadt, there entered into an agreement with the rest of the crew, that they should have the wages of the two who had deserted equally divided among them if he could not procure two other hands at Gottenburgh. This was found impossible, and the ship was worked back to London by the plaintiff and eight more of the original crew, with whom the agreement had been made at Cronstadt.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. I think Harris v. Watson was rightly decided; but I doubt whether the ground of public policy, upon which Lord Kenyon is stated to have proceeded, be the true principle on which the decision is to be supported. Here, I say, the agreement is void for want of consideration. There was no consideration for the ulterior pay promised to the mariners who remained with the ship. Before they sailed from London they had undertaken to do all they could under all the emergencies of the voyage. They had sold all their services till the voyage should be completed. If they had been at liberty to quit the vessel at Cronstadt, the case would have been quite different; or if the captain had capriciously discharged the two men who were wanting, the others might not have been compelled to take the whole duty upon themselves, and their agreeing to do so might have been a sufficient consideration for the promise of an advance of wages. But the desertion of a part of the crew is to be considered an emergency of the voyage as much as their death, and those who remain are bound by the terms of their original contract to exert themselves to the utmost to bring the ship in safety to her destined port. Therefore, without looking to the policy of this agreement, I think it is void for want of consideration, and that the plaintiff can only recover at the rate of £5 a month.

Verdict accordingly.

SHADWELL v. SHADWELL.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1860. 30 L. J. C. P. 145.)

The declaration stated that the testator, in his lifetime (in consideration that the plaintiff would marry Ellen Nicholl), agreed with and promised the plaintiff, who was then unmarried, in the terms contained in a writing in the form of a letter, addressed by the said testator to the plaintiff, which writing was and is in the words, letters, and figures following—that is to say:

"Gray's Inn, August 11, 1838.

"My Dear Lancey: I am glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl; and, as I promised to assist you at starting, I am happy to tell you that I will pay to you £150 yearly during my life, and until your annual income derived from your profession of a Chancery barrister shall amount to 600 guineas, of which your own admission will be the only evidence that I shall receive or require.

"Your ever affectionate uncle,

"Charles Shadwell."

Averment that the plaintiff did all things necessary, and all things necessary happened, to entitle him to have the said testator pay to him eighteen of the said yearly sums of £150 each respectively, and that the time for the payment of each of the said eighteen yearly sums elapsed after he married the said Ellen Nicholl, and in the lifetime of the said testator, and that the plaintiff's annual income derived from his profession of a Chancery barrister never amounted to 600 guineas, which he was always ready and willing to admit and state to the said testator, and the said testator paid to the plaintiff twelve of the said eighteen yearly sums which first became payable, and part, to wit, £12 of the thirteenth; yet the said testator made default in paying the residue of the said thirteenth yearly sum, which residue is still in arrear and unpaid, and in paying the five of the said eighteen yearly sums which last became payable, and the said five sums are still in arrear and unpaid.

Fourth plea, that before and at the time of the making of the supposed agreement and promise in the declaration mentioned, the said marriage had been and was without any request by or on the part of the testator touching the said intended marriage, but at the request of the plaintiff, intended and agreed upon between the plaintiff and the said Ellen Nicholl, of which the testator before and at the time of making the supposed agreement and promise also had notice, and the said marriage was after the making of the supposed agreement and promise duly had and solemnized as in the declaration mentioned, at the request of the plaintiff, and without the request of the testator. And the defendants further say, that save and except as expressed and contained in the writing set forth in the declaration, there never was any consideration for the supposed agreement and promise in the declaration mentioned, or for the performance thereof.

Second replication to the fourth plea, that the said agreement declared on was made in writing, signed by the said testator, and was and is in the words, letters, and figures following, and in none other—that is to say [setting out the letter as in the declaration above]. Averment that the plaintiff afterward married the said Ellen Nicholl, relying on the said promise of the said testator, which at the time of the said marriage was in full force, not in any way vacated or revoked, and that he so married while his annual income derived from his profession of a Chancery barrister did not amount, and was not by him admitted to amount, to 600 guineas.

Demurrers to the replications to the fourth and fifth pleas.¹⁴⁰ Joinder in demurrer.

ERLE, C. J. The question raised by the demurrer to the replication to the fourth plea is, whether there was a consideration to support the action on the promise to pay an annuity of £150 per annum. If there be such a consideration it is a marriage; therefore the promise is within the Statute of Frauds, and the consideration must appear in the writing containing the promise—that is, in the letter of August 11th, 1838—and in the surrounding circumstances to be gathered therefrom, together with the averments on the record. The circumstances are that the plaintiff had made an engagement to marry Ellen Nicholl, his uncle promising to assist him at starting, by which, as I understand the words, he meant on commencing his married life. Then the letter containing the promise declared on is said to specify what the assistance would be—namely, £150 per annum during the uncle's life, and until the plaintiff's professional income should be acknowledged by him to exceed 600 guineas; and a further averment, that the plaintiff, relying upon his promise, without any revocation on the part of the uncle, did marry Ellen Nicholl. Then, do these facts show that the promise was in consideration, either of the loss to be sustained by the plaintiff, or the benefit to be derived from the plaintiff to the uncle at his, the uncle's request? My answer is in the affirmative. First, do these facts show a loss sustained by the plaintiff at the uncle's request? When I answer this in the affirmative, I am aware that a man's marriage with the woman of his choice is in one sense a boon, and in that sense the reverse of a loss; yet, as between the plaintiff and the party promising an income to support the marriage, it may be a loss. The plaintiff may have made the most material changes in his position, and have induced the object of his affections to do the same, and have incurred pecuniary liabilities resulting in embarrassments, which would be in every sense a loss if the income which had been promised should be withheld; and if the promise was made in order to induce the parties to marry, the promise so made would be, in legal effect, a request to marry. Secondly, do these facts show a benefit derived from the plaintiff to the uncle at his request? In answering again in the affirmative, I am at liberty to consider the relation in which the parties stood, and the interest in the status of the nephew which the uncle declares. The marriage primarily affects the parties thereto; but in the second degree it may be an object of interest with a near relative, and in that sense a benefit to him. This benefit is also derived from the plaintiff at the uncle's request, if the promise of the annuity was intended as an inducement to the marriage; and the averment that the plaintiff, relying on the promise, married, is an averment that the promise was one inducement to the marriage. This is a consideration averred in the declaration, and it appears to me to be expressed in the letter, construed with the surrounding circumstances. No case bearing a strong analogy to the present was cited, but the importance of enforcing promises which have been made to induce parties to marry has been often recognized, and the cases of Montefiori v. Montefiori [1 W. Bl. 363] and Bold v. Hutchinson [20 Beav. 250] are examples. I do not feel it necessary to add anything about the numerous authorities referred to in the learned arguments addressed to us, because the decision turns on a question of fact, whether the consideration for the promise is proved as pleaded. I think it is, and therefore my judgment on the first demurrer is for the plaintiff. The second demurrer raises the question, whether the plaintiff's continuing at the bar was made a condition precedent to the right to the annuity. I think not. The uncle promises to continue the annuity until the professional income exceeds the sum mentioned, and I find no stipulation that the annuity shall cease if the professional diligence ceases. My judgment on this demurrer is also for the plaintiff, and I should state that this is the judgment of my Brother Keating and myself, my Brother Byles differing with us.

BYLES, J. I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court on the demurrer to the second replication to the fourth plea. It is alleged by the fourth plea that the defendant's testator never requested the plaintiff to enter into the engagement to marry, or to marry, and that there never was any consideration for the testator's promise, except what may be collected from the letter itself set out in the declaration. The inquiry, therefore, narrows itself to this question, Does the letter itself disclose any consideration for the promise? The consideration relied on by the plaintiff's counsel being the subsequent marriage of the plaintiff, I think the letter discloses no consideration. It is in these words [his Lordship read it]. It is by no means clear that the words "at starting" mean "on marriage with Ellen Nichol," or with any one else. The more natural meaning seems to me to be "at starting in the profession," for it will be observed that these words are used by the testator in reciting a prior promise, made when the testator had not heard of the proposed marriage with Ellen Nicholl, or, so far as appears, heard of any proposed marriage. This construction is fortified by the consideration that the annuity is not, in terms, made to begin from the marriage, but, as it should seem, from the date of the letter. Neither is it in terms made defeasible if Ellen Nicholl should die before marriage. But even on the assumption that the words "at starting" mean "on marriage," I still think that no consideration appears sufficient to sustain the promise. The promise is one which, by law, must be in writing; and the fourth plea shows that no consideration or request, dehors the letter, existed, and, therefore, that no such consideration or request can be alluded to by the letter. Marriage of the plaintiff at the testator's express request would be, no doubt, an ample consideration, but marriage of the plaintiff without the testator's request is no consideration to the testator. It is true that marriage is, or may be a detriment to the plaintiff; but detriment to the plaintiff is not enough, unless it either be a benefit to the testator or be treated by the testator as such, by having been suffered at his request. Suppose a defendant to promise a plaintiff, "I will give you £500 if you break your leg," would that detriment to the plaintiff, should it happen, be any consideration? If it be said that such an accident is an involuntary mischief, would it have been a binding promise if the testator had said, "I will give you £100 a year while you continue in your present chambers"? I conceive that the promise would not be binding for want of a previous request by the testator. Now, the testator in the case before the court derived, so far as appears, no personal benefit from the marriage. The question, therefore, is still further narrowed to this point, Was the marriage at the testator's request? Express request there was none. Can any request be implied? The only words from which it can be contended that it is to be implied are the words, "I am glad to hear of your intended marriage with Ellen Nicholl." But it appears from the fourth plea that that marriage had already been agreed on, and that the testator knew it. These words, therefore, seem to me to import no more than the satisfaction of the testator at the engagement as an accomplished fact. No request can, as it seems to me, be inferred from them. And, further, how does it appear that the testator's implied request, if it could be implied, or his promise, if that promise alone would suffice, or both together, were intended to cause the marriage, or did cause it, so that the marriage can be said to have taken place at the testator's request, or, in other words, in consequence of that request? It seems to me, not only that this does not appear, but that the contrary appears; for the plaintiff before the letter had already bound himself to marry by placing himself not only under a moral, but under a legal obligation to marry, and the testator knew it. The well-known cases which have been cited at the bar in support of the position that a promise based on the consideration of doing that which a man is already bound to do, is invalid, apply to this case; and it is not necessary, in order to invalidate the consideration, that the plaintiff's prior obligation to afford that consideration should have been an obligation to the defendant. It may have been an obligation to a third person. See Herring v. Dorell, 8 Dowl. P. C. 604, and Atkinson v. Settree, Willes, 482. The reason why the doing what a man is already bound to do is no consideration, is not only because such a consideration is in judgment of law of no value, but because a man can hardly be allowed to say that the prior legal obligation was not his determining motive. But whether he can be allowed to say so or not, the plaintiff does not say so here. He does, indeed, make an attempt to meet this difficulty by alleging, in the replication to the fourth plea, that he married relying on the testator's promise; but he shrinks from alleging that though he had promised to marry before the testator's promise to him, nevertheless, he would have broken his engagement, and would not have married without the testator's promise. A man may rely on encouragements to the performance of his duty who yet is prepared to do his duty without those encouragements. At the utmost, the allegation that he relied on the testator's promise seems to me to import no more than that he believed the testator would be as good as his word. It appears to me, for these reasons, that this letter is no more than a letter of kindness, creating no legal obligation. In their judgment on the other portions of the record I agree with the rest of the court.

¹⁴¹ Using the Hohfeld concepts, Professor Corbin thus analyzes the case:

"If there was a valid bilateral engagement between the nephew and Ellen Nichol, the only rights possessed by the former were a right against Ellen that she should marry him as agreed and an indefinite number of rights against third persons that they should not interfere with Ellen's performance as agreed. The nephew abandoned none of these rights. In addition to these rights, he had also the privilege of making an offer of rescission to Ellen and the legal power of creating in Ellen the power of rescission by making such an offer. Prior to his actual marriage to Ellen, he abandoned neither the privilege nor the power, although he forbore from acting in accordance with them. By the actual marriage, however, he utterly destroyed this legal power, for an offer of rescission subsequently made would be void of legal effect. The nephew also had the legal power of breaking his contract with Ellen, thereby substituting a secondary obligation for the primary one. The forbearance to act in accordance with that power is also a detriment and would be a sufficient consideration in itself, except for the fact that he was not, as to Ellen, legally privileged to break the contract." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, p. 145, n. 1.

Query as to a "legal power of breaking" a contract? On the question of the SCOTSON v. PEGG.

(Court of Exchequer, 1861. 6 Hurlstone & Norman 295.)

Declaration. For that in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, would deliver to the defendant a certain cargo of coals, then on board a certain ship of the plaintiffs, the defendant to take the same from and out of the said ship, the defendant promised the plaintiffs to unload and discharge the same at the rate of 49 tons of the said coals during each working day, after the said ship was ready to unload and discharge the same. And although the plaintiffs did afterward deliver the said cargo to the defendant, and were always ready and willing to suffer and permit him to take the same from and out of the said ship as aforesaid, and although all things were done, and conditions precedent to be performed by the plaintiffs were performed by the plaintiffs, to entitle the plaintiffs to a performance of the said promise by the defendant: Yet the defendant did not unload and discharge the said cargo at the rate aforesaid during each working day after the said ship was ready to unload and discharge the same, and the defendant wholly neglected and refused so to do for five days longer and more than he ought to have done according to his said promise; and the plaintiffs were put to expense in and about the maintaining and keeping the master and crew of the said ship, etc.

Plea. That before the making of the said promise the plaintiffs, by another contract made by and between the plaintiffs and certain other persons, agreed with the said certain other persons, for certain freight therefore payable by the said other persons to the plaintiffs, to carry the said coals on a certain voyage in the said ship, and to deliver the said coals to the order of the said other persons, which contract was in full force thence, until, and at the time of the making of the said promise and the delivery of the said coals. And the defendant says that before the making of the said promise, and after the making the said other contract, and while the last-mentioned contract was in force, he bought the coals of the said other persons, who thereupon ordered the plaintiffs to deliver the same to the defendant, under and according to the said contract with the said other persons, of which the plaintiffs before the making of the said promise had notice. And the defendant says that the said order was in full force until and at the time of the making of the said promise, and thence until and at the delivery of the said coals, of which the plaintiffs always had notice. And the defendant says the then future delivery to the defendant of the said coals on the terms in the declaration mentioned, which was the consideration for the said promise, was the delivery of the said coals to the order of the said other persons, which the plaintiffs had by the said contract with such other persons so agreed to make as aforesaid, and which before and at the time of the making of the said promise, until and at the time of the said delivery, the plaintiffs were, by, under, and according to the said contract with the said other persons bound to make as aforesaid. And the defendant says that there never was any consideration for his said promise other than the doing of that which by the said contract with the said other persons they the plaintiffs, before and at the time of the making of the said promise, and thence until the plaintiffs did it, were bound to do.

Demurrer and joinder therein.

MARTIN, B.¹⁴⁸ I am of opinion that the plea is bad, both on principle and in law. It is bad in law because the ordinary rule is, that any act done whereby the contracting party receives a benefit is a good consideration for a promise by him. Here the benefit is the delivery of the coals to the defendant. * * * The defendant gets a benefit by the delivery of the coals to him, and it is immaterial that the plaintiffs had previously contracted with third parties to deliver to their order.

WILDE, B. I am also of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The plaintiffs say, that in consideration that they would deliver to the defendant a cargo of coals from their ship, the defendant promised to discharge the cargo in a certain way. The defendant, in answer, says: "You made a previous contract with other persons that they should discharge the cargo in the same way, and therefore there is no consideration for my promise." But why is there no consideration? It is said, because the plaintiffs, in delivering the coals, are only performing that which they were already bound to do. But to say that there is no consideration is to say that it is not possible for one man to have an interest in the performance of a contract made by another. But if a person chooses to promise to pay a sum of money in order to induce another to perform that which he has already contracted with a third person to do, I confess I cannot see why such a promise should not be binding. Here the defendant, who was a stranger to the original contract, induced the plaintiffs to part with the cargo, which they might not otherwise have been willing to do, and the delivery of it to the defendant was a benefit to him. I accede to the proposition that, if a person contracts with another to do a certain thing, he cannot make the performance of it a consideration for a new promise to the same individual. But there is no authority for the proposition that where there has been a promise to one person to do a certain thing, it is not possible to make a valid promise to another to do the same thing. Therefore, deciding this matter on principle, it is plain to my mind that the delivery of the coals to the defendant was a good consideration for his promise, although the plaintiffs had made a previous contract to deliver them to the order of other persons.

Action by Attilio De Ciccio against Joseph Schweizer and others. From a judgment of the Appellate Division, First Department (166 App. Div. 919, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1106), modifying and affirming a judgment of the trial term in favor of plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

of a subsisting contract with the State of Texas, were they capable of serving as the consideration for any promise by the defendant, notwithstanding they might result, and did result, in a benefit to him? We have examined several cases bearing upon this question. * * *

"The rule established by these authorities is, that a promise made in consideration of the doing of an act which the promisee is already under obligation to a third party to do, though made as an inducement to secure the doing of that act, is not binding because it is not supported by a valuable consideration. We conceive this to be clearly true when the act done on the part of the promisee involves nothing more than performance of the original obligation toward the party to whom it was due. On the other hand, if the promise be made in consideration of a promise to do that act, entered into directly with the promisor, as indicated by Mr. Pollock, or in consideration that some dispute is thereby determined, or that some right is waived, as suggested by the remarks of Martin, B., in Scotson v. Pegg, then the promise is binding, because not made in consideration of the performance of a subsisting obligation to another person, but upon a new consideration moving between the promisor and promisee. We do not perceive that Shadwell v. Shadwell or Scotson v. Pegg are opposed to this view; though some observations were thrown out by the learned judges during the argument which we cannot reconcile with it, and which we cannot assent to.

"We think that the consideration on which this defendant's promise to the plaintiffs is alleged to have been founded is governed by the rule which we have stated. It is claimed that the services rendered by the plaintiffs in the proceeding against Chiles, in the Supreme Court of the United States, were rendered at the request of the defendant, and constituted the consideration for his subsequent promise.

"But it appears that, at the time when they are said to have carried on these proceedings at his request, they had already been retained by and were under a legal obligation to the State of Texas to perform these services; and it is not shown that they promised the defendant that they would continue them, or that they were induced by defendant's request to determine any dispute as to their obligations, or to waive any claim. In a word, no other consideration for any promise by the defendant, than the performance of what they were legally bound to perform by a subsisting contract with another party, is shown; and the plaintiffs have shown, on the other hand, in their own behalf, that they actually did perform that act under their prior contract. We hold that these services could not serve as a consideration for any promise by the defendant, even if it had been made at the time of the request for their performance. It may be added that, even if they could serve this purpose, they are not shown by any evidence to have been, as a matter of fact, the consideration on which the promise here insisted on was based. What the consideration for a promise was is a matter of evidence, and this consideration is not shown

CARDOZO, J. On January 16, 1902, "articles of agreement" were executed by the defendant Joseph Schweizer, his wife, Ernestine, and Count Oberto Gulinelli. The agreement is in Italian. We quote from a translation the part essential to the decision of this controversy:

"Whereas, Miss Blanche Josephine Schweizer, daughter of said Mr. Joseph Schweizer and of said Mrs. Ernestine Teresa Schweizer, is now affianced to and to have been referred to, or to have been in the minds of the parties. We know of no principle which would have authorized a jury to assume, in the absence of affirmative proof, that some past benefit, conferred at a party's request, was intended to serve as a reason or consideration of a subsequent promise, whose terms in no way referred to it, merely because it was an event which had once happened between the same parties. The antecedents of parties are not to be sifted for a consideration.

"Again, it should appear in some way that these services were in fact, rendered in consequence of defendant's request. If the plaintiffs were already bound by their contract with another party to perform them, and were actually performing them at the time of defendant's request; in other words, if they were already moved by a sufficient legal cause, the mere fact of a request by a new party is not evidence that they were caused by that request; and this record discloses no other affirmative evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs did, in fact, act upon that request. Indeed, by showing, in their own behalf, that they obtained judgment against Chiles under their contract with the State of Texas (Rec. 15), they have shown that they did not act upon defendant's request." James, J., in Merrick v. Giddings, 1 Mackey, 394, 406, 410-412 (1882).

"Without dwelling further on the reasons for the doctrine, it seems to us better to hold, as a general rule, that if A, has refused or hesitated to perform an agreement with B., and is requested to do so by C., who will derive a benefit from such performance, and who promises to pay him a certain sum therefor, and A. thereupon undertakes to do it, the performance by A. of his agreement in consequence of such request and promise by C. is a good consideration to support C.'s promise." Allen, J., in Abbott v. Doane, 163 Mass. 433, 436 (1895). If, however, there is no refusal to go on, it seems that in Massachusetts there is no consideration. Parrot v. Mexican Cent. Rwy. Co., 207 Mass. 184 (1911). "As a general proposition, it is settled in this commonwealth that a promise to pay one for doing that which he was under a prior legal duty to do is not binding for want of a valid consideration. * * * A limitation of the general proposition has been established in Massachusetts, in cases where a plaintiff, having entered into a contract with the defendant to do certain work, refuses to proceed with it, and the defendant, in order to secure to himself the actual performance of the work in place of a right to collect damages from the plaintiff, promises to pay him an additional sum. * * * While it [this limitation] is well established in Massachusetts, the doctrine should not be extended beyond the cases to which it is applicable upon the recognized reasons that have been given for it." Knowlton, C. J., in Parrot v. Mexican Central Railway, 207 Mass. 184, 194-195 (1911).

But Massachusetts does not distinguish between doing and promising to do. See Swartzman v. Babcock, 218 Mass. 334 (1914), where the contract was unilateral. Indeed, Professor Williston calls Merrick v. Giddings, quoted, supra, the "single exception" to the statement that "no distinction is taken in the cases, English or American, between actual performance and a promise to perform an existing duty in respect of the validity of the consideration." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 131, pp. 283-284 and note 31.

is to be married to the above said Count Oberto Giacomo Giovanni Francesco Maria Gulinelli: Now in consideration of all that is herein set forth the said Mr. Joseph Schweizer promises and expressly agrees by the present contract to pay annually to his said daughter Blanche, during his own life and to send her, during her lifetime, the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, or the equivalent of said sum in francs, the first payment of said amount to be made on the 20th day of January, 1902."

Later articles provided that "for the same reason heretofore set forth," Mr. Schweizer will not change the provision made in his will for the benefit of his daughter and her issue, if any. The yearly payments in the event of his death are to be continued by his wife.

On January 20, 1902, the marriage occurred. On the same day, the defendant made the first payment to his daughter. He continued the payments annually till 1912. This action is brought to recover the installment of that year. The plaintiff holds an assignment executed by the daughter, in which her husband joined. The question is whether there is any consideration for the promised annuity. That marriage may be a sufficient consideration is not disputed.¹⁴⁴ The argument for the defendant is, however, that Count Gulinelli was already affianced to Miss Schweizer, and that the marriage was merely the fulfillment of an existing legal duty. For this reason, it is insisted, consideration was lacking. The argument leads us to the discussion of a vexed problem of the law which has been debated by courts and writers with much subtlety of reasoning and little harmony of results. There is general acceptance of the proposition that where A. is under a contract with B., a promise made by one to the other to induce performance is void. The trouble comes when the promise to induce performance is made by C., a stranger. Distinctions are then drawn between bilateral and unilateral contracts; between a promise by C. in return for a new promise by A., and a promise by C. in return for performance by A. Some jurists hold that there is consideration in both classes of cases. Ames, Two Theo-

¹⁴⁴ In Prewitt v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22, 24 (1880), Field, J., said: "Now, marriage is not only a valuable consideration, but, as Coke says, there is no other consideration so much respected in the law. Bishop justly observes that 'marriage is attended and followed by pecuniary consequences; by happiness or misery to the parties; by life to unborn children; by unquiet or repose to the state; by what money ordinarily buys and by what no money can buy, to an extent which cannot be estimated or expressed, except by the word infinite. To say, therefore, that it is to be regarded, where it is the inducement to any contract, as a valuable consideration, is to utter truth, yet only a part of the truth.' And, also, that 'marriage is to be ranked among the valuable considerations, yet it is distinguishable from most of these in not being deducible to a value which can be expressed in dollars and cents, while still it is in general terms of the very highest value.' Law of Married Women, §§ 775, 776. Such is the purport and language running through all the decisions, both in England and in this country, with reference to marriage as a consideration for an antenuptial settlement. *Barrow v. The storm center about which this controversy has raged is the case of Shadwell v. Shadwell, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 159; 99 E. C. L. 158, which arose out of a situation similar in many features to the one before us. Nearly everything that has been written on the subject has been a commentary on that decision. There an uncle promised to pay his nephew after marriage an annuity of £150. At the time of the promise the nephew was already engaged. The case was heard before Erle, Ch. J., and Keating and Byles, JJ. The first two judges held the promise to be enforceable. Byles, J., dissented. His view was that the nephew, being already affianced, had incurred no detriment upon the faith of the promise, and hence that consideration was lacking. Neither of the two opinions in Shadwell v. Shadwell can rule the case at bar. There are elements of difference in the two cases which raise new problems. But the earlier case, with the literature which it has engendered, gives us a point of departure and a method of approach.

The courts of this state are committed to the view that a promise by A. to B. to induce him not to break his contract with C. is void. Arend v. Smith, 151 N. Y. 502, 45 N. E. 872; Vanderbilt v. Schreyer, 91 N. Y. 392; Seybolt v. N. Y., L. E. & W. R. R. Co., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; Robinson v. Jewett, 116 N. Y. 40, 22 N. E. 224. If that is the true nature of this promise, there was no consideration. We have never held, however, that a like infirmity attaches to a promise by A., not merely to B., but to B. and C. jointly, to induce them not to rescind or modify a contract which they are free to abandon. To determine whether that is in substance the promise before us, there is need of closer analysis.

The defendant's contract, if it be one, is not bilateral. It is unilateral. Miller v. McKenzie, 95 N. Y. 575, 47 Am. Rep. 85. The consideration exacted is not a promise, but an act. The count did not promise anything. In effect the defendant said to him: If you and my daughter marry, I will pay her an annuity for life. Until marriage occurred, the defendant was not bound. It would not have been enough that the count remained willing to marry. The plain import of the contract is that his bride also should be willing, and that marriage should follow. The promise was intended to affect the conduct, not of one only, but of both. This becomes the more evident when we recall that though the promise ran to the count, it was intended for the benefit of the daughter. Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49. When it came to her knowledge, she had the right to adopt and enforce it. Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 22 N. E. 756, 6 L. R. A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508; Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 52 N. E. 724, 44 L. R. A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454; Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268. In doing so, she made herself a party to the contract. Gifford v. Corrigan, supra. If the contract had been bilateral, her position might have been different. Since, however, it was unilateral, the consideration being performance (Miller v. McKenzie, supra), action on the faith of it put her in the same position as if she had been in form the promisee. That she learned of the promise before the marriage is a legitimate inference from the relation of the parties and from other attendant circumstances. The writing was signed by her parents; it was delivered to her intended husband; it was made four days before the marriage; it called for a payment on the day of the marriage; and on that day payment was made, and made to her. From all these circumstances, we may infer that at the time of the marriage the promise was known to the bride as well as the husband, and that both acted upon the faith of it.

The situation, therefore, is the same in substance as if the promise had run to husband and wife alike, and had been intended to induce performance by both. They were free by common consent to terminate their engagement or to postpone the marriage. If they forbore from exercising that right and assumed the responsibilities of marriage in reliance on the defendant's promise, he may not now retract it. The distinction between a promise by A. to B. to induce him not to break his contract with C., and a like promise to induce him not to join with C. in a voluntary rescission, is not a new one. It has been suggested in cases where the new promise ran to B. solely, and not to B. and C. jointly. Pollock, Contracts (8th Ed.) p. 199; Williston, 8 Harv. L. Rev. 36. The criticism has been made that in such circumstances there ought to be some evidence that C. was ready to withdraw. Williston, supra, pp. 36, 37. Whether that is true of contracts to marry is not certain. Many elements foreign to the ordinary business contract enter into such engagements. It does not seem a far-fetched assumption in such cases that one will release where the other has repented. We shall assume, however, that the criticism is valid where the promise is intended as an inducement to only one of the two parties to the contract. It may then be sheer speculation to say that the other party could have been persuaded to rescind. But where the promise is held out as an inducement to both parties alike, there are new and different implications. One does not commonly apply pressure to coerce the will and action of those who are anxious to proceed. The attempt to sway their conduct by new inducements is an implied admission that both may waiver; that one equally with the other must be strengthened and persuaded; and that rescission or at least delay is something to be averted, and something, therefore, within the range of not unreasonable expectation. If pressure, applied to both, and holding both to their course, is not the purpose of the promise, it is at least the natural tendency and the probable result.

The defendant knew that a man and a woman were assuming the responsibilities of wedlock in the belief that adequate provision had been made for the woman and for future offspring. He offered this inducement to both while they were free to retract or to delay. That they neither retracted nor delayed is certain. It is not to be expected that they should lay bare all the motives and promptings, some avowed and conscious, others perhaps half-conscious and inarticulate, which swayed their conduct. It is enough that the natural consequence of the defendant's promise was to induce them to put the thought of rescission or delay aside. From that moment, there was no longer a real alternative. There was no longer what philosophers call a "living" option. This in itself permits the inference of detriment. Smith v. Chadwick, 9 App. Cas. 187, 196; Smith v. Land & House Corp., 28 Ch. D. 7, 16; Voorhis v. Olmstead, 66 N. Y. 113, 118; Fottler v. Moseley, 179 Mass. 295, 60 N. E. 788. "If it is proved that the defendants with a view to induce the plaintiff to enter into a contract made a statement to the plaintiff of such a nature as would be likely to induce a person to enter into the contract, it is a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the statement." Blackburn, L. J., in Smith v. Chadwick, supra. The same inference follows, not so inevitably, but still legitimately, where the statement is made to induce the preservation of a contract. It will not do to divert the minds of others from a given line of conduct, and then to urge that because of the diversion the opportunity has gone by to say how their minds would otherwise have acted. If the tendency of the promise is to induce them to persevere, reliance and detriment may be inferred from the mere fact of performance. The springs of conduct are subtle and varied. One who meddles with them must not insist upon too nice a measure of proof that the spring which he released was effective to the exclusion of all others.

One other line of argument must be considered. The suggestion is made that the defendant's promise was not made animo contrahendi. It was not designed, we are told, to sway the conduct of any one; it was merely the offer of a gift which found its motive in the engagement of the daughter to the count. Undoubtedly, the prospective marriage is not to be deemed a consideration for the promise "unless the parties have dealt with it on that footing." Holmes, Common Law, p. 292; Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 564, 579, 12 Sup. Ct. 84 (35 L. Ed. 860). "Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties." Philpot v. Gruninger, 14 Wall. 570, 577 (20 L. Ed. 743); Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Wickham, supra. But here the very formality of the agreement suggests a purpose to effect the legal relations of the signers. One does not commonly pledge one's self to generosity in the language of a covenant. That the parties believed there was a consideration is certain. The document recites the engagement and the coming marriage. It states that these are the "consideration" for the promise. The failure to marry would have made the promise ineffective. In these circumstances we cannot say that the promise was not intended to control the conduct of those whom it was designed to benefit. Certainly we cannot draw that inference as one of law. Both sides moved for the direction of a verdict, and the trial judge became by consent the trier of the facts. If conflicting inferences were possible, he chose those favorable to the plaintiff.

The conclusion to which we are thus led is reinforced by those considerations of public policy which cluster about contracts that touch the marriage relation. The law favors marriage settlements, and seeks to uphold them. It puts them for many purposes in a class by themselves. Phalen v. U. S. Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 178, 181, 78 N. E. 943, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 734, 9 Ann. Cas. 595. It has enforced them at times where consideration, if present at all, has been dependent upon doubtful inference. McNutt v. McNutt, 116 Ind. 545, 19 N. E. 115, 2 L. R. A. 372; Appleby v. Appleby, 100 Minn. 408, 111 N. W. 305, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 590, 117 Am. St Rep. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 563. It strains, if need be, to the uttermost the interpretation of equivocal words and conduct in the effort to hold men to the honorable fulfillment of engagements designed to influence in their deepest relations the lives of others.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

CRANE, J.¹⁴⁵ (concurring). I concur for affirmance and agree with what Judge Cardozo has said about the law of consideration, but I prefer other reasons for my conclusions in this case.

Marriage settlements are usually made between husband and wife; but marriage settlements by third parties have been recognized by law. Schouler's Dom. Rel. (5th Ed.) § 178; Phalen v. U. S. Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 178, 78 N. E. 943, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 734, 9 Ann. Cas. 595. The policy of the law to uphold and enforce such contracts is applicable to both classes.

The only reasonable inference to be drawn from these facts is that this agreement was a marriage settlement made by the father upon his daughter in view of the impending marriage and to take effect upon the marriage. The marriage having taken place, the settlement became binding. In the Phalen Case, supra, it was said by this court:

"The strict legal definition of consideration need not here be discussed, since marriage settlements have always been regarded as exceptions to the general rule upon this question." At page 186 of 186 N. Y. at page 946 of 78 N. E. (7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 734, 9 Ann. Cas. 595).

If, however, consideration were necessary for this marriage settlement, the marriage was that consideration. * * *

¹⁴⁵ Parts of the opinion of Crane, J., are omitted.

Romilly's words in Laver v. Fielder, supra, [32 Beav. 1] are pertinent here:

"It is of great importance that all persons should understand, that when a man makes a solemn engagement upon an important occasion, such as the marriage of his daughter, he is bound by the promise he then makes. If he induce a person to act upon a particular promise, with a particular view, which affects the interests in life of his own children and of the persons who become united to them, this court will not permit him afterwards to forego his own words, and say that he was not bound by what he then promised."

The trial court to whom all the facts were submitted was justified in finding that this agreement was a marriage settlement by a father upon his daughter, and that it influenced or induced the parties, at least in part, to marry at the time they did, and was therefore a legal agreement.

McDEVITT v. STOKES.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1917. 174 Ky. 515, 192 S. W. 681.)

Action by Mike McDevitt against W. E. D. Stokes. Defendant's demurrer to complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SETTLE, C. J.¹⁴⁷ In this action instituted by the appellant Mike McDevitt, in the court below he sought to recover of the appellee, W. E. D. Stokes, the sum of $800 alleged to be the balance due him of a $1,000 claim which appellee agreed to pay him in the event he won with a mare called "Grace," to be driven by him, the celebrated Kentucky Futurity race of the Kentucky Trotting Horse Breeders' Association at Lexington in October, 1910. In the opinion of the Circuit Court the facts alleged in the petition did not show a sufficient consideration to support the agreement on the part of appellee to pay the $1,000, for which reason the general demurrer filed by the latter to the petition was sustained. The appellant declining to

Of De Cicco v. Schweizer, it is said in 31 H. L. R. 652-3:

"An act which the promisee is legally bound to perform is not valid consideration for the promise of a third person. * * * However, in the present case the act called for, marriage, was the joint act of the promisee and beneficiary. Although each was bound to the other, together they were not bound to anyone. In marrying, they performed an act which no one had a legal right to call upon them to do, and which, therefore, was good consideration."

¹⁴⁷ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

plead further, the petition was dismissed, and from the judgment entered in conformity to these rulings he prosecutes this appeal.

The facts constituting appellant's cause of action, fully set forth in the petition, are substantially as follows: At the trotting meeting of the Kentucky Trotting Horse Breeders Association, held at the city of Lexington in October, 1910, the mare Grace, owned by one Shaw, was entered in the Kentucky Futurity race to be driven by the appellant, McDevitt, a driver of great skill and experience, who was then in Shaw's employ. The Kentucky Futurity race is one of the most noted races among trotting horsemen in the United States, and the winning of it greatly increases the value of the winning horse and also the value of the sire, dam, and brothers and sisters of the winner. The purse offered in the race in question was $14,000, to be divided as follows: To the winner $10,000; to the second horse, $2,000; to the third horse $1,000; to the fourth horse $500; to the owner of the dam of the winner $300; to the owner of the dam of the second horse $100; to the owner of the dam of the third horse $75; to the owner of the dam of the fourth horse $25. At the time this race occurred, and for some years prior thereto, the appellee, Stokes, controlled and managed a large stock farm near Lexington, together with a number of valuable race horses, bred and reared thereon, and had formed for operating the business a corporation known as the "Patchen Wilkes Stock Farm," of which he owns practically all the stock and is the president and manager. Among the horses then owned by this corporation was Peter the Great, the sire of the mare Grace, Orianna, her dam, Vladimir, a yearling, and Kilpatrick, a colt, her full-brothers. As appellee named the mare Orianna as the dam of Grace, entered to win the Kentucky Futurity race, he, or the corporation of which he is president, was entitled, in the event of the latter's winning it, to receive $300 out of the purse of $14,000, going to the winner. In addition, the value of each of the four horses, Peter the Great, Orianna, Vladimir and Kilpatrick, owned by the corporation of which he is president, would be greatly increased by Grace winning the race. It is alleged in the petition that, influenced by the foregoing considerations, appellee agreed to pay appellant the sum of $1,000 if he would drive and win the Kentucky Futurity with the mare Grace, to which the latter agreed; drove the mare and won the race; that by reason thereof appellee, or the corporation of which he is president, received, of the $14,000 purse won $300, as owner of Orianna, the dam of Grace, and the value of Peter the Great, the sire of Grace, was increased $10,000, that of Orianna, her dam, $5,000, and that of Vladimir and Kilpatrick, her brothers, $5,000 each.

It is insisted for appellant that the above-enumerated benefits received by appellee from the winning of the trotting race by the mare Grace, which resulted in large measure from his skill in driving her, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the promise and undertaking of appellee to pay him the $1,000. This contention ignores consideration of another element of the alleged contract between the parties which, in our minds, is conclusive of its invalidity, viz. that appellant, because of his employment by Shaw, the owner of the mare Grace, was already both morally and legally bound to perform the service required of him by the alleged contract he made with appellee; hence its performance, as legally required by his contract with Shaw, would inevitably have resulted in the benefits received by appellee, in the absence of the alleged contract made by the latter to pay therefor. To hold that appellant would not have won the race with Grace but for the agreement of appellee to pay him the $1,000 if he would do so, would be to say that he would have been recreant to the obligation arising out of his employment by Shaw, an inference not justified by anything appearing in the petition.

We find no fault with the argument of appellant's counsel that a consideration which is either of benefit to the promisor or detriment to the promisee will be regarded sufficient to uphold the contract between the parties; nor are we inclined to depart from any principle announced in the cases of Talbott v. Stemmons, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 33, Ryan v. Tribble, 60 S. W. 633, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1447, Moayon v. Moayon, 114 Ky. 864, 72 S. W. 33, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1641, 60 L. R. A. 415, 102 Am. St. Rep. 303, Van Winkle v. King, 145 Ky. 693, 141 S. W. 46, First State Bank, etc., v. Morton, 146 Ky. 293, 142 S. W. 694, and Shadwick v. Smith, 147 Ky. 160, 143 S. W. 1027, relied on in the brief of counsel. The contracts discussed and passed on in those cases rest upon no such facts as are presented by the contract in the instant case, nor do they, or any of them, conflict with the conclusions at which we have arrived.

It will be found from an examination of those cases that the benefit resulting to the promisor, constituting the consideration of the contract, was some legal right acquired of the promisee by the promisor to which he would not otherwise have been entitled, or that the detriment resulting to the promisee, constituting the consideration of the contract, was the waiver or loss of some legal right in return for the promise he would otherwise have availed himself of. Our meaning will be better explained by the following excerpt from Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 274, in which the author, in discussing the meaning of the words "valuable consideration," says:

"The use of 'benefit' and 'detriment' in this connection needs explanation. While correct if properly understood, it is liable to misconstruction. 'Benefit' does not refer to any pecuniary gain arising out of the transaction, nor 'detriment' to any pecuniary loss. It is not possible to wait until the transaction is concluded and the books balanced to see whether the consideration existed originally. 'Benefit' as used in this rule means that the promisor has, in return for a promise, acquired some legal right to which he would not otherwise have been entitled; 'detriment' means that the promisee has, in return for the promise, forborne some legal right which he would otherwise have been entitled to exercise." * * *

The controlling feature which distinguishes the instant case from those supra, relied on by appellant's counsel, is that what the appellant claims he undertook to do in return for the appellee's promise to pay him the $1,000, was a thing or act he was already under a legal obligation to perform regardless of the promise made by the appellee. * * *

In Eblin v. Miller's Executor, supra, [78 Ky. 371] the distinction between an actual benefit and a legal benefit is aptly shown. Eblin, a tenant of Miller, having complained to him that a stairway of the leased premises was out of repair and threatened to surrender his lease and abandon the premises before the end of the term, unless Miller would repair the stairway, the latter promised him, if he would continue as his tenant to the end of the term, he (Miller) would have the stairway repaired, which he did. After the making of the repairs, however, Eblin, on account of the giving way of the banisters, fell from the stairway and was injured. After the death of Miller, Eblin brought suit against his executors to recover damages for the injuries caused by his fall from the stairway, alleging in the petition that his injuries resulted from the negligent manner in which the stairway was repaired by Miller. In the absence of a contract to repair the leased premises the law imposes no duty upon the landlord to repair the same. As no such contract was made between Eblin and Miller before or when the former began his tenancy, he was bound, as tenant, to retain possession of the premises during the term, whether the landlord made needed repairs thereon or not, but the only promise on the part of Miller to make repairs was after the beginning of the term, and based alone on the agreement of the tenant to relinquish his expressed purpose to abandon them before the end of his term. Upon the state of case presented, it was held: (1) A mere promise by a landlord to repair the demised premises before the tenant's term expires, upon the agreement that he will not abandon the property, is without consideration, and cannot be enforced. (2) As the tenant was bound to retain possession of the premises for the current month, without an agreement to continue his tenancy for a longer time, the case fell within the rule stated. (3) That the landlord agreed to have repairs made by a person regularly employed by him to repair his houses, and that this person did the work unskillfully, did not aid the petition without an averment that he was unskillful; the agreement being gratuitous.

It is apparent from the facts alleged in the petition and the application to them of the principle announced by the authorities, supra, that the petition fails to state a cause of action against appellee. The latter was, it is true, benefited by the winning of the Kentucky Futurity purse by the mare Grace, driven by appellant, but the benefit was purely incidental and one to which he was entitled regardless of appellant's undertaking with him to win the race or of his, appellee's, promise to pay him the $1,000 if he would do so. As appellant under his contract with his employer, Shaw, was in duty bound to do what he claims appellee agreed to pay him to perform, it is evident that he neither assumed any added responsibility nor sustained any loss by reason of his undertaking with appellee that he would cause the mare Grace to win the race; and no liability was legally imposed upon appellee by his promise to pay him for the service rendered.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to decide whether the contract was contrary to public policy; hence that question is not passed on. It follows from what has been said that the action of the Circuit Court in sustaining the demurrer was not error. Wherefore the judgment is

*Affirmed.*¹⁴⁸

"It is urged upon us by respondents that this was a new contract. New in what? Jungenfeld [the architect] was bound by his contract to design and supervise this building. Under the new promise he was not to do anything more or anything different. What benefit was to accrue to Wainwright? He was to receive the same service from Jungenfeld under the new that Jungenfeld was bound to tender under the original contract. What loss, trouble, or inconvenience could result to Jungenfeld that he had not already assumed? No amount of metaphysical reasoning can change the plain fact that Jungenfeld took advantage of Wainwright's necessities, and extorted the promise of five per cent on the refrigerator plant, as the condition of his complying with his contract already entered into. Nor had he even the flimsy pretext that Wainwright had violated any of the conditions of the contract on his part. Jungenfeld himself put it upon the simple proposition that, 'if he, as an architect, put up the brewery, and another company put up the refrigerating machinery, it would be a detriment to the Empire Refrigerating Company' of which Jungenfeld was president. To permit plaintiff to recover under such circumstances would be to offer a premium upon bad faith, and invite men to violate their most sacred contracts that they may profit by their own wrong.

"That a promise to pay a man for doing that which he is already under contract to do is without consideration," is conceded by respondents. * * * The learned counsel for respondents do not controvert the general proposition. Their contention is, and the circuit court agreed with them, that, when Jungenfeld declined to go further on his contract, the defendant then had the right to sue for damages, and not having elected to sue Jungenfeld, but having acceded to his demand for the additional compensation, defendant cannot now be heard to say his promise is without consideration. While it is true Jungenfeld became liable in damages for the obvious breach of his contract, we do not think it follows that defendant is estopped from showing its promise was made without consideration.

"It is true that as eminent a jurist as Judge Cooley, in Gosbel v. Linn, 47 Michigan 489, held that an ice company which had agreed to furnish a brewery with all the ice they might need for their business from November 8, 1879, until January 1, 1881, at $1.75 per ton, and afterwards in May, 1880, declined to deliver any more ice unless the brewery would give it $3 per ton, could recover on a promissory note given for the increased price. Profound as is our respect for the distinguished judge who delivered that opinion, we are

W. K. MORRISON CO. v. SLONZYNSKI, ET AL.

Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien by W. K. Morrison Company against Minnie Slonzynski and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Minnie Slonzynski appeals. Affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The undisputed evidence, in this action to foreclose a still of the opinion that his decision is not in accord with the almost universally accepted doctrine and is not convincing, and certainly so much of the opinion as holds that the payment by a debtor of a part of his debt then due would constitute a defense to a suit for the remainder is not the law of this state, nor do we think of any other where the common law prevails.

"The case of Bishop v. Busse, 69 Ill. 403, is really distinguishable from the case at bar. The price of brick increased very considerably, and the owner changed the plan of the building, so as to require nearly double the number; owing to the increased price and change in the plans, the contractor notified the party for whom he was building, that he could not complete the house at the original prices, and, thereupon, a new arrangement was made, and it is expressly upheld by the court on the ground that the change in the buildings was such a modification as necessitated a new contract. Nothing we have said is intended as denying parties the right to modify their contracts, or make new contracts, upon new or different considerations and binding themselves thereby.

"What we hold is that, when a party merely does what he has already obligated himself to do, he cannot demand an additional compensation therefor, and, although by taking advantage of the necessities of his adversary, he obtains a promise for more, the law will regard it as nudum pactum, and will not lend its process to aid in the wrong." See also Alaska Packers Assn. v. Domenico, 117 Fed. 99 (1902).

For an analogous hold-up case, see Tolhurst v. Powers, 133 N. Y. 460, (1892), where Finch, J., said: "We agree with the prevailing opinion of the General Term that there was no consideration to support the promise of Powers to pay Ball's debt to the plaintiffs. * * * Ball and Powers requiring a delivery of the dynamo, the plaintiffs undertook or threatened to retain the possession till the original debt should be paid. That they had no right to do. Their primary lien was lost by the delivery, and they acquired no new one by reason of the repairs which were paid for. Such refusal to surrender the possession was an absolute wrong without any color of right about it. After demand their refusal was a trespass, and according to their own evidence the sole consideration for the promise which they claim that Powers made to pay the old debt of Ball was their surrender of possession. To that they were already bound, and parted with nothing by the surrender. They gave up no right which they had against any one, but extorted the promise by a threat of what would have been, if executed, a wrongful conversion. Doing what they were already bound to do furnished no consideration for the promise."

In Erny v. Bauer, 234 Pa. 330 (1912), where a mortgagor in default surrendered possession and agreed to make a deed to the premises on condition of being released from further liability on the mortgage, it was held that the agreement was without consideration. Mestrezat, J., said (pp. 333-4): "At the time the writ [of scire facias on the mortgage] was issued in this case, the defendant had made default in payment of the semi-annual installment of interest due on July 1, 1910 and January 1, 1911. The plaintiff therefore, on March 1, mechanic's lien, is that one Ahl had a contract to erect a building for appellant in the fall of 1916; that Ahl sublet the painting to respondent for $100; that, although no specific date was set for finishing the painting, it was contemplated that the building would be finished by the new year; that by the middle of December, 1916, respondent had painted the outside, which was reasonably worth $40; that thereafter the work on the building stopped, with nothing of the inside finishing done, so that respondent was unable to do the painting on the inside as agreed; that some time previous to April, 1917, respondent filed a mechanic's lien for the work done; that in April Ahl notified respondent that work on the building would be resumed, and requested respondent to do the inside painting as soon as the carpenters were through; that respondent then told Ahl that he had taken the contract, understanding that the painting could be done during the winter, when work was slack, and that he could not now in the spring, the busy season, afford to do it for the original price; that thereupon Ahl agreed to give him $25 more, or in all $125 for the same work he in the fall had promised to do for $100; and that respondent accepted Ahl's terms and finished the work, which was of the reasonable value of $125. The court granted a judgment and lien for $125.

The only proposition urged on the appeal is that there was no consideration for the modified contract; hence the recovery should have been limited to $100. But it seems to us that under the authority of King v. Duluth, Missabe & Northern Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 482, 63 N. W. 1105, the only case to which we are cited by appellant, a legal consideration was shown. Through no fault of respondent there was a cessation of the work on the building, so that he could not finish his part within the time contemplated when he took the job. Because of this default—it is immaterial whether it was appellant's or Ahl's—respondent was forced to file a lien to protect his rights in case construction was not resumed, and he had to do the work during the busy season, instead of during the slack, as was in the minds of the parties when the original agreement was made. We think these matters furnish a sufficient consideration for a modification 1911, the date of the alleged oral agreement, could have proceeded by scire facias, obtained judgment, sold the premises and collected the indebtedness due him, secured by the bond and mortgage; or he could have entered at pleasure, taken actual possession, used the land and reaped its profits: Tryon v. Munson, 77 Pa. 250. If the defendant refused to give possession, he could have been ousted by an action of ejectment. Assuming that he gave possession in pursuance of the alleged parol agreement, he did nothing more than it was his duty to do or what he could have been compelled by legal process to do. No consideration therefore passed to the plaintiff when the defendant voluntarily surrendered possession of the premises to him in pursuance of the agreement." (pp. 333-334). But why was not the agreement to give a deed consideration? On validity of agreement by mortgagor to convey premises to mortgagee in consideration of release from liability under mortgage, see *Ann. of the original contract. Appellant was not a party to the contract; Ahl does not offer any objection to the validity of the modification; and it is difficult to see wherein appellant is injured or damaged, for respondent's work was reasonably worth $125.

"But where the party refusing to complete his contract does so by reason of some unforeseen and substantial difficulties in the performance of the contract, which were not known or anticipated by the parties when the contract was entered into, and which cast upon him an additional burden not contemplated by the parties, and the opposite party promises him extra pay or benefits if he will complete his contract, and he so promises, the promise to pay is supported by a valid consideration. In such a case the natural inference arising from the transaction, if unmodified by any equitable considerations, is rebutted, and the presumption arises that by the voluntary and mutual promises of the parties their respective rights and obligations under the original contract are waived, and those of the new or modified contract substituted for them. Cases of this character form an exception to the general rule that a promise to do that which a party is already legally bound to do is not a sufficient consideration to support a promise by the other party to the contract to give the former an additional compensation or benefit. 1 Whart. Cont. § 500.

"On the other hand, where no unforeseen additional burdens have been cast upon a party refusing to perform his contract, which make his refusal to perform, unless promised further pay, equitable, and such refusal and promise of extra pay are all one transaction, the promise of further compensation is without consideration, and the case falls within the general rule, and the promise cannot be legally enforced, although the other party has completed his contract in reliance upon it." Start, C. J. in King v. Duluth, Missabe & Northern Rwy. Co., 61 Minn. 482, 487-488 (1895); Linz v. Schuck, 106 Md. 220 (1907) was decided in accord with the foregoing language.

"It is further said by those who adhere to this view that what unforeseen difficulties and burdens will make a party's refusal to go forward with his contract equitable, so as to take the case out of the general rule and bring it within the exception, must depend upon the facts of each particular case. They must be substantial, unforeseen, and not within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. They need not be such as would legally justify the party in his refusal to perform his contract, unless promised extra pay, or to justify a court of equity in relieving him from the contract; for they are sufficient if they are of such a character as to render the party's demand for extra pay manifestly fair, so as to rebut all inference that he is seeking to be relieved from an unsatisfactory contract, or to take advantage of the necessities of the opposite party to coerce from him a promise for further compensation. Inadequacy of the contract price which is the result of an error of judgment, and not of some excusable mistake of fact, is not sufficient. King v. Duluth, etc., Ry. Co., supra." WARD v. GOODRICH.

Action by Ella D. Goodrich, formerly Ella D. Ward, against Calvin T. Ward her former husband on a contract between husband and wife, made pending a suit for divorce, which stipulates that the husband shall pay a certain sum per week for the support of his child in the custody of the wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

GODDARD, J.¹⁵⁰ * * * It was urged in the court below in support of a motion for judgment on the pleadings, and is insisted on here by counsel for appellant, that the contract sued on is void, for want of proper consideration. The argument is that since the only consideration on the part of the appellant is his promise to support his infant child—in other words, to do that which he was legally bound to do—it was not a sufficient consideration to support a promise; and therefore appellant's promise cannot be enforced. Counsel labor under a misapprehension as to the application of the rule he invokes. While it is settled that the promising to do, or the doing of, that which the promisor is already legally bound to do, does not, as a rule, constitute consideration for a reciprocal promise, or support a reciprocal undertaking given by the promisee, it by no means follows that such promise may not be enforced against such promisor by the promisee, although its enforcement compels the performance of that which was already a legal obligation. * * *

This action does not involve the right to the custody of the child, as counsel for appellant seem to argue, but only the question as to whether, having placed the child in appellee's care, his promise to pay the stipu-

"However, where a contract must be performed under burdensome conditions not anticipated, and not within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made, and the promisee measures up to the right standard of honesty and fair dealing, and agrees, in view of the changed conditions, to pay what is then reasonable, just, and fair, such new contract is not without consideration within the meaning of that term, either in law or in equity." Donahue, J., in United Steel Co. v. Casey, 262 Fed. 889, 893-894 (1920).

Clearly where conditions have arisen under which a party is entitled to refuse to go ahead with his contract, a promise to pay him extra if he will do so is valid. In Hartley v. Ponsonby, 7 E. & B. 872 (1857), where the crew to work a ship had become so reduced in number that the jury made a finding which Lord Campbell, C. J., said, "imports to my mind that for the ship to go to sea with so few hands was dangerous to life. If so, it was not incumbent on the plaintiff to perform the work; and he was in the condition of a free man" it was held that there was consideration for the contract to pay him a sum extra to the regular wages to assist in working the ship with the diminished crew. BENDER v. BEEN.

Action upon a promissory note.

BECK, J.¹⁸² 1. The promissory note in suit was jointly executed by defendant and four others. It called for $220, and, after certain payments were deducted, it is claimed in the petition that $150 remained due thereon, for which judgment is asked. The defendant alleged in his answer that a prior indorsee of the note, while holding it, did execute a writing, discharging defendant from all liability thereon, which is in the following words: "Mt. Ayr, Ia. 5-3, 1887. Received of Chas. A. Been $40.00, and same credited on note dated Mch. 2, 1882, given for $220.00, and signed by Calvin Stiles, Wm. A. Been, J. S. Been, C. A. Been, and Wm. White, given to G. Bender. The consideration of payment of above $40.00 is that said Chas. A. Been is to be released entirely from the above-named note. This is done by consent of G. Bender. [Signed] Day Dunning, Cashier." It is further alleged in the answer that the note came into the possession of plaintiff long after maturity, who had full knowl-

Sir Frederick Pollock has said: "Let us now take the case of a promise by John to Peter to do something which he has already promised William to do. * * * Will any one deny that John's promise to Peter will be binding if given in exchange for a performance—say immediate payment of money—by Peter? * * * If then the promise is binding when given for a performance, why should it be less binding when it is given in exchange for Peter's promise? There is no reason in the nature of the case for making any difference"; and Professor Williston has answered: "The difference is this: John's promise to Peter, when given in exchange for a payment of money by Peter is binding because the payment of money is a good consideration. Whether the promise of John in this case could be good consideration is immaterial, for the payment of money needs no consideration. The promise is not illegal and the parties acted under no mistake. If, however, Peter gives a promise instead of money, there must be good consideration on both sides. Not only must Peter's promise be of the sort which the law regards as sufficient, but John's also must be, or neither is enforceable, and the disputed question is whether John's promise is sufficient consideration to support Peter's promise." edge of the release pleaded. A demurrer to the answer was overruled, and from that decision plaintiff appeals.

2. It is a familiar rule of the law that a payment of a part of a promissory note, or of a debt existing in any different form, in discharge of the whole, will not bar recovery of the balance unpaid. The rule is based upon the principle that there is no consideration for the promise of discharge; the sum paid being in fact due from the payer on the debt, he renders no consideration to the payee for his promise to release the balance of the debt. This doctrine has been recognized in more than one decision of this court. Myers v. Byington, 34 Iowa 205; Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa 340; Rea v. Owens, 37 Iowa 262; Bryan v. Brazil, 52 Iowa 350, 3 N. W. Rep. 117; Early v. Burt, 68 Iowa 716, 28 N. W. Rep. 35. Under this rule the discharge pleaded by defendant is without consideration, and is therefore void. * * *

It is our opinion that the District Court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's answer. Its judgment is therefore BIDDER v. BRIDGES.

(High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, 1887. 37 Ch. Div. 406.)

In this action costs were taxable against plaintiffs. Certificates of the taxing master showed costs of the judgment £465, 17s. 10d. and costs of the appeal in the case £144 7s. 4d. To save the cost of filing the certificates, Mr. Norris, the managing clerk of Mr. Russ, the solicitor for the defendant, called on Messrs. Rooke & Sons, solicitors for the plaintiffs, on the 28th of May, 1887, when Mr. F. H. Rooke handed him a check for £609 5s. 2d., being the amount of the taxed costs of the judgment and appeal, less £1, which was deducted on account of the certificates not being filed. Mr. Norris then signed receipts for the costs, which were indorsed upon the certificates, and he then handed over the certificates to Mr. F. H. Rooke. The form of the receipt on the certificate of the costs of the judgment was as follows: "Received by check the within-mentioned costs of £465 17s. 10d., less 10s., remitted.—Charles A. Russ.—H. G. N." And a similar receipt was given for the costs of the appeal. The check was drawn by Rooke & Sons in favor of C. A. Russ, Esq., or order, and was duly paid.

Mr. Rooke in his affidavit stated that he objected to pay for the filing of the certificates on the ground that they had been taken out without giving notice to his firm of the final appointment to dispose of certain outstanding queries and in their absence, and also on the ground that filing the certificates was an unnecessary expense; and that he gave the check in full satisfaction of all Davis's claims against the plaintiff's under the certificates. Mr. Norris, however, made a counter affidavit stating that all the queries were finally disposed of in the presence of a representative of Messrs. Rooke & Sons. Nothing was said at the time about interest on the costs; but on the 11th of July, 1887, Mr. Russ wrote a letter to Messrs. Rooke & Sons, in which he said: "When you handed me check for the amount of taxed costs you omitted to include interest on the respective certificates. This interest, calculated at 4 per cent from the respective dates of the judgment and appeal, must be paid in the usual way, and I should be obliged by your procuring and handing me a check for £33 16s. 7d., the amount of interest as aforesaid." Messrs. Rooke & Sons having declined to pay the interest claimed, Mr. Russ wrote to them to return the certificates in order that they might take further proceedings on them; and inclosed in their place a separate receipt for the money which had been paid. Messrs. Rooke & Sons refused to give up the certificates, and the defendant Davis then moved before Mr. Justice Stirling that the plaintiffs be ordered to file, or to attend before the proper officer of the court, and produce to such officer the certificates of the taxing master of the 27th of May, 1887, for the purpose of enabling the defendant Davis to issue a writ of fi. fa., for the interest on the costs thereby certified and due from the plaintiffs to Davis.

The motion came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Stirling on the 18th of November, 1887.

STIRLING, J.† This is an application of a very unusual character. * * * Upon the affidavits there is to a certain extent a conflict of evidence. Possibly, in one view, that conflict may be immaterial, but if there should be further litigation it may be material. It is plain, however, that there was a discussion about the amount to be paid. The solicitor for the plaintiffs insisted upon a reduction of £1 being made in reference to the filing of the certificates—it having been agreed that they should not be filed—and he also insisted that the clerk of the defendant's solicitor should take his check for the reduced amount; and to my mind, as the matter then stood, the meaning of both parties was that if the check should be honored it was to be taken in payment for the bills of cost. That is not in dispute, whatever may be the legal effect of the transaction. The check was honored. It has the indorsement of the defendant's solicitor upon it. Then according to the evidence of that solicitor's clerk he discovered a week or two afterwards that the interest had been omitted to be charged.

† The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

That is an incorrect statement, because when he went to the plaintiffs' solicitors' office he knew that the interest was not included in the amount to be paid. What he did discover was a decision of the Court of Appeal showing that the defendant might claim interest; and hence this motion.

This was a perfectly plain, honest, and honorable transaction upon both sides. In regard to it the plaintiffs have obtained an advantage honorably got, and why should I take it away from them? It is plain that the certificates were not to be filed, and as plain that it was competent to the parties to enter into such an arrangement; if any mistake was made, it was a mistake of law, and therefore, I do not see why the advantage gained should be taken from the plaintiffs. The agreement being clear that the certificates should not be filed, I do not think that I ought to interfere. If there be any other remedy open to the defendant he can pursue it. Possibly that is enough to dispose of the motion. * * *

After the arguments I may be justified in seeing whether the authorities are in favor of the applicant. What was done by the applicant? He accepted, as it appears to me, in full satisfaction of the plaintiffs' liability for costs, the check of their solicitors payable to order, and that check was duly honored. What in law is the effect of that? The state of the law is very peculiar in regard to the acceptance of a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger debt. * * *

Then comes the question here—is a negotiable instrument such a matter as may be “paid and accepted in satisfaction of a debt certain?” The applicant accepted not a negotiable instrument of his debtors, but that of their solicitors. He took the check of different persons. Was that an accord and satisfaction according to the authorities? No doubt the case of Cumber v. Wane, 1 Str. 426; 1 Sm. L. C. 8th ed. p. 357, was one in reference to a promissory note. In Foakes v. Beer, 9 App. Cas. 605,¹⁸⁴ the record of Cumber v. Wane is fully stated at page 619. The decision was that giving a promissory note for £5 cannot be pleaded as a satisfaction for £15, but this has been denied by a series of authorities to be law. Thus in Sibree v. Tripp, 15 M. & W. 23, it was held that a promissory note taken for a less sum than the demand was a good satisfaction—that a negotiable instrument for a smaller sum may be given in satisfaction of a larger debt. Then there is the case of Curlewis v. Clark, 3 Ex. 375, and also that of Goddard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. D. 37, which goes even further than I am required to go in this case. It was contended that these three authorities went upon the view that Cumber v. Wane was bad law, and that this was inconsistent with the decision in Foakes v. Beer. I do not, however, understand the House of Lords to approve of the application made in Cumber v. Wane of the doctrine laid down in Pinnel's

case, 5 Rep. 117a; Co. Litt. 212b. In that case there was a qualification added that if a thing of a different kind be given that is a good satisfaction. That qualification was disregarded in Cumber v. Wayne; and in Foakes v. Beer this circumstance is commented upon by both Earl Selborne and Lord Blackburn. If further authority is required I may refer to the notes of the late Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Keating to the case of Cumber v. Wane in Smith's Leading Cases, where they state the law to be that a demand may be discharged by payment of a thing different from that contracted to be paid though of less pecuniary value, and they give as an instance a negotiable instrument binding the debtor or a third person to pay a smaller sum. Under these circumstances, having regard to the current of authorities, which appear to me to be unaffected by the decision of the House of Lords [in Foakes v. Beer] I hold that the check of a third party given as this check was, was a satisfaction of the debt and was a good payment.¹⁵⁵

¹⁵⁵ In Goddard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. D. 37 (1882), it was held that the debtor's own check for less than the amount of the debt, with a receipt which read that it was to be in settlement of the full amount of the debt on the check being honored, constituted a good accord and satisfaction when the check was duly honored.

In Hirachand Punamchand v. Temple, [1911] 2 K. B. 330, where the father of a debtor sent a draft for less than the amount in full settlement, which was held to discharge the debt, Fletcher Moulton, L. J., said:

"I have grave doubts whether Goddard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. D. 37, was rightly decided, because, when the facts are looked at, it appears that the cheque was there given, not in substitution for the debt, but only as conditional payment of the amount, so that the case really stood on the same footing as payment of a less amount in discharge of a greater. But in the present case we are dealing with the question of the effect of money paid by a third person. In such a case there is no difference between payment of the total amount and payment of a portion of it only, so long as it is paid in settlement of the debt. If a third person steps in and gives a consideration for the discharge of the debtor, it does not matter whether he does it in meal or in malt, or what proportion the amount given bears to the amount of the debt. Here the money was paid by a third person, and I have no doubt that, upon the acceptance of that money by the plaintiffs with the full knowledge of the terms on which it was offered, the debt was absolutely extinguished."

In the United States there is unwillingness to treat a check or unsecured note of the debtor, or the check of a third person who is acting for the debtor in paying, as anything but the money to be collected on it. Hagen v. Townsend, 27 So. Dak. 467 (1911); Jordy v. Maxwell, 62 Fla. 236 (1911); Thayer v. Harbican, 70 Wash. 278 (1912); Weidner v. Standard Life, etc., Co., 130 Wis. 16 (1906).

In Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225 (1872) defendants, sued for a balance of $2,900, set up that when the original $6,400 due was demanded they were wholly unable to pay, and thereupon said plaintiffs duly agreed, to and with said defendants, that, provided these defendants should and did induce their friends to raise and loan to said defendants the sum of $3,500 and would pay the same to said plaintiffs, that said plaintiffs would settle and compromise their alleged demand against said defendants for and upon receiving said sum of $3,500 to be raised as aforesaid, and would leave it entirely to the defendants' honor whether they should, at any time thereafter pay said plaintiffs any further sum or amount; and, thereupon, under and in pursuance of said

FRYE v. HUBBELL, ET AL.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1907. 74 N. H. 358, 68 Atl. 325, 17 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1197.)

Mortgage foreclosure proceedings by Napoleon B. Frye, executor, against Abbie A. Hubbell and W. W. Hubbell. Nonsuit was granted as to defendant W. W. Hubbell, and, from a directed verdict for plaintiff, defendant Abbie A. Hubbell excepted. Exceptions sustained, and new trial granted.

The evidence tended to prove the following facts: December 16, 1879, the defendants, Abbie A. and William W. Hubbell, executed a mortgage of the demanded premises to John M. Wakefield, the plaintiff's testator, to secure their promissory note for $600, signed by Abbie A. as principal and William W. as surety. The premises were then incumbered by a mort-agreement, these defendants at a great sacrifice and trouble did borrow from their said friends the said sum of $3,500, and paid the same to the said plaintiffs on that understanding and agreement. It was held that there was no consideration for the alleged agreement, because in paying the $3,500, the defendants did no more than they were bound to do. Earl, C., said:

"This agreement to thus get the money from their friends was chiefly relied upon by the defendants in their answer and upon the trial as furnishing the new consideration for the compromise. I cannot assent to their claim. The money, when paid, was to belong, and in fact did belong, to the defendants. It was to be paid and was paid as their money. Suppose a debtor agreed to go to work and earn the money, or to dig for it in the earth, would this furnish a new consideration to uphold an agreement of the creditor to take less than his conceded due? In all cases, an embarrassed debtor must make some effort to procure the money to make a compromise, but no case can be found holding that the fact that he had agreed to make such effort, furnishes any consideration to uphold the compromise. The debtor is legally bound to pay, and it is utterly indifferent to the creditor where he gets the means to do it; that is the matter of the debtor, and all his efforts, are expended in simply endeavoring to discharge a legal obligation. Hence the fact that the defendants agreed to induce their friends to loan them the money, and that they did induce them to loan it, furnishes no new consideration to uphold the compromise.

"It matters not that the $3,000 which the defendants received from their friends was in checks, which they handed over to the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs had agreed to receive the notes of a third party, or any specific personal property, in payment and satisfaction of their claim, it would have been fully paid and satisfied, no matter how small the value of the note or property was. But here the agreement as alleged in the answer, and proved, was that the defendants should pay the $3,500 in money, and this they undertook to do in the checks; they were paid and received as money.

"I have, therefore, reached the conclusion, upon the whole case, that the facts as claimed by the defendants, do not constitute a defense to the balance claimed by the plaintiffs, either as constituting payment or an accord and satisfaction."

So agreeing after the maturity of a note to pay it at a different place than that specified in the note is not consideration for the holder's promise to take gage to the Newport Savings Bank, to which the Wakefield mortgage was made subject. The Wakefield note was further secured by a mortgage of real estate in Enfield, which was discharged on November 23, 1893, upon payment to Wakefield of $293.03, that sum being realized from a sale of the premises. The note bore the following indorsement: "29203. Nov. 28, 1893. Received of Abbie A. Hubbell $293.03 from sale of Enfield property as part of the within note." There was evidence that William W. Hubbell made two payments on the note, one of $20, and one of $25; that Abbie A. paid $300 about November 28, 1893; and that Wakefield agreed, at the time of the latter payment, to accept said payments, together with that indorsed on the note, in full satisfaction and payment of the debt.

The court instructed the jury that an agreement on the part of Wakefield to accept the payments in full satisfaction and discharge of the note would be no defense to a suit for the balance, and directed them to return a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount due on the note after applying the payments claimed by the defendants. To this instruction and direction of verdict the defendant Abbie A. excepted.

PARSONS, C. J.¹⁴⁶ * * * The material question raised by the case is the legal soundness of the ruling that the payment and acceptance of a sum less than the amount due in full satisfaction and discharge of the debt is no defense to the collection of the balance.

The rule given the jury has been followed by this court. Page v. Brewster, 54 N. H. 184, 189; Mathewson v. Bank, 45 N. H. 104, 106, 107; Blanchard v. Noyes, 3 N. H. 518. * * * In other jurisdictions the rule is almost universally regarded with disfavor, although followed, and the extension of the exceptions has been carried so far by the discovery of sufficient consideration in trivial and apparently immaterial circumstances that the rule itself might more logically be abandoned, while in two states it has been directly attacked and overruled. Clayton v. Clark, 74 Miss. 499, 21 South. 565, 22 South. 189, 37 L. R. A. 771, 60

a lesser sum in satisfaction. Foster County State Bank v. Lammers, 117 Minn. 94 (1912), where Bunn, J., for the court, said: "Defendants contend that a consideration for plaintiff's agreement is found in the fact that defendants agreed to make the payments in Stillwater, Minn., instead of Carrington, N. D., and that therefore the case falls within a well-established exception to the rule. It is true that an agreement by the debtor, made before the maturity of the note, to pay at a place other than the place specified in the note, or at another time, is deemed a sufficient consideration for an agreement by the creditor to accept a sum less than the whole in full payment. But clearly this consideration is lacking when the note is past due. Before maturity the creditor cannot compel payment at any other time or place than those named in the note, but after maturity he is legally entitled to collect his debt wherever and whenever the debtor is found. The agreement to make the payment at Stillwater was, therefore, no more than defendants were legally bound to do, and was in fact a convenience to defendants, rather than a burden, and a loss to plaintiff, rather than an advantage."

¹⁴⁶ The statement of facts is abbreviated and parts of the opinion are omitted.

Am. St. Rep. 521; Dreyfus v. Roberts, 75 Ark. 354, 87 S. W. 641, 69 L. R. A. 823, 112 Am. St. Rep. 67. In others it has been abrogated, in whole or in part, by legislative action. Wald's Poll. Cont. (3d Ed.) 211, note; 1 Cyc. 322; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 414, 415. In this state of the law it has been thought to be the duty of the court to re-examine the foundations of the rule, rather than to permit the case to be carried by the mere weight of authority here and elsewhere.

Discussion of the question generally starts with Lord Coke, A. D. 1602. In Pinnel's Case, 5 Co. 117, 1 E. R. C. 368, the plaintiff brought an action of debt on a bond for payment of £8 10s. November 11, 1600. The defendant pleaded that before that day, on October 1st, at the request of the plaintiff he paid £5 2s. 2d., which sum the plaintiff accepted in full satisfaction of the debt. "The plaintiff had judgment for the insufficient pleading; for he did not plead that he had paid the £5 2s. 2d., in full satisfaction, as by law he ought, but pleaded the payment of part generally, and that the plaintiff accepted it in full satisfaction." The only point decided in Pinnel's Case was a point of pleading, now obsolete; for it is certain that no court, English or American, would now dispose of Pinnel's Case as it was determined in 1602. If the point of pleading was considered of any moment, the defendant would have leave to amend, and judgment would go according to the right, not the form. But in deciding the case "it was resolved by the whole court that payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction of a greater cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum, but that the gift of a horse, hawk, or robe, etc., in satisfaction, is good; for it shall be intended that a horse, hawk, or robe, etc., might be more beneficial to the plaintiff than the money, in respect of some circumstance, or otherwise the plaintiff would not have accepted of it in satisfaction. But when the whole sum is due, by no intendment the acceptance of parcel can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff; but in the case at bar it was resolved that the payment and acceptance of parcel before the day in satisfaction of the whole would be good satisfaction in regard of circumstance of time, for peradventure parcel of it before the day would be more beneficial to him than the whole at the day, and the value of the satisfaction is not material. So if I am bound in £20 to pay you £10 at Westminster, and you request me to pay you £5 at the day at York, and you will accept it in full satisfaction of the whole £10, it is a good satisfaction for the whole, for the expenses to pay it at York is sufficient satisfaction." While no case has been discovered resting on the point decided in Pinnel's Case, the matters "resolved" by the court have had great influence upon the law, as determined by decided cases which are generally and until recently, in the absence of statutory correction, universally in conformity with the dictum of the resolutions and the further point "adjudged"—that a release by deed without consideration was a good bar. Two things were resolved: (1) That if the creditor accepted in discharge of the debt anything which might be by any possibility of benefit to him, this was a good satisfaction; and (2) "that payment of a lesser sum on the day in satisfaction could not by any possibility be beneficial to the creditor." The latter resolution was in no way involved in the case, and the conclusion was simply dictum. Lord Blackburn, in Foakes v. Beer, 9 App. Cas. 605, 616, 617.

In the dicta of Lord Coke, nothing is said of a want of consideration for the creditor's agreement to accept the less sum in satisfaction of the debt; but in 1804 Lord Ellenborough, in Fitch v. Sutton, 5 East 230, relying upon the authority of Lord Coke in Pinnel's Case, introduced the idea of a want of consideration. "There must be," he says, "some consideration for the relinquishment of the residue, something collateral, to show a possibility of benefit to the party relinquishing his further claim, otherwise the agreement is nudum pactum." This statement of Lord Ellenborough has been followed by the courts, and is the foundation of the extended discussions that are to be found in the books. 12 Harv. Law Rev. 524. Much argument is found on the question whether in the particular case some consideration could be found for the agreement, or, as Lord Ellenborough puts it, some "possibility of benefit" to the creditor. The cases are very numerous. 1 Cyc. 319-322; 1 Ency. L. 415, 428; Notes 100 Am. St. Rep. 428-447; 64 Am. Dec. 138; 20 L. R. A. 785; 1 E. R. C. 368-405; 1 Sm. L. C. *146; Jaffray v. Davis. 124 N. Y. 164, 167, 26 N. E. 351, 11 L. R. A. 710. But the courts, while following the dicta, "have rarely failed, upon any recurrence of the question, to criticise and condemn its reasonableness, justice, fairness, or honesty." Jaffray v. Davis, supra. Alderson, B., in Sibree v. Tripp, 15 M. & W. 23, 38, says, after stating the rule: "The courts might very well have held the contrary, and have left the matter to the agreement of the parties"; while Lord Selborne, in Foakes v. Beer, 9 App. Cas. 605, 613, says: "It might be, and indeed I think it would be, an improvement in our law, if a release or acquittance of the whole debt, on payment of any sum which the creditor might be content to receive by way of accord and satisfaction, though less than the whole, were held to be generally binding, though not under seal." In the same case the history of the rule is given by Lord Blackburn, who, while yielding to the opinion of his associates as to the weight of authority, says (pages 618, 622): "And, notwithstanding the very high authority of Lord Coke, I think it is not the fact that to accept prompt payment of part only of a liquidated demand can never be more beneficial than to insist on payment of the whole. And if it be not the fact, it cannot be apparent to the judges. * * * What principally weighs with me in thinking that Lord Coke made a mistake of fact is my conviction that all men of business, whether merchants or tradesmen, do every day recognize and act on the ground that prompt payment of a part of their demand may be more beneficial to them than it would be to insist on their rights and enforce payment of the whole. Even where the debtor is perfectly solvent, and sure to pay at last, this often is so." "To say that you may receive something which is not money—a chattel, for instance, of inferior value—but that you cannot receive money, is to my mind a very singular state of the law." Grove, J., in Goddard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. Div. 37, 39. In Johnson v. Brannan, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 268, 271, the principle under discussion is termed "the rather unreasonable rule of the old law"; while in Kellogg v. Richards, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 116, 119, it is said to be "technical and not very well supported by reason." Under the rule "the creditor may violate with legal impunity his promise to his debtor however freely and understandingly made. This rule * * * obviously may be urged in violation of good faith." Brooks v. White, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 283, 285, 37 Am. Dec. 95. "The principle of law * * * has been long established and is well settled. Still very little reason can be given for it." Mitchell v. Wheaton, 46 Conn. 315, 33 Am. Rep. 24. The rule is "somewhat harsh, contrary to the apparent intentions of the parties in making a compromise settlement, and not in harmony with the dictates of natural justice." Shaw, C. J., in Langdon v. Langdon, 4 Gray (Mass.) 186, 189.

But despite this criticism the rule has survived, in form at least. It is of course impossible to have examined all the cases; but, so far as such examination has been carried, the number of cases in which the rule has been applied and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, despite the agreement to discharge, is small in comparison with those in which the courts have been able to discover some circumstance, however trifling, which could be construed a technical legal consideration. The rule is not a statute, or even a rule of property. Its validity depends upon its consonance with reason. While the almost universal acceptance of it may commend it to the court with almost irresistible force, still it is open for examination as to whether it was originally sound and whether the weight of the authority upholding it is not diminished or totally overthrown by the exceptions with which the rule cannot logically stand. Before reaching these questions it is to be considered whether, if originally sound, the reason does not fail after the changes of three hundred years—a proposition for the affirmative of which there is authority. "There was a time in the history of the law, when, like everything else of that day, it was a system of metaphysics and logic, and when the case was decided without the slightest regard to its justice, solely on the technical accuracy of the pleadings on the several sides. Defect of form in the plea was defect of right in him who used it. * * * Payment of debt and interest on a bond, the next day after it fell due, was no defense in a court of law; nay, it was no defense to prove payment without an acquittance before the day; nay, if you pleaded and proved a payment, which was accepted in full of the debt, yet you failed unless your plea stated that you paid it in full, as well as that it was accepted in full, or perhaps because you pleaded it as a payment when you ought to have pleaded it as an accord and satisfaction.

* * * It is not a century since it was solemnly decided that if a creditor, finding his debtor in failing circumstances, and being afraid of losing his debt, proposed to give him a discharge in full if he paid half the money, and the debtor borrowed the money and paid the one-half on the day the bond fell due, and got an acquittance in terms as explicit as the English language could afford, yet, if sued, he must pay the rest of the debt, for it was impossible, say the court, payment of part could be a satisfaction of the whole; but, if part was paid before the day, it was a good satisfaction of the whole. * * * It avails little, then, to go back to the last century, or further, to cite cases in which a matter was of validity or effect according as it was couched in this or that form. Universally the law is, or ought to be, that the meaning or intention of the parties is, if it can be distinctly known, to have effect, unless the intention contravenes some well-established principle of law." (Milliken v. Brown, 1 Rawle (Pa.) 391, 397, 398. "The rule that payment of a smaller sum is not a good accord and satisfaction for a larger one * * * was a deduction of strict scholastic logic in the days when money was regarded as having a fixed and unchangeable value. Hence, a part payment of money could never logically be treated, even by agreement, as equivalent to a payment of the whole. In the business methods of the present, it has come to be recognized that money, like other commodities, has fluctuations of value, not only in the general market, but also and more especially to the individual. To a merchant with a note coming due, $5,000 before 3 o'clock to-day, which will save his commercial credit, may well be worth more than $20,000 to-morrow, after his note has gone to protest. * * * The rule was always regarded as more logical than just, and as coming very close to a contradiction of the general rule that the law will not measure the amount or value of the consideration if the parties have agreed upon it." Ebert v. Johns, 206 Pa. 395, 398, 55 Atl. 1064. See Lord Blackburn in Foakes v. Beer, supra. "The absurdity and unreasonableness of the rule seem to be generally conceded, but there also seems to remain a wavering, shadowy belief in the fact, falsely so called, that the agreement to accept, and the actual acceptance of, a lesser sum in the full satisfaction of a larger sum, is without any consideration to support it; that is, that the new agreement confers no benefit upon the creditor. However it may have seemed 300 years ago in England, when trade and commerce had not yet burst their swaddling bands, at this day and in this country, where almost every man is in some way or other engaged in trade or commerce, it is as ridiculous as it is untrue to say that the payment of a lesser part of an originally greater debt, cash in hand, without vexation, cost, or delay, or the hazards of litigation in an effort to collect all, is not often—nay, generally—greatly to the benefit of the creditor." Clayton v. Clark, 74 Miss. 499, 509, 21 South. 565, 22 South. 189, 37 L. R. A. 771, 60 Am. St. Rep. 521. An abandonment of the rule may well be placed on the broadened spirit of the law and upon the fact that the premise upon which it was founded, if true in the seventeenth, is not true in the twentieth century.

In the application of the conclusion of Lord Ellenborough that some possibility of benefit to the creditor would furnish a consideration for the agreement to discharge the balance, the courts have practically in many cases overruled the rule itself, while adhering to it in form. They proceed upon the assumption that the observation of Lord Coke that the acceptance of any chattel in discharge of the debt was a satisfaction because the court could not know the value of the chattel implied that anything except money, though notoriously of less value than the debt, would furnish a consideration for the agreement. Some of the grounds upon which a parol agreement for discharge has been held valid are, as said in a recent case, "interesting and amusing." Dreyfus v. Roberts, supra. Reference to them would only tend to display in a stronger light the disfavor with which the rule has been regarded, which sufficiently appears from the quotations already given. Many cases are discussed in Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164, 26 N. E. 351, 11 L. R. A. 710. Others are to be found in the general works cited supra. But the cases which hold that the furnishing of security by mortgage, pledge, or notes of a third person for a part of the debt is a sufficient consideration for a discharge of the residue are without foundation, unless the payment of money is such a consideration. These cases are numerous. Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164, 26 N. E. 351, 11 L. R. A. 710; Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 390; Kellogg v. Richards, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 116, 119; Boyd v. Hitchcock, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 76, 11 Am. Dec. 247; Brooks v. White, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 283, 37 Am. Dec. 95; Keeler v. Salisbury, 33 N. Y. 648; Sibree v. Tripp, 5 M. & W. 22; Bidder v. Bridges, 37 Ch. Div. 406. The only purpose of security of this sort is to produce money for payment on the debt, and the only benefit to the creditor is that such may be the result. If it is not beneficial to a creditor to receive one-half his debt in cash, it is not beneficial to have such payment secured. A promise cannot be beneficial unless the thing promised is. In Jaffray v. Davis, supra, notes for one-half the debt, secured by a chattel mortgage, were given in discharge of the claim. The discharge was held good, although it appears to be conceded that the payment of one-half in money at the time the notes were given, upon the same agreement, would not constitute a valid discharge. Under the doctrine of this case a one-day note for one-half the debt, secured by the pledge of an equal amount in gold coin, would constitute a valid discharge, while the direct payment of the same amount in gold coin could not. It is undoubtedly true that the creditor may be better off with security for one-half the debt than with the whole claim unsecured. It may be true, as held in Goddard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. Div. 37, that a check from its negotiable character, may be more beneficial to the creditor than a book account for a larger sum; but no security can be more valuable or more negotiable than cash in hand. Scholastic or any other variety of logic which establishes the sign to be more valuable than the thing signified, the shadow superior to the substance, the possession of an order for money more beneficial than the cash that can be obtained upon it, is the logic of unreason. When it is held that something whose only purpose and value lies in its capacity to secure the payment of money is a sufficient consideration for an oral discharge, the rule of Pinnel's Case that the money itself is not such a discharge is logically overturned. The two cannot stand together. To attempt to reconcile them by the suggestion of value in the paper on which the mortgage is written would be as reasonable as to say that the signature of a third party to a note "may be worth something as an autograph." Curlew v. Clark, 3 Exch. 375, 380. It is generally beneficial to a creditor to transform his claim into money. Whether under the circumstances it is more beneficial for him to take part in money, or to retain the claim for the whole, is for him to decide; and no sufficient reason exists in logic or morals why he should be relieved from an agreement understandingly made.

Difficulty has been found in technicalities of the plea of accord and satisfaction. Watson v. Elliott, 57 N. H. 511, 513. But difficulties of pleading are not now insuperable. If the parties have settled and agreed upon a discharge, or the application of something received—money, or anything else—in discharge, it is not material whether the transaction "came under the technical appellation of payment, accord and satisfaction, or release, or under no particular head usually found in the books. * * * And there seems to be no reason why such a discharge or application should not be shown under the general issue, as well as payment, or accord and satisfaction, if it would not come under either of these heads." Curtis v. Egan, 53 N. H. 511. The difficulty, aside from the technicalities of an ancient plea, arises from the familiar common-law principle that a promise without consideration cannot be enforced. The entire foundation of the application of this principle to the question under consideration is the assumption that Lord Coke thought, 300 years ago, that the payment of part of a debt was no consideration for a promise. But Professor Ames has not only demonstrated (12 Harv. Law Rev. 521-523) that this assumption is not warranted by anything said in Pinnel's Case, or the statement in the Commentary on Littleton (212b), often cited to the same point, but cites the explicit language of Coke himself in Bagge v. Slade, 3 Bulst. 162, to the contrary. The foundation of the remarks in Pinnel's Case he suggests to be the statement of Brian, C. J., that "payment of 10 pounds cannot be payment of 20 pounds." Y. B. 10 Hen. VII, f. 4, p. 4. After stating the language of Pinnel's Case quoted above, the article continues: "There is no allusion in any of these remarks of the judges to the consideration for an assumpsit. The word 'consideration,' in its modern sense, was unknown to Brian, and the action of assumpsit was in his day in the embryonic stage. To his mind, whether 10 pounds could be a satisfaction of 20 pounds was a question of simple arithmetic which admitted of only one answer. Ten cannot be 20. The part cannot be the whole. Coke was presumably familiar with Brian's statement. At all events, he reasoned in precisely the same axiomatic way: 'It appears to the judges that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction for a greater.' It is sufficiently obvious from the similarity of the language of Coke and Brian that it never occurred to the former that the resolution in Pinnel's Case was based upon any doctrine of consideration. But fortunately Coke's opinion is not a mere matter of inference. We have his own explicit statement, discriminating in the sharpest way between the operation of part payment as a satisfaction and as a consideration. In Bagge v. Slade [3 Bulst. 162], he said: 'If a man be bound to another by a bill in 1,000 pounds, and he pays unto him 500 pounds in discharge of this bill, the which he accepts of accordingly, and doth upon this assume and promise to deliver up unto him his said bill of 1,000 pounds, this 500 pounds is no satisfaction of the 1,000 pounds, but yet this is good and sufficient to make a good promise and upon a good consideration, because he has paid money 500 pounds, and he hath no remedy for this again.' In 1639 the obligor recovered judgment upon a promise like that in the case put by Coke, the court saying: 'For though legally, after the obligation is forfeited, 30 pounds can be no satisfaction for 60 pounds, yet to have the money in his hands without suit is a good consideration to maintain this action upon the promise.' [Rawlins v. Lockey, 1 Vin. Abr. 308, pl. 24]. Other cases are cited to the same effect. 12 Harv. Law Rev. 523.

As has been seen, the absurdity of the results of the rule relied upon in this case has been commented upon in case after case; but persistence in error under the shadow of a great name still calls that right which is recognized to be wrong. Can the faulty structure stand, now that the foundation stone has been removed? The contention is, that there is no consideration for the promised release or discharge, if less than the full amount of money is paid. In Kidder v. Blake, 45 N. H. 530, 532, Judge Bartlett quotes with approval this definition: "Consideration means something which is of some value in the eye of the law, moving from the plaintiff. It may be some benefit to the defendant [promisor], or some detriment to the plaintiff [promisee]." Stated with greater elaboration, "a valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to the one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other." Currie v. Misa, L. R. 10 Exch. 153, 162; Rector, etc., v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583, 586, 24 N. E. 1014; Wald's Poll. Cont. 167. Professor Langdell says "detriment to the promisee is a universal test of the sufficiency of consideration," and regards benefit to the promisor as "irrelevant to the question whether a given thing can be made the consideration of a promise. Lang. Cont. § 64. Professor Ames, in the article to which reference has been made, approves this simplified definition, but raises the question, what will be understood by detriment? He reaches the conclusion that the term should include every act or forbearance; while the opposite conclusion is that certain acts or forbearances, as matter of law, cannot constitute a detriment—that a person does not in legal contemplation incur any detriment by doing a thing which he was previously bound to do. Lang. Cont. § 84. In the attempt to scientifically apply the rules of abstract logic to all the cases involving the question of consideration since the inception of the action of assumpsit, it is inevitable that numerous cases will be found unexplainable upon any theory deducible from such rules.

Upon the theory that the detriment to the promisee which will furnish a consideration for a promise is any act or forbearance, Foakes v. Beer and the line of cases following its doctrine are exceptions contrary to principle; while whatever rule is adopted as to acts or forbearances that as matter of law cannot constitute a detriment, numerous cases are found which must be recognized as exceptions. It is not necessary to consider further these abstract discussions of the subject. It must be and is conceded that the common definition of consideration, found in the Reports, is, as above stated, in substance, "a detriment incurred by the promisee, or a benefit received by the promisor in exchange for the promise." If any act or forbearance by the promisee is a detriment which will sustain a promise, the sole question is of sustaining an exception in principle and following authority which "originated in misconception, is repugnant alike to judges and men of business, is not applied consistently to all the cases fairly within its scope, has been a source of highly artificial and technical distinctions, has been changed by statute in India and 10 of our states, and is likely to be generally superseded by similar legislation." 12 Harv. Law Rev. 531. Under the other definition of consideration, the doctrine can be upheld only upon the ground that as matter of law payment of a part of a debt before it is due cannot be beneficial to the creditor or a detriment to the debtor. Upon either view we are met merely by an assumption of the judges, which is unfounded in fact. Upon the question whether such payment is or may be beneficial to a creditor, sufficient has already been said. There is nothing new or modern in the proposition that it may be. In Reynolds v. Pinhowe (1595), Cro. Eliz. 429, the court said of a payment to the creditor: "It is a benefit to him to have it without suit or charge." "Payment without suit or trouble of that which is due is a good consideration." Johnson v. Astell (1667), 1 Lev. 198. These and other like expressions, cited 12 Harv. Law Rev. 523, show that the opinions of the modern judges before quoted that payment before it can be compelled may be beneficial to the creditor are not new discoveries. Nor if detriment to the promisee is to be taken as the sole definition of consideration, is the conclusion that the present parting with money is no detriment defensible, judged by the fact and the practice of business men. When the parties have made a contract and agreed on the consideration—the immediate payment of a sum of money—it is the refinement of logic to say that such payment is no detriment, or to say, as does Alderson, B., in Sibree v. Tripp, 15 M. & W. 23, 37, “it is not one bargain but two; namely, payment of part, and an agreement without consideration to give up the residue.” Such a statement is generally untrue. If A. pays B. $50 on a $100 debt, and then requests B. to release him from the residue, there are two contracts if B. agrees, and no consideration for the second; but such is not the transaction in fact when A. pays to-day $50 in consideration of B.’s agreement to discharge the whole debt. But, it is said, A. is legally bound to pay B. the $50, and as A. only does what he is legally bound to do, there is no consideration. But the confusion arises from a failure to distinguish between legal and moral obligations. One may be morally bound to do precisely in terms as he agrees; but he is legally bound to do as a practical proposition, whatever the theory may be, only what he can be compelled by law to do. The common law does not compel men to do as they agree. It gives damages for the failure to perform legal or contractual duties, but except in a few instances only can the specific performance of the contract be enforced. If A. owes B. a promissory note, no form of action is known by which B. can compel A. to pay it when due. If A. does not pay as promised, in an action of assumpsit B. can recover damages because of the breach of A.’s promise. Since the abolition of imprisonment for debt, the law does not take any steps to compel A. to pay the damages. A.’s property, if he has any subject to execution, the law will seize and apply on B.’s damages. So that the most that A., who owes B. a note, can be legally compelled to do, is to suffer his property to be applied to pay B.’s damages. As to permit this is all A. can be compelled to do, it is all he is legally bound to do. The law does not prohibit his breach of his contract, but leaves him free to break it if he chooses, giving the other party the remedy of damages. Chellis v. Grimes, 72 N. H. 104, 106, 54 Atl. 943; Wiggin v. Manchester, 72 N. H. 576, 581, 58 Atl. 522; Cox v. Jones, 73 N. H. 504, 505, 63 Atl. 178.

The damages the law awards for the nonpayment of money is interest, and for the expense of obtaining judgment and execution, costs. If costs always equal the expense of litigation, if interest is always full recompense for delayed payment, and if an execution is always equivalent to money in hand, then a present part payment of a debt in cash is in fact never beneficial to the creditor or detrimental to the debtor, and can never be a consideration for a discharge of the balance. Whatever the conclusions of scholastic logic, as men having some acquaintance with affairs, judges are bound to know that none of these propositions are always, if ever, true; and, as they are not always true, it cannot be matter of law that in a particular case a part payment was not such a benefit to the creditor or detriment to the debtor as to furnish a consideration for the creditor's agreement of discharge. Harriman v. Harriman, 12 Gray (Mass.) 341, decided in 1859, was a suit on a judgment for $140.03 recovered in 1839. The defendant was then poor and unable to pay, and the plaintiff told him if he would raise and pay $20 he would receive the same in full satisfaction of the judgment. The defendant borrowed and collected $20 and paid it to the plaintiff, who accepted it in full settlement and satisfaction of the judgment, and gave the defendant a receipt in full of all demands. If the defendant was poor and unable to pay, it is to be inferred nothing could be collected on the judgment. As a business proposition, the question for the plaintiff would seem to have been whether it was more beneficial for him to accept what the defendant could then raise and pay in discharge of the judgment, or to wait for an increase in the defendant's financial resources. There seems no reason why the plaintiff should not have been permitted to decide this question, or why the receipt of money which the defendant could not then be compelled to pay, and which the plaintiff could not obtain without the defendant's consent, should not constitute a sufficient consideration for the agreement under which the defendant was induced to part with his money. But it was held to be well settled that the discharge was invalid for want of consideration. But it is now held elsewhere that acceptance of part payment from an insolvent or embarrassed debtor in full satisfaction of the claim is founded on a sufficient consideration (Engbretson v. Seiberling, 122 Iowa 522, 98 N. W. 319, 64 L. R. A. 75, 101 Am. St. Rep. 279;¹⁸⁷ Melroy v. Kremmerer, 218 Pa. 381, 67 Atl. 699), and that the abandonment of the right to go into insolvency or to take advantage of the bankrupt law furnishes a sufficient consideration for such a contract. Notes in 100 Am. St. Rep. 441, 442. The reason is clear. In such cases the creditor obtains money that he would not otherwise receive, and the debtor pays money for the dis-

¹⁸⁷ In Engbretson v. Seiberling, the acceptance from an insolvent debtor of part payment in full satisfaction of a claim is held to discharge the debt even though the debtor was not contemplating bankruptcy proceedings. The court gave as a reason that "the rule that an agreement to accept part payment in full satisfaction is without consideration is purely technical and subject to many exceptions which the courts have ingrafted upon it from time to time in order to avoid to some extent the injustice which is recognized as frequently resulting from its strict application." But in the opposing case of Pearson v. Thomason, 15 Ala. 700 (1849), the court insists that "the fact of the defendant's insolvency can have no influence in determining whether the agreement of the plaintiffs to accept a less sum than the entire debt, in full satisfaction, was without consideration; for whether he was insolvent or not, the obligation to pay was not impaired, and the moral duty remained in full force."

And Hackney, J., in Beaver v. Fulp, 136 Ind. 595, 597 (1893) said: "The insolvency of the appellant, of itself, does not establish any loss or inconvenience to the appellant or any benefit to the appellee. The rights of a third person are not involved; there is no agreement on the part of the appellant to waive his right of exemption nor to surrender anything that the law gave him or authorized him to retain."

charge which he could not be compelled to pay. It is difficult to see why money so paid and received is not a benefit, despite the observations of Lord Selborne to the contrary in Foakes v. Beer, 9 App. Cas. 605, 613, 614. It is to be noted that the extension of the exemption from execution in modern times, as well as the abolition of imprisonment for debt, creates a situation in which the debtor, by sacrificing a right which the law gives him, may pay more or less upon a debt when he can legally be compelled to pay nothing.

The law does not measure the adequacy of the consideration upon which the parties have agreed. Wald's Poll. Cont. 193; Lang. Cont. § 55. If a payment which the debtor cannot be compelled to make because of lack of property furnishes a consideration, present payment which he cannot be compelled to make because of lack of judicial machinery to effect such result must be equally efficacious. In the notes to Cumber v. Wane, 1 Stra. 426, 1 Sm. L. C. (7th Am. Ed.) 595, 610, it is doubted "whether the maxim that a smaller sum cannot be a satisfaction of a larger debt could apply to anything but a bond. * * * Technically, it would be very difficult to make it apply to simple contracts. But as a principle of evidence, this rule, which requires for the substantiation of such agreements either a surrender of the instrument or a legal release, is a just, wise, and, convenient rule, so great is the danger of fraud and mistake." This might have been a sound reason for a rule of evidence applying in all cases of discharge claimed by anything but full performance. But a payment of less before the day, or in another place at the day, or by a chattel, is not a discharge unless so agreed, and the necessity of the rule of evidence is as strong in the one case as in the other. No such rule has been applied, nor does it appear to have been attempted to support the maxim on this ground in the adjudged cases. The whole matter resolves itself into one of statement. If A. holds B.'s note for $100, there is no reason in law or morals why he may not sell it to C. for $50, or to B. An agreement by A. to sell to B. B.'s note for any sum less than there is due upon it is open to no objection arising from the intricacies of the plea of accord and satisfaction, or of any theory of consideration. Lang. Cont. § 88.

The facts in the present case are not fully reported, but enough appears to justify the suspicion that the case may be within some of the exceptions. It is at least fairly inferable that the defendant was insolvent and had no other property except that covered by the plaintiff's mortgage, upon which another mortgage had precedence. Wakefield could recover nothing out of the property without paying the first mortgage. The defendant was under no obligation to sell or assent to a sale of the Enfield property, and if her consent to such sale was part of the agreement, there was a sufficient consideration under all the cases. Wakefield could have sold his second mortgage to the defendant for such sum as he saw fit, and the fact that the sum paid would not have equaled the amount due on the mortgage would not have invalidated the contract. Wakefield lived some six years after these transactions. There is no suggestion that he had any purpose except to be bound by the contract. His executor brings the suit, and the contention is that because the parties regarded the transaction as payment or discharge instead of a sale, or because Wakefield neglected to deliver the note to the defendant, as it has been suggested in argument he agreed to do (Draper v. Hitt, 43 Vt. 439, 5 Am. Rep. 292), the law requires the plain purpose of the parties to be defeated, not because of any immorality in the transaction or lack of power in the parties to make the agreement, but because the words they used to describe what they did imply that it was impossible for them to do what they in fact did. No better guide for the determination of the rights of the parties in a contract can be discovered than their purpose and intention in making it. That having been ascertained, a sufficient reason for defeating such purpose is not found in the misinterpretation and misunderstanding of the language of a great jurist of the seventeenth century, however long continued. The rule that the payment of a less sum can never sustain an agreement to discharge a greater, because without consideration, however well supported by the authorities, is contrary to the fact at the present time, whatever the fact was when the rule originated, is based upon misconception, is not founded in reason, and cannot be followed without abandoning the greater principle that reason is the life of the law. In the words of the court in Clayton v. Clark, 74 Miss. 499, 510, 21 South, 565, 569, 22 South. 189, 37 L. R. A. 771, 60 Am. St. Rep. 521: "A rule of law which declares that under no circumstances, however, favorable and beneficial to the creditor, or however hard and full of sacrifice to the debtor, can the payment of a less sum of money at the time and place stipulated in the original obligation, or afterward, for a greater sum, though accepted by the creditor in full satisfaction of the whole debt, ever amount in law to satisfaction of the original debt, is absurd, irrational, unsupported by reason, and not founded in authority, as has been declared by courts of the highest respectability and of last resort, even when yielding reluctant assent to it. We decline to adopt or to follow it."

While there was authority for the instruction finally given the jury, the discussion establishes that the instruction given and the direction of a verdict were erroneous. The verdict is set aside, and a new trial granted.

¹⁴⁸ In Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164, (1891) Potter, J., collected the cases to show "the extreme ingenuity and assiduity which the courts have exercised to avoid the operation of the 'rigid and rather unreasonable rule of the old law' as it is characterized in Johnston v. Brannan (5 Johns. 268-272), or as it is called in Kellogg v. Richards (14 Wend. 116), 'technical and not very well supported by reason,' or, as may be more practically stated, a rule that 'a bar of gold worth $100 will discharge a debt of $500, while 400 gold dollars in current coin will not.'"

TANNER v. MERRILL.

Assumpsit for work and labor performed.

HOOKE, J.¹⁵⁰ The defendants appeal from a judgment recovered against them at circuit. They are lumbermen, and the plaintiff worked for them at Georgian Bay, his transportation from Saginaw to that place having been paid by them. When he quit work, a question arose as to who should pay this, under the contract of employment, and defendants' superintendent declined to pay any transportation. The plaintiff needed the money due him to get home, and showed a telegram announcing the illness or death of his mother, and said that he must go home, to which the superintendent replied that "he did not pay any man's fare;" whereupon a receipt in full was signed, and the money due, after deducting transportation, was paid. The plaintiff testified that they had no dispute, only he claimed the fare and the superintendent refused to allow it. * * *

The question resolves itself into this: Whether a receipt in full is conclusive of the question of defendant's liability, when it is given upon payment of a portion of a claim admittedly due, accompanied by a refusal to pay more, in the absence of mistake, fraud, duress, or undue influence.

It is urged upon behalf of the plaintiff that receipts are always open to explanation, and that there is no consideration to support the acceptance of a portion of a valid claim as full payment. The cases which counsel cite do not support the broad contention of plaintiff's counsel, which would seriously derange business affairs if it should be sustained. The doctrine that the receipt of part payment must rest upon a valid consideration to be effective in discharge of the entire debt is carefully limited to cases where the debt is liquidated, by agreement of the parties or otherwise, which was not the case here. It was in dispute. * * * In Hayes v. Insurance Co., 125 Ill. 639, the court apply the doctrine relied upon, but expressly state that "this rule has no application where property other than money is taken in satisfaction, or where there is an honest compromise of unliquidated or disputed demands." * * * In Marion v. Heimbach, 62 Minn. 215, the court say: "But where the claim is unliquidated, it would seem to be true that if the creditor is tendered a sum less than his claim, upon the condition that, if it is accepted, it must be in full satisfaction of his whole claim, his acceptance is an accord and satisfaction." See also Fuller v. Kemp, 138 N. Y. 231, where the same doctrine is held; Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 577.

The important fact to ascertain is whether the plaintiff's claim was a liquidated claim or not. If it was, there was no consideration for the discharge. If not, the authorities are in substantial accord that part payment of the claim may discharge the debt, if it is so received. Upon the undisputed facts, the claim of the plaintiff, as made, was not liquidated. It was not even admitted, but, on the contrary, was denied, because the defendants claimed that it had been partially paid by a valid offset. While the controversy was over the offset, it is plain that the amount due the plaintiff was in dispute. If so, it is difficult to understand how it could be treated as a liquidated claim, unless it is to be said that a claim may be liquidated piecemeal, and that, so far as the items are agreed upon, it is liquidated, and to that extent is not subject to adjustment on a basis of part payment. Cases are not numerous in which just this phase of the question appears. This would seem remarkable, unless we are to assume that, in calling a claim unliquidated, the courts have alluded to the whole claim, and have considered that, where the amount is not agreed upon, the claim as a whole is unliquidated, and therefore subject to adjustment. If this is not true, no man can pay an amount that he admits to be due without being subject to action whenever and so often as his creditor may choose to claim that he was not fully paid, no matter how solemn may have been his acknowledgment of satisfaction, so long as it is not a release under seal. * * *

It is believed that we may safely treat this claim as one claim, not as two, and as unliquidated, inasmuch as it was not admitted. * * * In Potter v. Douglass, 44 Conn. 541, plaintiff refused $45, which was tendered in full payment of a claim. He took it, however, on account, as he said, and wrote a receipt to that effect, which defendant refused, for the reason that it stated that the money was received on account. The plaintiff, however, kept the money. It does not appear that this amount of $45 was disputed. Apparently, it was not. Yet the court called the claim an unliquidated demand, and held it to have been discharged. In Perkins v. Headley, 49 Mo. App. 562, it is said: "But if there is a controversy between him [the creditor] and his debtor as to the amount which is due, and if the debtor tenders the amount which he claims to be due, but tenders it on the condition that the creditor accept it in discharge of his whole demand, and the creditor does accept it, that will be an accord and satisfaction as a conclusion of law." * * *

It therefore appears that such settlements should have weight, and it seems reasonable to hold that the rule contended for does not apply, for the reason that this was an unliquidated demand, although a certain portion of it was not questioned. * * *

Upon the plaintiff's own testimony, he accepted the money with the knowledge that the defendants claimed that the amount paid was all that was his due, and gave a receipt in full. There is nothing in the case to negative the inference naturally to be drawn from this testimony that there was an accord and satisfaction of an unliquidated demand.

The judgment must be reversed.¹⁰⁰

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). I think that the payment of an admitted indebtedness is no consideration for a discharge of a further claim by the creditor.

DEMEULES v. JEWEL TEA CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1908. 103 Minn. 150, 114 N. W. 733, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 954, 123 Am. St. Rep. 315.)

Action by Joe Demeules against the Jewel Tea Company to recover a balance of $83.66 of a deposit of $150 made by plaintiff to secure the ¹⁰⁰ "Nor do the adjudicated cases support the dictum in the former opinion [Price v. Treat, 29 Neb. 536] to the effect that where only the amount admitted to be due is paid, so far the claim is within the rule as one liquidated or not disputed, notwithstanding the plaintiff claims a greater amount. In many of the cases cited the amount tendered was precisely the sum admitted to be due. If a consideration is in such case necessary, it may be found in the fact that the payee receives immediate payment of so much as is paid, without the expense, delay or labor of an accounting, in or out of court, and avoids thereby threatened litigation, which, we think, is always considered a valuable consideration." Irvine, C., in Treat v. Price, 47 Neb. 875, 883-84 (1896).

For a disputed sum to be unliquidated so as to make payment of a lesser sum than is due consideration for acceptance in full, the dispute must be bona fide.

"True it is, as pointed out in Fire Ins. Assn. v. Wickham, 141 U. S. 564, it must appear that the alleged dispute really existed and did not arise merely from an arbitrary denial by one party of an obligation which was obviously due." White, J., in City of San Juan v. St. John's Gas Co., 195 U. S. 510, 522 (1904).

There is no discharge where the debtor who marked the check "in full to date" was mistaken in thinking no more was due. Canadian Fish Co. v. McShane, 80 Neb. 551 (1908).

"An accord and satisfaction requires a new agreement and the performance thereof. Jaffray v. Davis, 124 N. Y. 164. It must be an executed contract founded upon a new consideration, although an agreement to accept an independent executory contract has been held sufficient. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574; Morehouse v. Second National Bank, 98 N. Y. 503; 2 Parsons on Contracts (7th ed.), 817, 820. If the claim is liquidated, the mere acceptance of a part, with the promise to discharge the whole, is not enough, for there is no new consideration. Ryan v. Ward, 48 N. Y. 204. If the claim is unliquidated, the acceptance of a part and an agreement to cancel the entire debt, furnishes a new consideration which is found in the compromise. A demand is not liquidated even if it appears that something is due, unless it appears how much is due, and when it is admitted that one of two specific sums is due, but there is a genuine dispute as to which is the proper amount, the demand is regarded as unliquidated, within the meaning of that term as applied to the subject of accord and satisfaction." Vann, J., in Nassofy v. Tomlinson, 148 N. Y. 326, 330 (1896). And see Ostrander v. Scott, 161 Ill. 339 (1896).

faithful performance of his duties as salesman and collector for the defendant. The defendant had sent a check for $66.34, claiming to retain the rest as owing it. Findings for plaintiff. From an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

ELLIOTT, J.¹⁶¹ * * * 1. The check for $66.34, which was accepted and retained by Demeules, contained the following recital: "Return in full of $150.00 cash bond deposited, and falsified balance $83.66; amount of this check, $66.34; total, $150.00." The appellant claims that the acceptance of this check with the indorsement thereon constituted an accord and satisfaction. But the evidence shows that there was no consideration for such an agreement, such as is necessary under all the authorities. Duluth Chamber of Commerce v. Knowlton, 42 Minn. 229, 44 N. W. 2; Marion v. Heimbach, 62 Minn. 214, 64 N. W. 386; Ness v. Minn. & Col. Co., 87 Minn. 413, 92 N. W. 333; Byrnes v. Byrnes, 92 Minn. 73, 75, 99 N. W. 426; Hoidale v. Wood, 93 Minn. 190, 100 N. W. 1100, and cases cited in 1 Cyc. 311. Demeules, at the time the check was sent, claimed that the company owed him $150. The company claimed that it owed but $66.34. The claim was not unliquidated in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The company paid, and Demeules accepted and applied, only what the company conceded that it owed. It therefore suffered no detriment by paying that amount. It yielded nothing, and Demeules received nothing, more than the company conceded was his due. If it while conceding that it owed $66.34 only, had paid any greater sum whatever, it would have suffered a detriment by to that extent yielding its claim. There would then have been a consideration for the respondent's agreement to accept less than he claimed was due him. As said in Ness v. Minn. & Col. Co., supra: "There can be no accord and satisfaction of a disputed claim, unless something of legal value has been received in full payment thereof to which the creditor had no prior right." The company admitted that Demeules had the prior right to the $66.34 which it paid him. He therefore merely received and obtained money to which he was entitled, and this does not amount to an accord and satisfaction. Marion v. Heimbach, 62 Minn. 214, 64 N. W. 386. There are cases in other states which sustain the appellant's position; but after giving them careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the principle upon which they rest is inconsistent with the prior decisions of this court. * * *

The orders of the trial court are therefore affirmed.¹⁶²

MCKENZIE, ET AL. v. HARRISON, ET AL.

(Court of Appeals of New York, Second Division, 1890. 120 N. Y. 260, 24 N. E. 458, 8 L. R. A. 257, 17 Am. St. Rep. 638.)

Appeal from a judgment of the general term of the Supreme Court, first department, overruling exceptions ordered to be heard in that court in the first instance, and directing judgment to be entered upon the verdict directed by the court.

HAIGHT, J.* This action was brought to recover the amount of rent alleged to be due and unpaid upon a lease of real estate in the city of New York. It appears that the parties had made and executed a lease under seal whereby the plaintiffs leased to the defendants the store and premises known as "No. 16 Fourth Street," for the term of 10 years from May 1, 1877, for the annual rental of $4,500, payable quarterly. Upon the trial the defendants offered to prove, in substance, that after they had occupied the premises for one year under the lease, and paid the rent in full for that year, they reported to the plaintiffs that their business was very dull, and that they could not afford to pay so much rent; that thereupon the plaintiffs agreed to reduce the rent $1,000 per year, making $3,500 a year, or $875 for each quarter; that thereafter the defendants, at the end of each quarter, paid the plaintiffs $875, and the plaintiffs executed and delivered to them a receipt for that amount, in full for balance of rent due at that date as per agreement, "until times are better;" that this continued for three years, after which the plaintiffs notified the defendants that thereafter they wished them to pay the amount of rent originally provided for by the lease, and that thereafter the full amount of rent was paid until the commencement of this action, in December, 1886. This evidence was excluded by the trial court, and a verdict ordered for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed. * * *

We shall not question the rule that a contract or covenant under seal cannot be modified by a parol unexecuted contract. Coe v. Hobby, supra; Smith v. Kerr, 33 Hun 567-571, 108 N. Y. 31, 15 N. E. Rep. 70. Neither shall we question the views of the court below to the effect that the alleged oral agreement in this case to reduce the rent $1,000 per year was void and inoperative in so far as it remained unexecuted. The lessors had the right to repudiate it at any time, and demand the full amount of rent provided for by the lease; but, in so far as the oral agreement had become executed, as to the payments which had fallen due and had been paid and accepted in full as per the oral agreement, we think the rule invoked has no application. The reason of the rule was founded upon public policy. It was not regarded as safe or prudent to permit the contract of parties which had been carefully reduced to writing, and executed under seal, to be modified or changed by the testimony of witnesses as to the parol statements or agreements of parties. Hence the rule that testimony of parol agreements shall not be competent as evidence to impeach, vary, or modify written agreements or covenants under seal. But the parties may waive this rule, and carry out and perform the agreements under seal, as changed or modified by the parol agreement, thus executing both agreements; and where this has been done, and the parties have settled with a full knowledge of the facts and in the absence of fraud, there is no power to revoke or remedy reserved to either party. Munroe v. Perkins, 9 Pick. 298; Lattimore v. Harsen, 14 Johns. 330; McCreery v. Day, 23 N. E. Rep. 198. So, in this case, if, as is claimed, the parol agreement was made to reduce the rent $1,000 per year, and that agreement has been carried out and fully executed by the parties, and at the end of each quarter, when the rent by the terms of the lease became due and payable, the reduced sum, as agreed upon by the parol agreement, was paid, and the parties settled upon that basis, and, as evidence of such settlement, the plaintiffs gave a receipt in full for the amount of rent due to that date, it became executed, and the plaintiffs cannot revoke the same, or maintain this action to recover any greater sum than that settled for. * * *

It may be claimed that the payment of a less sum than the admitted debt is not a good accord and satisfaction. There are numerous authorities sustaining this doctrine. Lord Coke stated the rule to be that, where the condition is for the payment of a definite, fixed, liquidated sum, the obligor cannot at the time appointed pay a less sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that the lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater. This rule has been criticised as unsound and unjust in cases where the lesser sum is accepted in full satisfaction of the greater, (see Co. Litt. 212b; Foakes v. Beer, 9 L. R. App. Cas. 605-617; Jaffray v. Davis, 1 N. Y. Supp. 814;) while, in other cases, the courts have gone still further, and held that the rule applied even in cases where the payment was accepted in full satisfaction, and a receipt given therefor (Harriman v. Harriman, 12 Gray 341; Smith v. Phillips, 77 Va. 548; Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225; Wilkinson v. Byers, Langd. Cas. Cont. 197-201.) Under the view taken by us of this case, it does not become necessary to approve or disapprove of the doctrine promulgated in these cases, for this rule has no application when the payment is made under an agreement which is recognized as valid by the parties, and has been fully executed.¹⁶⁸

Again, a debt could be discharged at common law by executing a formal release under seal. The seal imported a consideration, and this has not been questioned by any of the cases. There undoubtedly is a distinction between releases under seal and an ordinary receipt given on the payment of a sum of money which is not under seal, the latter being subject to explanation and proof showing that it was given without consideration. But, even though there may not be an accord and satisfaction, there may be a gift, and the receipt may be evidence of such gift. A gift is a voluntary transfer of any property or thing by one to another without consideration. To be valid, it must be executed. There must be a delivery by the donor such as will place the property or thing given under the control of the donee, and there must be an intent to vest the title in him. Actual and personal delivery by the donor is not always necessary, for, when another person is the custodian, an order of the donor to deliver to the donee may constitute a gift. It may be oral or in writing. No formal words or expressions are required. It is a question of intent, and the inquiry is as to what was intended by that which was said and done. A promissory note or other evidence of debt may be the subject of a gift, and the delivery of the note or of the evidence of debt is evidence tending to show an intent to give. A debt may be forgiven, and a receipt in full may be evidence of such forgiveness. 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. §§ 68-90. See, also, Bish. Cont. § 50.

In the case of Gray v. Barton, 55 N. Y. 68, the defendant was owing the plaintiff the sum of $820. The plaintiff told him that if he would give him one dollar to make it lawful he would give him the entire debt. Whereupon the defendant delivered one dollar to the plaintiff, who there-the prices. Some courts hold that a party is not bound to perform his contract, but may break it at will, and pay damages; and that, having broken it, if he consents to perform on terms more favorable to himself, he is doing that which he is not legally bound to do, and so there is a sufficient consideration for the other party's assent to those terms. Other courts hold that a party is bound to perform his contract, and consequently that there is no consideration for the other party's assent to those terms unless there is a valid discharge of the original contract. Harriman, Cont. 70. But however this may be while the modified contract remains executory, when it is performed by the party in whose favor it was modified, it becomes binding on both parties, and the original contract is thereby discharged, unless it appears that such was not the intention of the parties. Rogers v. Rogers, 139 Mass. 440, 1 N. E. 122; Lawrence v. Davey, 28 Vt. 264. It is said in Thurston v. Ludwig, 6 Ohio St. 1, 67 Am. Dec. 328, that there is a class of cases that a written contract may be altered by mere verbal agreement of the parties, which, at its inception, would have no binding force, but when acted upon by the parties till it would work a fraud or an injury to refuse to carry it out would become binding and effective as a contract. Even a contract under seal may be discharged by the performance of a subsequent parol agreement. * * * In the case at bar the new agreement has been acted upon by the parties and fully performed by the defendant, and the original agreement cannot now be enforced without injustice to the defendant."

upon executed and delivered a receipt therefor in full to balance all accounts to date, of whatever name and nature. It was held that the executing and delivery of the receipt in full, with the purpose of giving the debt, was such an act that the law would construe the instrument, if necessary, as an assignment to the defendant. This case is in point, and is controlling upon the question under consideration. See Ferry v. Stephens, 66 N. Y. 321; Carpenter v. Soule, 88 N. Y. 251-256.

We are therefore of the opinion that the proof offered should have been received, that from it the jury might have found that the plaintiffs gave to the defendant the balance of the rent for which this action was brought. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.¹⁰⁴

RAGGOW v. SCOUGALL AND CO.

In August, 1913, the plaintiff by an agreement in writing agreed to become the defendants' designer for two years at a certain salary. It was provided that if the business should be discontinued during the period the agreement should cease to be of any effect.¹⁰⁵ When the war broke out many customers cancelled orders which they had given to the firm, and the defendants had to consider whether they should close the business altogether. They called their employees together, and most of them agreed to a reduction of wages during the war if the defendants would continue the business. The plaintiff entered into a new agreement in writing, in which he, like other employees of the firm, agreed to accept a smaller salary for the duration of the war, provided that when the war was over the terms of the old agreement should be revived. He went ¹⁰⁵ "It is elementary that a promise to do or not to do something which would work a detriment to the promisor, or a benefit to the promisee, is a sufficient consideration to support a contract. That a promise is dependent upon a condition does not affect its validity, if it was a condition contemplated by the parties and which might reasonably occur. 9 Cyc. 327, and authorities there cited, among which is Rose v. Ry. Co., 31 Tex. 49. Nor does it matter that the occasion for the fulfilment of the promise has not yet arisen. It is the promise, binding in law, and not in its fulfilment which constitutes the consideration." Jenkins, J., in Burt v. Dearson, (Tex. Civ. App.) 227 S. W. 354, 356-7 (1921).

"When a man acts in consideration of a conditional promise, if he gets the promise he gets all that he is entitled to by his act, and if, as events turn out, the condition is not satisfied, and the promise calls for no performance, there is no failure of consideration." Holmes, J., in Gutlon v. Marcus, 165 Mass. 335, 336 (1896).

on with his work, and accepted the new salary until February last, when the defendants received a solicitors' letter claiming payment in full at the rate fixed in the old agreement; and as they refused to pay the excess this action was brought.

In the court below judgment was given for the plaintiff on the ground that no consideration had been shown for the new agreement to accept a reduced payment.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said the appeal must be allowed. It was clear from the provision in the new agreement that the terms of the old one should be revived when the war came to an end, and that until the war ended the old agreement was dead. The parties had in fact torn up the old agreement and made a new one by mutual consent. They could have done it by recitals setting out the existence and rescission of the old agreement, but they had adopted a shorter course. The new agreement was an agreement contemplating employment on certain terms while the war lasted, and on certain other terms, which could be ascertained by reference to the older document, after the war had ended. The point, therefore, as to want of consideration failed and the appeal succeeded. He was the more glad to be able to arrive at this conclusion on the law, for it was evident that the plaintiff was trying to do a very dishonest thing.

MR. JUSTICE COLERIDGE agreed.

*Appeal allowed.*¹⁰⁶

Zollmann Produce Co.*, 220 S. W. 911, loc. cit. 915. The party suing on such contract must declare upon it as modified.

"It has been repeatedly held by each one of the courts of appeals in this state that an agreement made in substitution of an executory contract of prior date annuls the former contract and is itself a sufficient consideration for a release of its obligations. Carman v. Harrah, 183 Mo. App. loc. cit. 376, 377, 170 S. W. 388; Smith v. Crane, 169 Mo. App. loc. cit. 708, 154 S. W. 857; Welch v. Mischke, 154 Mo. App. loc. cit. 735, 136 S. W. 36; Cannon-Weiner Co v. Boswell, 117 Mo. App. loc. cit. 476, 477, 93 S. W. 355; Mulliken v. Haseltine et al., 160 Mo. App. loc. cit. 13, 141 S. W. 712; Pressed Brick Co. v. Barr, 76 Mo. App. loc. cit. 386; Pottery Co. v. Folckemer, 131 Mo. App. 105, 110 S. W. 598. While the rule is thus stated broadly, the substituted arrangement must contain a change of the obligation of each party in order to constitute a consideration. If the obligation of one party only is affected by the new arrangement, and the other party receives nothing additional and is relieved of no duty, then there is a want of consideration. *Koslosky v. H. L. BENSON v. L. PHIPPS.

(Supreme Court of Texas, 1895. 37 Tex. 578, 29 S. W. 1061, 47 Am. St. Rep. 128.)

GAINES, Chief Justice. The plaintiff was a surety for one Hosack, the principal maker upon a promissory note payable to the defendant in error. Some days after the note fell due, Hosack wrote defendant in error requesting an extension, to which request defendant replied by letter as follows: "I will extend the time of payment one year, and look with confidence for the accrued interest within sixty days, hoping it will not inconvenience you. After that, if it is your pleasure to make the interest on the extension payable semi-annually, it will help me."

The defendant in error testified to having received the letter from Hosack requesting an extension, and that the foregoing was his reply, but the contents of Hosack's communication were not otherwise shown. He also testified, that he was paid nothing for the extension, and that Hosack never paid the accrued interest.

Suit having been brought on the note by the payee against all the makers, the plaintiff in error pleaded his suretyship; and the facts as stated above having been proved, the trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff in that court. That judgment upon appeal was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals.

It is the right of the surety at any time after the maturity of the debt to pay it and to proceed against the principal for indemnity. This right is impaired if the creditor enter into a valid contract with the principal for an extension of the time of payment. The obligation of the surety is strictly limited to the terms of his contract, and any valid agreement between the creditor and the principal by which his position is changed for the worse, discharges his liability. For this reason it is universally held, that a contract between the two, which is binding in law, by which the principal secures an extension of time, releases the surety, provided the surety has not become privy to the transaction by consenting thereto. If the creditor is not bound by his promise to extend, it is clear there is no release. In order to hold him bound by his promise, there must be a consideration. Whether a mere agreement for an extension by the debtor is sufficient to support a promise to extend by the creditor, is a question upon which the authorities are not in accord. We are of opinion, however, that the question should be resolved in the affirmative, at least in cases in which it is contemplated by the contract that the debt should bear interest during the time for which it is extended. If the new agreement was that the debtor should pay at the end of the period agreed upon for the extension precisely the same sum which was due at the time the agreement was entered into, the case might be different. But a promise to do what one is not bound to do, or to forbear what one is not bound to forbear is a good consideration for a contract. In case of a debt which bears interest either by convention or by operation of law, when an extension for a definite period is agreed upon by the parties thereto, the contract is, that the creditor will forbear suit during the time of the extension, and the debtor foregoes his right to pay the debt before the end of that time. The latter secures the benefit of the forbearance; the former secures an interest-bearing investment for a definite period of time. One gives up his right to sue for a period in consideration of a promise to pay interest during the whole of the time; the other relinquishes his right to pay during the same period, in consideration of the promise of forbearance. To the question, why this is not a contract, we think no satisfactory answer can be given. It seems to us it would be a binding contract, even if the agreement was that the debt should be extended at a reduced rate of interest. That an agreement by the debtor and creditor for an extension for a definite time, the debt to bear interest at the same rate or at an increased but not usurious rate, is binding upon both, is held in many cases, some of which we here cite: Wood v. Newkirk, 15 Ohio St. 295; Fowler v. Brooks, 13 N. H. 240; Davis v. Lane, 10 N. H. 156; Stallings v. Johnson, 27 Ga. 564; Robinson v. Miller, 2 Bush (Ky.) 179; Reynolds v. Barnard, 36 Ill. App. 218; Chute v. Pattee, 37 Me. 102; Rees v. Barrington, 2 Ves. 540; see also Crossman v. Wohlleben, 90 Ill. 537; McComb v. Kittredge, 14 Ohio 348.

In many cases which seemingly support the contrary doctrine, there was a mere promise by the creditor to forbear, without any corresponding promise on part of the debtor not to pay during the time of the promised forbearance. In such cases, it is clear that there is no consideration for the promise. In others, where there was a mutual agreement for the extension, it may be that interest during the period of extension was not allowed by law, and the agreement did not provide for the payment of interest. The case of McLemore v. Powell, 13 Wheaton 554, may have been of that character.

In this case, as we construe the correspondence between Hosack and the defendant in error, there was a request for an extension of the debt for twelve months on part of the former, and an unconditional acceptance on the part of the latter. We infer, that Hosack must have written something about the payment of accrued interest—probably that he hoped to be able to pay it in sixty days. The presumption is, that the letter was in the possession of the defendant in error at the time of the trial. He did not produce it. In any event, he should have known its contents, and if Hosack made his request for an extension conditional upon his payment of the accrued interest, he should have testified to the fact. We conclude, therefore, that there was a binding promise for an extension, and that the plaintiff in error was therefore released.

There is error in the judgment, for which it must be reversed; and since it may be shown upon another trial that Hosack's offer contained a condition that would pay the interest in sixty days, the cause is remanded.

*Reversed and remanded.*¹⁶⁷

THE AUSTIN REAL ESTATE AND ABSTRACT COMPANY v.
G. A. BAHN.

(Supreme Court of Texas, 1895. 87 Tex. 582, 29 S. W. 646, 30 S. W. 430.)

On motion for rehearing.

GAINES, Chief Justice. This is a motion for rehearing of an application, based upon the ground that our ruling in this case is in conflict with that made in the case of Benson v. Phipps, recently decided in this court.

When the application now before us was filed, it was considered that it probably involved the same question which was raised in Benson v. Phipps, and upon which a writ of error had been granted. Action upon the application was accordingly suspended until that case was decided; and then it was discovered, that although the question of the validity of a promise for an extension of a contract of indebtedness was involved in each case, the two were clearly distinguishable. In this case, with reference to this question, the trial court found the facts as follows: "That a few days after the note sued on became due, and just before it was assigned to the plaintiff, N. E. Fain presented same to the defendant for payment, when said Stacy, as president of defendant company, requested that an extension of one week from that date be given on said note, and that the same be not placed in the hands of attorney for collection until one week; and agreed, if this was done, that he would pay the note within that time, etc. Here the creditor agrees to extend for one week, and the debtor agrees to pay within the week. He does not agree that he will not pay until the end of the week, or that in case he does pay, he will pay interest for the entire period of the extension. Hence there was no consideration for the promise of the creditor. In Benson v. Phipps, the principal maker of the note and the payee agree upon an extension for twelve months; from which the promise was implied on part of the former not to sue, and upon the latter not to pay within the stipulated time. The promise of the debtor to forego his right to pay at any time after the note was originally due, secured to the creditor the absolute right to receive the interest for the entire time of the extension, and constituted the consideration for the creditor's promise.

"As a general rule the time for the performance of a written agreement may be extended by parol, and an extension of such written agreement may be shown when supported by some new and sufficient consideration." Cardwell, J., in Cummins v. Beavers, 103 Va. 230, 238 (1904).

In the case before us, it was the right of the company to pay at any time, notwithstanding Fain's promise, and hence there was no consideration to support that promise.

The motion for a rehearing is overruled.

ALLEN v. HARRIS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1696. 1 Ld. Raym. 122.)

Trover for a waistcoat. The defendant pleads, that the plaintiff, in consideration that the defendant at the special instance of the plaintiff assumed to pay to the plaintiff 20s. agreed to discharge the defendant of this trover, etc., and lays mutual promises to perform, etc. The plaintiff demurs.

Girdler, for the defendant.

The old rule was, that an accord and satisfaction ought to be pleaded executed, that the plaintiff might be sure of something for his damages; but an arbitrement may be pleaded without performance, because the parties may have reciprocal remedies. Then it being now settled, that the parties may have actions upon mutual promises, this accord may be pleaded, though not executed, because each party may have his remedy. 2 Jones, 158; Raym. 450; Case v. Barber, 2 Jones 168; Wickham v. Taylor. Sed non allocatur. For, per curiam, if arbitrement be pleaded with mutual promises to perform it, though the party has not performed his part, who brings the action, yet he shall maintain his action; because an arbitrement is like a judgment, and the party may have his remedy upon it. But upon accord no remedy lies. And the books are so numerous, that an accord ought to be executed, that it is now impossible to overthrow all the books. But if it had been a new point, it might be worthy of consideration. Judgment for the plaintiff. See 15 Hen. 6; Accord 1; 3 Cro. 304; Balston v. Baxter, Hil. 7 Edw. 4, p. 6; Stile, 245, 252.

CROWTHER, ET AL., v. FARRER.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1850. 15 Q. B. 677.)

ASSUMPSIT. The declaration stated that at the time of the making of the promise two actions, one in trover and the other in trespass, both at the suit of the present plaintiffs against the present defendant, were pending in the Queen's Bench; and thereupon it was agreed by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant in manner following, that is to say: that the said actions should be settled, and all proceedings therein stayed, and that the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs £40 in respect of the costs of the said two actions, and also £236 9s. in part of damages; and that the plaintiffs should receive from certain other persons, to wit, J. B. and J. P., £263 11s.; but in the event of J. B. and J. P. neglecting or refusing to pay to the plaintiffs that amount, or in the event of J. B. and J. P. giving up their contract with the defendant, then, and in either of such cases, the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs what might remain unpaid to them of such sum of £263 11s., in which case the defendant should be entitled to get the 1,506 square yards of stone¹⁰⁰ in the said agreement mentioned, or to sell it as he might think proper, in the same manner as though a certain agreement of 1835 had never been made: averment of mutual promises: "and, although the plaintiffs have always performed the said agreement on their part, and although they, confiding in the said promise of the defendant, did then, to wit, upon the making of the said promise, wholly cease to prosecute the said actions and each of them, and have thence continually hitherto stayed all proceedings therein, and although a reasonable time for the defendant to pay the said sums of £40 and £236 9s. had elapsed long before the commencement of this suit:" breach, non-payment of these sums, or either of them, or any part thereof.

Plea: Non assumpsit. Issue thereon.

Verdict for plaintiffs. Rule nisi to arrest the judgment.

[In the course of the argument, Lord Campbell, C. J., asked: If the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, made a contract which they would break if they proceeded with the actions, is not that alone a consideration to support the defendant's promise?]

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J. The motion in arrest of judgment is made on two grounds: first, that the declaration discloses no consideration for the defendant's promise; secondly, that there are not proper averments of performance of conditions precedent. Now, as to the first objection, the count states that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendant that the two actions should be settled, and all proceedings therein stayed. The question is not what would form a good plea in bar to the further maintenance of these actions, but whether this is a good consideration for the defendant's agreement. Is it not an advantage to the promisor, and a disadvantage to the promisee, that two actions against the one at the suit of the other should be settled, and no proceedings taken therein? Then there is a general averment of performance, which after verdict is abundantly sufficient, though it might be bad on special demurrer; but the count goes farther, and alleges performance more particularly. I think, however, that the agreement does not contemplate that any further act should be done to settle these actions. It appears that, by those who framed the agreement, they were considered as settled by the agreement itself; and, I think, rightly; for they were so settled. I cannot entertain any doubt that, if, after such an agreement, an attempt were made to proceed in the actions, the court would interfere summarily if the defendant was not in default.

PATTERSON, J. The question is raised, whether on the face of this declaration there is any thing more than an accord. Now I own I think the meaning of what is stated in the declaration is that the actions are actually gone by the agreement, and that the plaintiff could not have gone on with them; but, even if it was no more than an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs to refrain from going on, I think that was a sufficient consideration to support the promise of the defendant.

COLERIDGE, J. It seems to me that the declaration discloses a mutual agreement, binding each party to the other, supposing that other to have performed his own part. I had more doubt as to the sufficiency of the averment of performance. Perhaps on a special demurrer it might not be sufficient; but this is after verdict; and then it is enough that there is an averment of the plaintiffs having always performed the agreement on their part.

ERLE, J. I shall only add one word as to the averment of performance. I take it that, when the plaintiffs and the defendant agree that the actions are settled, the very agreement puts an end to the actions; that the court would interfere if they were afterwards proceeded with; and that consequently no further performance of the agreement is required.

KROMER v. HEIM.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1879. 75 N. Y. 574, 31 Am. Rep. 491.)

Appeal from order of the General Term of the Superior Court of the city of New York, affirming an order of Special Term denying a motion on the part of defendant to set aside an execution issued upon judgment herein, and to have the judgment satisfied of record.

On June 24th, 1876, plaintiff obtained a judgment herein for $4,334.08. On July 26th, 1876, and pending a stay of execution, plaintiff's attorney executed and delivered to defendant a written stipulation, in and by which plaintiff agreed to accept in settlement of the judgment, if paid within a year, $3000 in cash and an assignment of defendant's interest in a certain patent right and of the assets of such patent business, or to accept $1000 in cash, $250 down and the balance in instalments, and merchandise to be delivered in amounts stated, sufficient, with the cash payments, to reduce the judgment to $1000, and an assignment of said patent interests. Defendant paid the $250 down, and made the other cash payments and deliveries of merchandise, as specified in the second alternative of the stipulation, until the judgment was reduced to less than $1000, all of which payments were received by plaintiff without objection. Defendant then executed and tendered to plaintiff an assignment of the patent interests as required, which plaintiff declined to accept, but issued an execution to collect the balance of the judgment.

ANDREWS, J. "Accord," says Sir Wm. Blackstone, "is a satisfaction agreed upon between the party injuring and the party injured; which, when performed, is a bar to all actions upon this account." 3 Bl. Com. 15. An accord executory without performance accepted is no bar; and tender of performance is insufficient. Bac. Abr. Tit. Accord and Satisfaction, C. So also accord with part execution cannot be pleaded in satisfaction. The accord must be completely executed, to sustain a plea of accord and satisfaction. Bac. Abr. Accord and Satisfaction, A; Cock v. Honeychurch, T. Ray. 203; Allen v. Harris, 1 Ld. Ray. 122; Lynn v. Bruce, 2 H. Bl. 317. In Peytoe's Case, 9 Co. 79, it is said, "and every accord ought to be full, perfect and complete; for if divers things are to be done and performed by the accord, the performance of part is not sufficient, but all ought to be performed." The rule that a promise to do another thing is not a satisfaction, is subject to the qualification that where the parties agree that the new promise shall itself be a satisfaction of the prior debt or duty, and the new agreement is based upon a good consideration, and is accepted in satisfaction, then it operates as such, and bars the action. Evans v. Powis, 1 Exch. 601; Kinsler v. Pope, 5 Strobbart, 126; Pars. on Cont. 683, note.

An exception to the general rule on this subject has been allowed in cases of composition deeds, or agreements between a debtor and his creditors; and they have been held, upon grounds peculiar to that class of instruments, to bar an action by a separate creditor, who had signed the composition to recover his debt, although the composition agreement was still executory. Good v. Cheeseman, 2 Barn. & Ad. 335; Bayley v. Homan, 3 Bing. (N. C.) 915. The doctrine which has sometimes been asserted that mutual promises which give a right of action may operate and are good, as an accord and satisfaction of a prior obligation, must, in this state, be taken with the qualification that the intent was to accept the new promise, as a satisfaction of the prior obligation. Where the performance of the new promise was the thing to be received in satisfaction, then, until performance, there is not complete accord; and the original obligation remains in force. Russell v. Lytle, 6 Wend. 390; Daniels v. Hallenbeck, 19 Wend.

408; Hawley v. Foote, 19 Wend. 516; The Brooklyn Bank v. DeGrauw, 23 Wend. 342; Tilton v. Alcott, 16 Barb. 598.

Applying the well-settled principles governing the subject of accords to this case, the claim that the plaintiff's judgment is satisfied cannot be maintained. There is no ground to infer that the agreement of July 26th, 1876, was intended by the parties to be or was accepted as a substitute for or satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment. It was, in effect, a proposition on the part of the plaintiff, in the alternative, to accept $3000 in cash, if paid within one year, and the assignment of the patent and avails of the patent business, in full of the judgment of $4334.08, or to accept $1000 in cash, in installments, and the balance in merchandise, until the judgment should be reduced to $1000; and for that balance to accept the assignment of the patent interests.

The defendant had the election between the alternatives presented by the plaintiff. He elected the latter, and paid the $1000, and supplied the merchandise, until the debt was reduced to $1000, and then tendered the assignment of the patent interests, which the plaintiff refused to accept.

The judgment clearly was to remain in force until the satisfaction under the new agreement was complete. It is the case of an accord partly executed. So far as the plaintiff accepted performance, his claim was extinguished. So far as it was unexecuted, the judgment remained in full force; and however indefensible in morals it may be for the plaintiff to refuse to abide by the agreement in respect to the patent interests, he was under no legal obligation to accept the assignment tendered; and he had the legal right to enforce the judgment for the balance remaining unpaid.

It is clear that the right to supply the merchandise was for the benefit of the defendant. The plaintiff gave him the option to pay $3,000 in cash, and assign the patent interests, or to pay $3334.08 in merchandise and assign the patent interests. The merchandise was to be furnished on "as favorable terms as would be allowed by Hoyt & Co., or New York rates for cash sales." It gave the plaintiff no benefit beyond what he would derive by any purchase in the open market of the same kind of goods. It is quite clear that the defendant preferred to pay $3334.08 in merchandise to paying $3000 in cash.

We think that no distinction arises upon the circumstances to take the case out of the general rule, that an unexecuted accord cannot be treated as a satisfaction.

*The order should be affirmed.*¹⁷⁰

¹⁷⁰ "It is not, however, universally true that a cause of action on contract, or for tort, may not be extinguished by an agreement between the parties, although the agreement which is the consideration for the satisfaction is executory. If the subsequent agreement is accepted in satisfaction, and this appears expressly or by implication, the original cause of action is merged and extinguished. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, and cases cited. It is plain also,

JOHN SCHWEIDER v. GEORGE LANG.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1882. 29 Minn. 254, 13 N. W. 33, 43 Am. Rep. 202.)

BERRY, J. On September 27, 1881, defendant, as payee, holding plaintiff's promissory note, upon which there was an unpaid balance of $1,850, falling due November 10, 1882, with interest to accrue, they agreed as follows: Defendant agreed to accept $1,750 in full satisfaction of the balance of principal and interest called for by the note; $150 to be paid by plaintiff within one week and $1,600 within two weeks from said that if one having a debt or claim against another satisfies or releases it in consideration of an executory promise by the party owing the debt or duty, he cannot afterward enforce his original cause of action upon a mere failure by the other party to perform his promise, 'for he has a remedy to compel performance.' Andrews, J., in Morehouse as Receiver v. Second National Bank of Oswego, 98 N. Y. 503, 509 (1885). See also 6 Ann. Cas. 564, note.

In Manley v. Vermont Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 78 Vt. 331 (1906), the insured put in a claim for fire loss of $500.37, appending to his proof of loss a statement that if the same should be allowed, it was agreed that it should be accepted as a full final adjustment. The claim was allowed and the insured signed a receipt preliminary to the sending of a check for the amount, but later the insured filed additional proof of loss for items omitted from the original proof by mistake. This action was then brought for the increased amount, whereupon the company made a tender of the $500.37 and kept it good, relying on the defense of accord and satisfaction. The trial court held for defendant, but in reversing this judgment, Powers, J., for the court, said: (p. 335.)

"It is a familiar rule that an unexecuted accord is no bar to an action on the original undertaking. Bryant v. Gale, 5 Vt. 416; Rising v. Cummings, 47 Vt. 345; Welch v. Miller, 70 Vt. 108; Gowing v. Thomas, 67 N. H. 399. The agreement here relied on is an accord executory; unless the plaintiff accepted the defendant's promise to pay (treating the notice of August 4th [that the claim was allowed] as such) in satisfaction of his claim. For, while the general rule is just as stated, that the accord must be executed in order to discharge the obligation, it is equally well settled that when the creditor accepts the mere promise of his debtor to perform some act in the future in satisfaction of the debt, the mere promise itself, without performance, is sufficient to extinguish the debt. Hard v. Burton, 62 Vt. at p. 322; Gowing v. Thomas, supra; note to Harrison v. Henderson, (Kan.) 100 Am. St. Rep. at p. 438. To have this effect, however, the new promise must be one legally binding, operating to extinguish the existing claim, which can be enforced in substitution therefor. An essential element of such an agreement—like any other contract—is a legally sufficient consideration. But if one promises to do what he is already legally bound to do, the promise is nude; it creates no new duty and cannot support an action; nor does it afford a consideration for a promise by the other party. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 11 Vt. 60; Cobb v. Cowdery, 40 Vt. 25; see, also, Chase v. Soule, 76 Vt. at bottom of p. 357. Of this character is the agreement in question. As the matter stood at the time it was entered into, the defendant owed the plaintiff $500.37, the sum specified therein, pay-September 27; the note to be thereupon delivered up, and a mortgage securing the same to be cancelled. Plaintiff agreed to raise the $1,750 and pay the same to defendant as above specified. It was subsequently mutually agreed that defendant should call upon plaintiff at his residence, within a week from September 27, to receive the $150 payment, plaintiff to have the same there in readiness. Plaintiff had and kept the $150 in readiness during the week; but defendant failed to call for it at any time, and plaintiff was unable to find him during the week mentioned. Within two weeks from September 27, plaintiff, after much expense and trouble, procured the sum of $1,600, and on October 10, 1881, duly tendered the sum of $1,750 to the defendant in fulfillment of his (plaintiff's agreement, and requested defendant to fulfil on his part. Defendant refused to receive the money or to perform his part of the agreement, having on October 1, without plaintiff's knowledge, sold and transferred the note and mortgage to a third party, to whom plaintiff became thereby bound to pay the full unpaid amount called for by the note. Plaintiff brings this action for damages for defendant's breach of contract.

The agreement between the parties was not for the sale of the note and mortgage, but one by which the maker of these instruments was to be discharged from liability thereon by the payee. The agreement is, therefore, not within the statute of frauds, so as to be required to be in writing. The agreement is what is known as an accord executory; that is to say, it is an agreement upon the sum to be paid and received at a future day in satisfaction of the note. If the accord had been executed, there would have been a satisfaction extinguishing the note, the case being taken out of the rule by which payment of a part is held insufficient to satisfy the whole of a liquidated indebtedness by the fact that the payment was to be made before the indebtedness fell due. Sonnenberg v. Riedel, 16 Minn. 83; Brooks v. White, 2 Met. 283.

The case is, then, one of a promise on the part of the plaintiff to do something of advantage in law to the defendant, and on the part of the defendant to do something of advantage in law to the plaintiff—a case of mutual promises, one of which is the consideration of the other. The agreement was valid and binding upon both parties. The plaintiff has duly offered to perform on his part. The defendant has refused to accept able in ninety days thereafter. So the plaintiff agreed to accept just what he was bound to accept, and the company agreed to pay just what it was bound to pay,—both at the time and in the manner specified in the original contract. Neither yielded anything; neither gained anything. The new agreement resulted in no advantage to the one or detriment to the other. It was not a compromise as was the case in Insurance Co. v. Chestnut, 50 Ill. 111, for there was no disagreement and hence there was nothing to compromise. Insurance Company v. Sweetser, 116 Ind. 370.

"The adjustment agreement was without consideration and revocable by either party to it at any time before full performance. It was a mere accord without satisfaction, and does not bar an action on the policy. Vining v. Insurance Co., 89 Mo. App. 311; Giboney v. Insurance Co., 48 Mo. App. 185."

the proffered performance, as also to perform on his part at plaintiff's request, and has moreover disabled himself from performing by disposing of the note. The plaintiff, is, therefore, in accordance with the general rule which gives damages for breach of contract, entitled to recover the damages which have resulted to him from this breach by defendant. Billings v. Vanderbeck, 23 Barb. 546; Scott v. Frink, 53 Barb. 533; Very v. Levy, 13 How. 345.

HENRY HUNT v. WILLIAM BROWN.

HOLMES, J. The plaintiff made three notes to Russell, the defendant's intestate. Afterwards, according to the plaintiff's evidence in the present case, Russell promised that, if the plaintiff would assent to a compromise, by the executors of the plaintiff's father's will, of a claim in their hands against third persons, by which compromise the plaintiff's share of his father's estate would be diminished, Russell would accept in full settlement of the balance due upon the notes whatever percentage the executors should take in settlement of their claim. The executors then settled the claim for sixty-two per cent of the amount, with the plaintiff's assent. Then Russell died, and suit was brought by his administrator, the present defendant, upon the notes, against the present plaintiff. The latter pleaded a general denial and payment, and afterwards made an offer of judgment for the full amount of the notes, interest, and costs, which was accepted, and the sum was paid. The present suit is upon Russell's alleged agreement. The defendant asked a ruling that the agreement was without consideration, and also that the judgment in the former case was a bar. Both rulings were refused, and he excepts.

1. It is very plain that the jury were warranted in finding that the plaintiff's assent to the compromise was dealt with by the parties as a consideration, that is, as the conventional inducement of Russell's promise, and not merely as a condition precedent, and that if it was so dealt with it was sufficient. Evidence or even an admission that the compromise was for the plaintiff's advantage would not alter the case. In determining whether or not an act was dealt with by the parties to an oral agreement as a consideration, the fact that its consequences were seen to be advantageous to the actor may be important; but on the question of sufficiency alone, it is enough that the immediate effect of the act is an abandonment of an actual or supposed right, whatever the balance of advantages may be in the long run. It is hard to imagine any change of position, not made in pursuance of a previous duty, which may not be sufficient as a consideration, or which is not a detriment in a legal sense.

2. If Russell had received the sixty-two per cent as agreed, and the suit had been brought for the residue, the question would arise whether the acceptance of less than the sum due, upon a collateral consideration, could be distinguished from an acceptance of less, before the notes fell due, or, like that, constituted an accord and satisfaction; Bowker v. Childs, 3 Allen 434, 436; and if it was technically a satisfaction, whether, like a payment (Fuller v. Shattuck, 13 Gray 70), it must not have been pleaded in the suit upon the notes if it was to be relied on at all, or whether there remained any contract unexecuted by the party satisfied which he would break if he afterwards brought suit. But Russell did not accept the sixty-two per cent; so that the only question is whether his agreement in any other way extinguished the notes in whole or in part, since in that case the judgment might be a bar.

The agreement was not itself a satisfaction. It was not a new contract substituted for the notes, and entitling the plaintiff to demand their surrender. Neither could it operate as a release of thirty-eight per cent of the notes, when the percentage was fixed by the compromise referred to. Language sometimes has been used which suggests that an agreement for a sufficient consideration might take effect by way of release, although not under seal. Goodnow v. Smith, 18 Pick. 414, 416; Petty v. Allen, 134 Mass. 265, 267; Taylor v. Manners, L. R. 1 Ch. 48. But the common law knows no such release. Shaw v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 305, 308. The consideration of the notes being executed, the agreement could operate only by way of accord and satisfaction. See Cumber v. Wane, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. (8th Am. ed.) 633 and notes; Bragg v. Danielson, 141 Mass. 195, 196; May v. King, 12 Mod. 537, 538. The suggestion which we are considering, if stated in technical form, would have to be that Russell accepted the plaintiff's assent to the compromise which he desired, in satisfaction of thirty-eight per cent of the notes. But this is plainly a distortion of the evidence, according to which the assent was accepted, not as partial satisfaction of a debt, but as the consideration for a promise.

If, however, the jury might have been warranted in finding that the agreement, and what was done under it, had released or satisfied thirty-eight per cent, they were warranted at least equally in finding that it was purely executory in purport as well as in form, viz. to accept a percentage in satisfaction when it was paid. The court could not rule, as matter of law, that the opposite construction was the true one, or assume the opposite construction as a foundation for its rulings.

But it may be said, that the contract must have been found to embrace the element that Russell would not sue for more than sixty-two per cent. And it may be argued, that, if not technically a release it ought to have been available in defense pro tanto, by way of estoppel or otherwise, in order to avoid circuity of action, upon the same principle that a covenant not to sue is allowed to enure as a release. The answer is, that whether available in this way or not, whether or not such a defense would escape the objection that in substance it was accord without satisfaction, the plaintiff was not bound to use the agreement in defense. For if, as we have tried to show, and as the suggestion under consideration assumes, Russell's agreement did not extinguish the whole or any part of the notes, but left them in full force, it also necessarily retained its independent character as a collateral contract. See further Costello v. Cady, 102 Mass. 140; Blake v. Blake, 110 Mass. 202. A breach of it was a substantive cause of action, upon which the present plaintiff might bring his own suit in his own way, and he was no more bound to plead it than he would have been bound to plead a set-off, fraud, or a breach of warranty. Smith v. Palmer, 6 Cush. 513, 521; Cobb v. Curtiss, 8 Johns. 470. See Burnett v. Smith, 4 Gray 50, 52; Davis v. Hedges, L. R. 6 Q. B. 687.

When a defendant has the choice of setting up a matter in defense, or of suing upon it in another action, if he chooses not to set it up in defense, of course the judgment in the action against him is no bar to a subsequent suit by him. Smith v. Palmer, ubi supra; Star Glass Co. v. Morey, 108 Mass. 570, 573; Davis v. Hedges, ubi supra. Russell's agreement was not pleaded in the former action. Even if it had been executed, it would not have been admissible under a plea of payment. Ulsch v. Muller, 143 Mass. 379; Grinnell v. Spink, 128 Mass. 25. The present plaintiff, not having set up the agreement, and having no other defense, very properly saved himself costs and his antagonist delay by submitting at once to the inevitable and offering judgment. See Rigge v. Burbidge, 15 M. & W. 598.

HART v. GEORGIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1897. 101 Ga. 188, 28 S. E. 637.)

Action by Eva F. Hart against the Georgia Railroad Company. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

COBB, J.¹⁷² * * * The contract as declared on contained an obligation on the part of the plaintiff to erect "a permanent and first-class hotel for the accommodation of the traveling public, and maintain the same in a first-class manner," and the obligation on the part of the road that it, "by the patronage of its road, would maintain and support the same." The whole of the alleged parol contract is contained in the words quoted. What is a first-class hotel? How is a hotel maintained in a first-class manner? What is the patronage of a road running trains day and night at a given point? Is the stopping of every train necessary to maintain and support an eating house at such point? If not, how many trains, and what trains? Suppose the plaintiff had failed to erect an hotel, what character of building could she have been compelled to erect under this contract? That she did erect an hotel which, in her opinion, was a first-class hotel, and that she did maintain the same in what she understood to be a first-class manner, cannot make certain and definite stipulations in the contract declared on, which are otherwise vague and indefinite. Construing the declaration as a whole, it is impossible to determine with certainty what was the contract between the parties, and therefore it is impossible to determine what would be the damages arising from a failure to carry out the alleged contract. As the language alleged does not make a contract between the parties which is capable of enforcement, there was no error in dismissing the declaration on demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

WICKHAM & BURTON COAL CO v. FARMERS' LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1920. 179 N. W. 417.)

Counterclaim asserting that damages were due from plaintiff because of a contract made between plaintiff and defendant. A demurrer to the counterclaim was overruled; hence this appeal. Reversed.

SALINGER, J.¹⁷⁸ I. The counterclaim alleges that about August 18, 1916, defendant, through an agent, entered into an oral agreement * * * "that plaintiff would furnish unto defendant [which bought in such amounts with the purpose of selling the same at retail to its patrons] coal in carload lots, that defendant would want to purchase from plaintiff" on stated terms, with character of the coal described * * *

The basis of the counterclaim, so far as damages are concerned, is the allegation that a stated amount of coal had to be purchased by defendant in the open market at a greater than the contract price, and that therefore there is due the defendant from the plaintiff the sum of $3,090.
* * *

II. The demurrer makes, in effect, three assertions: (a) That the arrangement between the parties is void for uncertainty; (b) that it lacks consideration; (c) that it lacks mutuality of obligation. We have given the argument and the citations on the first two propositions full consideration. But we conclude these first two are of no importance if mutuality is wanting.

The authorities that deal with uncertainty and indefiniteness hold, in effect, that whatsoever is ascertainable with reasonable effort is sufficiently certain to be enforced, if there be no objection to enforcement other than uncertainty. Now, grant that it was not difficult to ascertain how much coal defendant would sell in the time stated in the negotiations, how does that help if there was no obligation on one side to sell, or on part of the other to buy? If the defendant was under no binding obligation to buy of plaintiff, it does not matter how much defendant could sell. In fewer words, though an offer to sell a specified number of tons of coal is not uncertain or lacking in definiteness, such offer is no contract, unless the other party agrees to receive what is offered. In still fewer words, while a writing may be so uncertain as not to be enforceable, a perfectly definite writing may still be unenforceable because there is no mutuality of obligation.

And the asserted lack of consideration is bottomed on the claim that mutuality is lacking. Appellant does not deny that a promise may be a consideration for a promise. Its position is that this is so only of an enforceable promise. That is the law. If, from lack of mutuality, the promise is not binding, it cannot form a consideration. Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535 (Gil. 465). To like effect is Walsh v. Myers, 92 Wis. 397, 66 N. W. 250, which holds there was consideration, because there were mutual promises which were enforceable. And so of Young v. Springer, 113 Minn. 382, 129 N. W. 773; Hazlehurst v. Supply Co. (C. C.) 166 Fed. 191; Chicago Railway v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 242. There is no consideration by promises which lack mutuality. Cold Blast Co. v. Bolt Co., 114 Fed. at 81, 82, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696; Campbell v. Lambert, 36 La. Ann. 35, 51 Am. Rep. 1. In the last-named case it is said that, while a promise may be a good consideration for another promise, this is not so "unless there is an absolute mutuality of engagement, so that each party has the right at once to hold the other to a positive agreement"—citing 1 Parsons on Contracts, 448. To the same effect are Utica Railway v. Brinckerhoff, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 139, 34 Am. Dec. 220, Missouri Railway v. Bagley, 60 Kan. 424, 56 Pac. 762; Tucker v. Woods, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 190, 7 Am. Dec. 305, Corbitt v. Gas Co., 6 Or. 405, 25 Am. Rep. 541, and 1 Chitty on Contracts, 297.

The question of first importance, then is whether there is a lack of mutuality. In the last analysis the counterclaim is based on the allegation that plaintiff undertook to furnish defendant such described coal "as defendant would want to purchase from plaintiff." The defendant never "accepted." Indeed, it is its position that it gave orders, and that plaintiff did the accepting. But concede, for argument's sake, that defendant did accept. What was the acceptance? At the utmost, it was a consent that plaintiff might ship it such coal as defendant "would want to purchase from plaintiff." What obligation did this fasten upon defendant? It did not bind itself to buy all it could sell. It did not bind itself to buy of plaintiff only. It merely "agreed" to buy what it pleased.

It may have been ascertainable how much it would need to buy of some one. But there was no undertaking to buy that much, or indeed, any specified amount of coal of plaintiff. * * *

The "contract" on part of appellee is to buy if it pleased, when it pleased, to buy if it thought it advantageous, to buy much, little, or not at all, as it thought best.

A contract of sale is mutual where it contains an agreement to sell on the one side, and an agreement to purchase on the other. But it is not mutual where there is an obligation to sell, but no obligation to purchase, or an obligation to purchase, but no obligation to sell. * * *

Where plaintiff offers to deliver stone "in such quantities as may be desired," and the other party accepts this without qualification, and without making reference to any existing contract for using the stone, there is no mutuality, because the defendant was not bound to desire any stone. Hoffman v. Maffioli, 104 Wis. 630, 80 N. W. 1032, 47 L. R. A. 427. To same effect is Oil Co. v. Kirk, 68 Fed. 793, 15 C. C. A. 540.

A contract to sell personal property is void for want of mutuality if the quantity to be delivered is conditioned entirely on the will, wish, or want of the buyer. 13 Corpus Juris, 339; Cold Blast Co. v. Bolt Co., 114 Fed. 77, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696. So of an agreement to supply all pig iron wanted by defendants in their business between stated dates, at specified prices, even though the other party promised to purchase such iron. The argument advanced is that the buyer did not engage "to want any quantity whatever," nor even agree to continue in their business. Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535 (Gil. 465). It is said in Hickey v. O'Brien, 123 Mich. 611, 82 N. W. 242, 49 L. R. A. 594, 81 Am. St. Rep. 227, that in National Furnace Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 110 Ill. 427, the case of Bailey v. Austrian is distinguished by pointing out that in the Bailey Case stress is laid on the word "want"; while in the Illinois case the plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant all the iron "needed" in its business during the three ensuing years at $22.35 a ton, and the defendant agreed to take its year's supply at that price.¹⁷⁴ We are unable to find any substantial difference between an "agreement" to buy what one might "want" and what one might "need." Be that as it may, in the case at bar the language was, "would want to purchase," and the Austrian Case is well supported in authority. An agreement to receive and pay for such beer as the plaintiff might from time to time want from the defendant lacks binding force for want of mutuality, though plaintiff agreed to sell all the beer of specified brands which plaintiff should order at prices to be agreed on. Teipel v. Meyer, 106 Wis. 41, 81 N. W. 982. To like effect is Gipps Brewing Co. v. De France, 91 Iowa 108, 58 N. W. 1087, 28 L. R. A. 386, 51 Am. St. Rep. 329. And see Hoffman v. Maffoli, 104 Wis. 630, 80 N. W. 1035, 47 L. R. A. 427; Tarbox v. Gotzian, 20 Minn. 139 (Gil. 122); Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 44 N. W. 669, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205; Turnpike Co. v. Coy, 13 Ohio St. 84; Railroad Co. v. Brinckerhoff, 21 Wen. (N. Y.) 139, 34 Am. Dec. 220.

Indeed, in American Steel Co. v. Copeland, 159 N. C. 556, 75 S. E. 1004, and in Hickey v. O'Brien, 123 Mich. 611, 82 N. W. 241, 49 L. R. A. 594, 81 Am. St. Rep. 227, our case of Drake v. Vorse, 52 Iowa 417, 3 N. W. 465, is construed to support the rule in Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535 (Gil. 465), to wit: That there is no mutuality in an offer to supply all the other wants, because he is under no engagement to want any quantity whatever. * * * Both reason and the very great weight of authority work that the "contract" in review was no contract, because

"A promise is a good consideration for a promisee. But no promise constitutes such a consideration which is not obligatory upon the party promising. It must bind the promisor, so that the promisee may maintain an action for its breach, or it is without legal effect and void. A promise to furnish, deliver, or receive specified articles at certain prices, without any agreement to order or to accept any amounts or quantities of the articles, is without binding force or effect, because neither party is thereby bound to deliver or to accept any quantity or amount whatever. Such promises are void, because they lack one of the essential elements of an agreement,—certainty in the thing to be done. Contracts for the future supply during a limited time of articles which shall be required or needed or consumed by an established business, or used in the operation of certain steamships or other machinery, are no exceptions to this principle, because they fall under the rule. 'Id certum est quod certum reddit potest.' But an accepted promise to furnish goods, merchandise, or other property, at certain prices, during a limited time, in such quantities as the acceptor shall require or want in his business, is without consideration and void, because the acceptor is not bound thereby to require or take any articles whatever under the supposed agreement. The line of demarkation between valid and invalid contracts here runs between the requirements of machinery, or of an established business, and the wants, desires or requirements of the tentative vendee; and that because the former are either reasonably certain, or may be made so by evidence, while the latter are conditioned by the will of the tentative vendee alone, and are both uncertain and capable of infinite variation." Sanborn, J., in Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co., 114 Fed. 77, 79-80 (1902).

defendant was under no binding obligation.¹⁷⁵

III. Three cars of coal were shipped and received. Upon this appellee urges that thereby the so-called contract was completed and made mutual. Part performance was ineffectual in Hoffman v. Maffioli, 104 Wis. 630, 80 N. W. 1032, 47 L. R. A. 427, to found a case as for breach of contract on refusal to ship more. The same is held in Crane v. Crane, 105 Fed. 871, 45 C. C. A. 96, and in Cold Blast Co. v. Bolt Co., 114 Fed. 82, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696, Teipel v. Meyer, 106 Wis. 41, 81 N. W. 982, and in Campbell v. Lambert, 36 La. Ann. 35, 51 Am. Rep. 1, Utica R. Co. v. Brinkerhoff, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 139, 34 Am. Dec. 220, Missouri Railway v. Bagley, 60 Kan. 424, 56 Pac. 762, and Chicago Railway v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 243.

If there never was a contract to ship anything, that is still the situation when a contract to ship what has not yet been shipped is asserted as the 175 "The essential feature of the agreement, according to paragraph sixth of the complaint, is that defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff, for delivery within the named territory, all coal which plaintiff would order up to 25,000 tons per annum. There is no obligation whatever upon plaintiff to order any coal. If plaintiff had refused or neglected to order coal, defendant would not have had any cause of action against him. The case is not one where one party agrees to supply the requirements of another. See U. S. v. Republic Bag & Paper Co., 250 Fed. 79, 162 C. C. A. 251, where there is a general discussion of this type of agreement, with leading cases cited.

"On the contrary, the agreement is in principle, in one aspect, within that class of cases which have come to be known as 'will, wish, or want' contracts. It is an agreement clearly lacking in mutuality. American Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 68 Fed. 791, 15 C. C. A. 540; Commercial Wood & Cement Co. v. Northampton, 115 App. Div. 388, 100 N. Y. Supp. 960; Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co., 114 Fed. 77, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696. * * *

"Where, however, orders under the agreement were accepted, each order so accepted, or sale, may give rise to the cause of action." Mayer, J., in Leach v. Kentucky Block Cannel Coal Co., 256 Fed. 686, 688 (1919).

"We think that, having in view reasonable business necessities, a contract for all of certain articles, at a certain price, that may be needed or required in a certain business, is a mutual obligation; one to furnish and the other to buy, the quantity being reasonably approximated. 'Id certum est quod certum reddi potest.' But a contract for all of an article that one may desire or that he may want is bad. The distinction is this: The first is an absolute engagement to buy all that is needed for a certain purpose, and nothing is left to the caprice or whim of the purchaser. He must buy of his contractee all that is required. Whereas the second is that he only buys if he wishes to. Nothing is obligatory; if he does not want to buy he need not." Ellison, P. J., in Royal Brewing Co. v. Uncle Sam Oil Co. (Mo. App.), 226 S. W. 656, 658 (1920).

"In many lines of business it has become common in late years for those engaged therein to contract in advance, at specified prices, for such quantity of materials or of goods as may be needed in such business during a specified period of time. Where such contracts are supported by a consideration other than the mutual promises of the parties, their validity is beyond question. Where the only consideration for the promise to sell is the promise of the buyer to purchase such quantity as he may need, the authorities are not unanimous, but the decided weight of authority is to the effect that, if the basis of an action. As said in Cold Blast Co. v. Bolt Co., 114 Fed. 80, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696, even though there had been some shipments, there was still no consideration and no mutuality in the contract as to any articles which defendant had not ordered, or which plaintiff had not delivered, and therefore the refusal of plaintiff to honor the orders of defendants was no breach of any valid contract, and formed no legal cause of action whereon to base a counterclaim. It was further said:

"As to all undelivered articles, that defect still inheres in the argument. The plaintiff is not bound to deliver, nor the defendant to take and pay for, any articles that have not been delivered [that is to say, so much as has not been performed still rests upon an agreement which is not enforceable, and for the refusal to honor which there can be no recovery].

* * * The defendant never agreed to order or to pay for any quantity of these undelivered articles. If it had refused to order and take them, no action could have been maintained for its failure, because no court could have determined what amount it was required to take."

It is thus stated in 13 Corpus Juris, 341:

"Accepted orders for goods under contracts void within these rules constitute sales of the goods thus ordered at the price named in the contracts, but do not validate the agreements as to articles which the one refuses to purchase or the other refuses to deliver, or to deliver under the void contract. This is so because neither party is bound to take or deliver any amount or quantity of these articles thereunder."

Defendant alleges further that, by reason of the conduct of plaintiff in furnishing defendant two carloads at $1.50 per ton under the contract terms, plaintiff is now estopped from claiming there was no binding between the parties for furnishing coal to defendant under the contract contended for by defendant. But the claimed estoppel is no broader than the claimed breach of a contract which is no contract.

IV. Cases relied on by appellee do not, on careful consideration, militate with what we have declared. All that Keller v. Ybarru, 3 Cal. 147, holds is that, when one party offers to sell as much as the other wishes, buyer has an established business whose requirements may be estimated approximately, the contract is not void either for uncertainty or want of mutuality; but is valid and may be enforced to the extent of the ordinary requirements of such business when carried on and conducted in the manner contemplated by the parties at the time of making such contract. Lima Locomotive & Machine Co. v. National Steel Casting Co. [155 Fed. 77], 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713, and numerous cases cited in the note appended thereto; T. B. Walker Mfg. Co. v. Swift & Co. [200 Fed. 529], 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730, and cases cited in note appended thereto." Taylor, C., in Scott v. T. W. Stevenson Co., 130 Minn. 151, 159-160 (1915).

there is a contract after the other declares what quantity he will take. In Cooper v. Lansing, 94 Mich. 272, 54 N. W. 39, 34 Am. St. Rep. 341, the defendant entered the following order:

“Owosso, Mich., Dec. 16, 1889.

“Mess. Lansing Wheel Co., Lansing, Mich.—Gentlemen: Please enter our order for what wheels we may want during the season of 1890, at following prices and terms: B, $6.00; C, $5.00; D, $4.00—per set, f. o. b. Owosso, 30 days. All the wheels to be good stock, and smooth. Should you want a few D wheels, to be extra nice stock, all selected white, they are to be furnished at same price, not to exceed 10 set in a 100.

“Very respectfully yours,

“Owosso Cart Co.”

Upon receipt of this instrument, defendant indorsed thereon: “Accepted. Lansing Wheel Co.” It is held there was a contract after shipment at the specified prices.

In Steel Co. v. Copeland, 159 N. C. 556, 75 S. E. 1002, it is ruled that an agreement by a manufacturer to furnish a dealer all the wire he needed for his trade constitutes a continuing offer on the part of the company to sell, which, when accepted pro tanto by an order before withdrawal of the offer, becomes effective as a contract. The facts distinguish McCall v. Icks, 107 Wis. 232, 83 N. W. 300. In Furnace Co. v. Keystone Co., 110 Ill. 427, and Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, there was what is indubitably a mutual promise. Of course, we are not concerned with the cases wherein it is plain that the court enforced the agreement by justifiably holding that, while certain things were not expressed, there was an affirmative agreement by necessary implication. See Cold Blast Co. v. Bolt Co., 114 Fed. 77, 52 C. C. A. 25, 57 L. R. A. 696; Shadbolt v. Topliff, 85 Wis. 513, 55 N. W. 854; Minneapolis Co. v. Goodnow, 40 Minn. 497, 42 N. W. 356, 4 L. R. A. 202. If any of these may be said to conflict with our conclusions, they are against the great weight of authority, and we decline to follow them.

The case of Holtz v. Schmidt, 59 N. Y. 253, is not relevant. It merely holds that, where there is an engagement to supply goods at prices represented to be the lowest made to any buyer, then, on proof that the same kind of goods were sold to another at lower prices than to complainant, he may recover, though either might have refused to deal. What is decided is that, having been induced to deal by such representation, the law will imply a promise to restore the money inequitably obtained by having exacted a price beyond said representation, and that the payment is to be held as one made under a mistake of fact, and to have been received by the other with knowledge that it was not entitled to it.

The demurrer should have been sustained.

Reversed.

MOWBRAY PEARSON CO. v. E. H. STANTON CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1920. 109 Wash. 601, 187 Pac. 370, 190 Pac. 330.)

Action by the Mowbray Pearson Company against the E. H. Stanton Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

FULLERTON, J.¹⁷⁶ On March 31, 1916, the appellant, E. H. Stanton Company, executed and delivered to the Mowbray Pearson Company the following offer in writing:

"In consideration of Mowbray Pearson Company soliciting and delivering ice in Spokane north of the Spokane river to Olive Street bridge and north of N. P. R. R. east of Olive Street bridge and south of Cora avenue west of Division street, and Dalton avenue east of Division street, E. H. Stanton Company agrees to sell pure merchantable ice to Mowbray Pearson Company for $1.50 per ton at their plant for their requirements during 1916, and further agrees not to sell any other dealer for distribution in that district."

The parties acted under the terms of the offer for the year 1916, and at the end of that year the time thereof was extended to the end of the year 1917 by a writing indorsed thereon, signed by both of the parties. When the respondent called upon the appellant to perform at the opening of the ice season in the second year, it refused, announcing that they would not comply with the terms of the writing, and refused repeated subsequent demands for ice; no ice at all being furnished during the extended period pursuant to its terms. The respondent thereupon brought this action to recover in damages as for a breach of contract, and recovered on a trial had before a jury in the sum of $2,321.29. * * *

Turning to the writing under consideration, we can find in it no obligation assumed by the respondent. By its terms the appellant promised, in consideration of the respondent's soliciting and delivering ice within a certain described district, it would sell the respondent sufficient ice at a named price to supply the district; but the respondent promised nothing. It neither promised to solicit and deliver ice in the district, nor promised, in case it did do so, to buy the ice it should sell from the appellant. The writing itself is therefore wholly unilateral. The promise is entirely upon the one side, without any corresponding promise on the other.

Nor did the writing of the word "Accepted" upon the contract alter its effect in this respect. This was merely agreeing to the terms of the writing. It did not constitute a promise on the part of the respondent to solicit and deliver ice in the district defined, nor did it constitute a promise to buy of the appellant the ice it might sell in case it did solicit sales therein. A case in point is Thayer v. Burchard, 99 Mass. 508. There the defendants, who were operating a railroad for the benefit of bondholders, wrote to the plaintiffs, who were flour and grain dealers, that they would transport flour and grain between certain named places at $4 per ton, "this rate to continue in force until close of navigation, unless notice to the contrary." The plaintiffs answered: "We accept the proposition." This was held to constitute a mere offer on the part of the plaintiffs, and not an obligatory contract, because the plaintiffs did not assume any obligation to furnish flour or grain for transportation, being at liberty to buy flour and grain or not, as they chose, and, if they did buy any, to transport it on a road other than the defendants', if they saw fit, and hence would not support an action as for a breach of contract. * * *

Being a promise on its part only, the appellant was at liberty to withdraw it at any time, and since it did do so at the beginning of the second season the respondent no longer had any rights thereunder, and cannot recover as for its breach. The trial judge should have sustained some one of the several challenges made to the sufficiency of the writing as an obligatory contract.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with instruction to enter a judgment in favor of the appellant, to the effect that the respondent take nothing by its action.

LOUDENBACK FERTILIZER CO. v. TENNESSEE PHOSPHATE CO.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1903. 121 Fed. 298, 53 C. C. A. 220, 61 L. R. A. 402.)

This is an action to recover damages for a breach of a contract. The plaintiff in error, hereafter styled the "plaintiff," is an Ohio corporation, engaged in making fertilizers at its factory in Ohio. The defendant in error, hereafter referred to as the "defendant," is a Tennessee corporation, engaged in mining phosphate rock at Attila, Tenn. The plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract, by which the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff its entire "consumption of phosphate rock" for a term of five years beginning January 1, 1897, at a stipulated price per ton. This contract, among other things, provided:

- (1) That the rock should be shipped as ordered by defendant.
- (2) Shipments to commence as soon as 500 tons previously contracted for should be consumed, and thereafter the plaintiff agreed to buy its entire consumption from defendant.
- (3) The plaintiff to have the right to demand as much as 3,000 tons annually. But the contract recited: "It is understood that your present annual consumption is estimated at something like 1,500 tons under normal conditions."

(4) Rock to be settled for on the 10th of each month for all rock received during the preceding month.

The breach alleged is that defendant refused to comply with the orders of the plaintiff given between January 25, and July 10, 1899, for the shipment of rock aggregating 3,000 tons.

In lieu of a general averment that the plaintiff had not itself previously breached the agreement, the pleader sets forth the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract and precisely what had been done by each party under the agreement. Thus it is averred that the plaintiff was engaged in making and selling two grades or qualities of fertilizer, one styled a "complete" and the other an "incomplete" fertilizer. The "incomplete fertilizer," otherwise called "acid phosphate" or "acidulated phosphate," is made by treating the crushed rock with sulphuric acid, and then grinding the dried mass into powder. The resulting product is called "acid phosphate," and is itself sold and used as a fertilizer; and the business of plaintiff at the time this agreement was made was in part the manufacture and sale of this grade of fertilizer. Plaintiff's factory was equipped for the manufacture of this acidulated phosphate, and plaintiff informed the defendant that it proposed to enlarge its facilities for making acid phosphate, and to increase its output of that product. It is also averred that this acidulated phosphate was the principal constituent in the making of a more complete fertilizer.

The declaration then avers that between August, 1897, and January, 1899, it did not order any phosphate rock from the defendant, nor did it buy any from any other producer. To explain this, it is averred that the makers of sulphuric acid so advanced the price by a combination as to make it cheaper for plaintiff to buy the acidulated phosphate, both to supply its customers for that grade of fertilizer and as the basis for the higher grade of fertilizers made and sold by it. The declaration proceeds as follows: "So that the plaintiff found it absolutely necessary for its economic life, and therefore it was, by these abnormal conditions, driven to cease the manufacture, temporarily, of acid phosphate, either for use in plaintiff's own factory of complete fertilizers, or for sale for use as a direct, though incomplete, fertilizer." It is then averred that in the latter part of 1898 the promise for a much larger demand for fertilizers, together with a great decline in the price of sulphuric acid and a rise in the price of crude rock, induced the plaintiff to enlarge its capacity for producing this acid phosphate, and for extending its sale, and to meet this increased capacity it ordered the maximum amount of crude rock admissible under the contract. It is then averred that plaintiff gave notice that it would be obliged to buy acid phosphate if defendant did not ship the crude rock as ordered, and would look to it for the difference between the price paid and the cost of manufacture, but that the defendant had refused to carry out its agreement, claiming that plaintiff had first breached the agreement by buying acid phosphate as aforesaid. It is further averred that plaintiff had bought about 3,000 tons of acidulated phosphate to supply its contracts for that product and to carry on its manufacture of the complete fertilizer. The defendant demurred. The demurrer was sustained by Judge Clark, and the plaintiff has sued out this writ of error.

LURTON, J.¹⁷⁷ The only consideration upon which this contract rests is the mutual obligation to perform. It is not an agreement for the sale and purchase of a definite quantity of phosphate rock. But that is not fatal. If the agreement had been to supply to the plaintiff 1,500 tons of rock each year, no one would question the definiteness of the agreement. That amount was the estimated annual consumption of such rock by the plaintiff under ordinary conditions. But in a particular year it might be more or it might be less than this estimated average consumption. Now, in this situation the seller, in effect, says: "You say your usual consumption is 1,500 tons per year, but that the demand for the rock is dependent on the demand for fertilizers, and that the latter demand is dependent on agricultural conditions, which are variable; that one year you may need more than that amount, and another less. Very well, let us contract with regard to this. I, too, must know something about the amount I may be called upon to supply. We will fix a maximum on that side of 3,000 tons. You, on your part, instead of agreeing to take each year a definite number of tons, must agree to take all of your consumption of rock from me at the stipulated price, and I will agree to hold myself in readiness to furnish you all of your rock as you may order same. But you must take your entire supply from me, for, if you are to take it only as you choose to buy it from me, you may choose to buy none if the price goes down and a great deal if the price goes up." Now, such a contract would not be unilateral. The plaintiff would be bound to take its entire supply from the defendant. The amount which is to be bought is made as definite as possible under the circumstances. The quantity is to be measured by the requirements of the factory in a business which necessarily requires a very large amount if it shall continue to be operated in the future as in the past. Though the quantity to be bought and sold was indefinite, it was ascertainable by the terms of the agreement, and therefore certain. "Certum est quod certum reddi potest." A contract to buy all that one shall require for one's own use in a particular manufacturing business is a very different thing from a promise to buy all that one may desire, or all that one may order. The promise to take all that one can consume would be broken by buying from another, and it is this obligation to take the entire supply of an established business which saves the mutual character of the promise. Manhattan Oil Co. v. Richardson Lubricating Co., 51 C. C. A. 553, 113 Fed. 923; National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427;¹⁷⁸

¹⁷⁷ Part of the opinion is omitted.

¹⁷⁸ "It cannot be said that appellee was not bound by the contract. It had no right to purchase iron elsewhere for use in its business. If it had done

Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218; Brawley v. U. S., 96 U. S. 168, 172, 24 L. Ed. 622; Staver Co. v. Park Steel Co., 43 C. C. A. 471, 104 Fed. 200; Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220.

The contract, thus interpreted, is distinguishable from a class of cases where the agreement was held to be a mere option. Thus, in Railroad v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240, an offer to receive and transport railroad iron from New York to Chicago, not to exceed a certain number of tons, during a specified period, at a definite rate, was accepted without any agreement to deliver any iron for transportation. This contract was held not to be binding on either party for want of mutuality. In Petroleum Co. v. Coal, Coke & Mfg. Co., 89 Tenn. 381, 387, 18 S. W. 65, a lease was upon consideration that, if the lessee should "deem it advisable" to test for and work mines discovered thereon, he should pay a royalty upon the output. The lease was held void, the lessee not being required to make any test or operate any mine if discovered. In American Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 15 C. C. A. 540, 68 Fed. 791, a contract to sell 10,000 barrels of oil at an agreed price, in such quantities per week as the buyer might desire, and to be paid for as delivered, was held void, because the buyer was held not to be under obligation to take or receive any particular quantity per week, or the whole in a definite number of weeks. In Crane v. Crane, 45 C. C. A. 96, 105 Fed. 869, a contract by a wholesale dealer to sell a retailer, during a certain time, at stated prices, so much lumber as the latter "should require for his trade," was held void for want of mutuality, as there was no approximation of what might be the trade of the retailer. If prices should go down, he would naturally make no sales at a price below what he was to pay; but, if prices went up, he would be in a situation to drive his rivals from business by increasing his trade at the expense of the vendor. In Davis v. Mining Co., 93 Mich. 491, 53 N. W. 625, 24 L. R. A. 357, a contract by which the plaintiffs agreed to work an ore bank for $1.50 per ton of ore produced "as long as we can make it pay" was held void for want of mutuality and definiteness of terms.

so, appellant might have maintained an action for a breach of the contract. It was bound by the contract to take of appellant, at the price named, its entire supply of iron for the year—that is, such a quantity of iron, in view of the situation and business of appellee, as was reasonably required and necessary in its manufacturing business. Such contracts are not unusual. A foundry may purchase its supply of coal for the season of the coal dealer. A hotel may do the same. A city, for the use of the public schools, may engage its supply of coal for the winter, at a specified price. Such contracts are not uncommon, and we have never understood that they were void. Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, is a case in point. In this case Smith agreed to furnish Morse all the ice he might require for the use of his hotel for five years, at a certain price. Smith undertook to avoid the contract, on the ground that Morse was not bound, but the court held the contract valid and binding on both parties." Craig, J., in Nat. Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, 433-434 (1884).

See T. B. Walker Mfg. Co. v. Swift & Co., 200 Fed. 529 (1912).

But how does the plaintiff interpret the agreement? For two years it bought no rock. The third year it demands the maximum quantity allowable under any conditions. It excuses itself for its failure to take any rock in 1897 and 1898 by, in effect, saying that "it was more profitable for me to stop making acid phosphate altogether, and to buy my supply of that product." "As I bought 'acid phosphate,' and did not buy the crude rock, I did not violate my agreement with you, for my factory was during that period consuming no crude rock whatever." But, as illustrating the inconsistency of this position, the plaintiff, when it became cheaper to make than to buy acidulated rock, notified the defendant that if it did not supply its demand for crude rock it would buy acidulated rock, and hold defendant liable for the difference between the price paid and what it would cost to make it; and the damages sued for in this case is the difference between the price paid for the acidulated rock and the cost of making same. If this result is possible, the operation of the contract is most unjust. The only "consumption" of phosphate rock by plaintiff's factory at the date of this contract was in the making of the lower form of fertilizer called "acid phosphate" or "acidulated phosphate." This product is made and sold as a fertilizer. It also used it as a base in making a higher grade of fertilizer. To justify the demand for 3,000 tons of crude rock in 1899—that being double the average or normal demand—the plaintiffs in this declaration aver that when the contract was made they notified defendant that it expected to greatly increase its capacity for making and storing that kind of fertilizer.

Now, in the face of this character of operation conducted by its factory and the known normal "consumption" of rock in its factory, the plaintiff excuses its purchase of acid phosphate by, in effect, saying, "I found it more economical to buy acidulated phosphate than to make it, as I have been doing. This I did in good faith. That is, it was in fact more economical for me to buy than to make, and this good faith of mine justifies my conduct, and now, that it is more profitable to take the rock from you at the stipulated price, seeing that such rock has now doubled in price, and sulphuric acid gone down, than to buy the rock already acidulated, I now elect to resume the consumption of rock for the making of acidulated rock on as great a scale as my agreement with you will permit." Thus interpreted, the agreement is a mere option, and utterly void. Addition on Contracts, § 18; Crane v. Crane, 45 C. C. A. 96, 105 Fed. 869; Amer. Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 15 C. C. A. 540, 68 Fed. 791; The Chicago & Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240; Davie v. Mining Co., 93 Mich. 491, 53 N. W. 625, 24 L. R. A. 357; Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218.

The only consideration for the promise of the defendant to sell is the obligation of the plaintiff to take its entire consumption of rock, and if the plaintiff is in fact at liberty to carry on its business by buying its acidulated rock when its price was less than the cost of making it, and thereby avoiding any actual consumption of crude rock, the contract is one which it may perform or not, as it pleases. "The mutuality of the obligation is the very essence of all contracts founded upon mutual promises. Hence it follows, observes Pothier, that nothing can be more contradictory to such an obligation than an entire liberty in either of the parties making the promise to perform it or not, as he may please. An agreement giving such liberty would be absolutely void for want of obligation." Addison on Contracts, § 18. But we do not accept the plaintiff's interpretation of the agreement as correct. From all the surrounding circumstances it was intended to make the amount of rock which the plaintiff was bound to take as definite as possible by the statement of the average or normal consumption in the manner in which the factory was operated and by the agreement to take the entire consumption for a definite time at a stipulated price. Undoubtedly, there is a margin of allowance to be made for the contraction or expansion of the business incident to the varying conditions to which it is ordinarily subject. These conditions may be said to be within the contemplation of the parties when, instead of contracting for a definite amount, deliverable each year, the contract was made for "all of the consumption" of the rock during a definite period of time. This contract gave the plaintiff liberty to use more or less, so long as it did not reduce or increase its consumption beyond the requirements of the usual fluctuations incident to the character of manufacturing carried on by it. This diminution or increase according to the reasonable fluctuations of such a business, if the result of the carrying on of the business with good faith in view of the obligations of the plaintiff to the defendant, constitutes the limit of the liberty allowed by the contract, and it is only in this respect that the question of good faith has any bearing upon the rights of the parties under the agreement.

Any interpretation of the agreement which will enlarge the discretion of the plaintiff so as to allow him to desist from carrying on the business substantially as it was carried on when the agreement was made by permitting it to substitute purchased acid phosphate for that of its own make, simply because it could temporarily be bought more cheaply than it could be made, would place the defendant at the mercy of the plaintiff, and convert the agreement into a mere option. The contract must be read in the light of the fact that the principal business of the plaintiff was to make "acidulated phosphate" both for sale and for mixing in combination with other chemicals to make another grade of fertilizer. The defendant had the right to believe that the plaintiff's purpose was to continue the making of acid phosphate and that the rock consumed in that business was to be all taken from it. To say that the plaintiff was at liberty to desist entirely from making acidulated phosphate whenever it could buy the product to meet the demands of its business cheaper than it could make it, and was only bound to take rock when it could make that grade of product cheaper than it could buy it, is in opposition to the plain meaning of the agreement, as well as destructive of the mutuality of the contract.

In Crane v. Crane, 45 C. C. A. 96, 105 Fed. 869, the contract was by a wholesale dealer in lumber to supply a retailer during a certain time, and at a stipulated price, with so much of a certain grade of lumber as the purchaser "should require for his trade." This contract was held void for want of mutuality, inasmuch as it left it practically optional with the purchaser to increase or diminish his orders with the rise or fall in price. The opinion of the court was by Grosscup, Circuit Judge, who, after referring to such cases as National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, and Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, and Railway Co. v. Witham, L. R. 9 C. P. 16, said:

"In all these cases contracts looking towards the future, and embodying subject-matter necessarily indefinite in quantity, have been upheld; but it will be observed that, although the quantity under contract is not measured by any certain standard, it is capable of an approximately accurate forecast. The capacity of the furnace, the needs of the railroad, or the requirements of the hotel are, within certain limits, ascertainable by the vendor. He is thus enabled to make reasonably accurate calculation of the extent of his obligation. Then, too, the purchase is only an incident of the vendee's business. Presumably, the business will go on irrespective of a rise or fall in the prices of subsidiary supplies. There thus remains to the vendee little or no temptation, on account of the rise or fall in prices, to greatly enlarge or diminish the quantity of his orders."

In Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218, the contract was to furnish all the steamers of the defendant's line with coal for a definite time at a stipulated price. These steamers were at the time making regular trips between certain ports. Coal was delivered as needed for a part of the time, when defendants sold and ceased to operate their steamers, and declined to receive coal thereafter, although the purchaser of the steamers continued to operate them as before. The contract was construed as one to furnish all of the coal which should be required to operate the steamers during the period covered by the agreement, and that the sale of the steamers did not operate to relieve the defendants from the obligation to take the coal "which the ordinary and accustomed use of the steamers required."¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁹ In Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642 (1891), the offer dated Dec. 31, 1887 and accepted January 4, 1888, was:

"Messrs. F. Alexandre & Sons, New York:

"Gents.—We propose to furnish your steamers, 'City of Alexandria' 'City of Washington' and 'Manhattan,' with strictly free burning pea coal, delivered along side Pier 3, North River, for the year 1888, commencing January 1st to Dec. 31st for the sum of $3.05 per ton. We also agree to furnish any other steamers of your line with same coal and at same price at any time you wish.

The plaintiff in error has cited and greatly relied upon the case of McKeever & Co. v. Cannonsburg Iron Co., 138 Pa. 184, 16 Atl. 97, 20 Atl. 938. The agreement involved there was to supply an iron mill "with all of the coal you will require for your mill for three years." The prices fixed were for three grades of coal—"forked coal," "run of mines," and "slack." The mill, pending this agreement, introduced natural gas, a fuel unknown when the agreement was made, which greatly reduced the quantity of coal required. It also bought a grade of coal called "nut" from another person, and claimed that they were liable only for the coal of the kinds specified actually required after the consumption of gas was begun. It was held that the mill was at liberty to diminish the use of coal as fuel by the introduction of gas, but that, as it appeared the "nut" coal took the place of "slack," it had no right to use it without liability to the plaintiffs. The case differs in its principal point on the facts and circumstances from the one at bar, though in the minor question—the right to substitute one grade of coal for another—it quite resembles the present case, and supports the conclusion we have reached. The opinion is, however, entitled only to that weight which attaches to a judgment of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, for it is not supported by either argument or authority.

2. The plaintiff, by the facts stated on the face of the declaration, shows that it committed the first substantial breach of the contract. Having desisted from receiving phosphate rock for a period of nearly two years, because it found it more profitable to buy than to make acidulated phosphate, it now demands damages from the defendant because it had to buy acidulated phosphate at a loss in consequence of the refusal of the defendant to supply it with phosphate rock after it became more profitable to make than to buy that grade of fertilizer. If there is anything well settled it is that the party who commits the first breach of the contract cannot maintain an action against the other for a subsequent failure to perform. The plaintiff has not kept the contract, and shows no excuse for its breach. It does not, therefore, show any such performance on its own part as to entitle it to demand that the defendant

If, through any cause, we are unable to deliver pea coal, we will deliver you other sizes at an equitable adjustment of price.

"Yours very respectfully,

"Jos. K. Wells, Agt."

The court said that "the evident intention of the parties was that the plaintiff should furnish to the defendants all the coal which the steamers named should require in the work in which they were employed for the year ensuing, and that the parties should perform all needful acts to give effect to the agreement"; and that "the fact that the defendants deemed it best to sell the steamers, cannot be permitted to operate to relieve them from the obligation to take the coal which the ordinary and accustomed use of the steamers required, for the provisions of the agreement do not admit of a construction that it was to terminate in the event of a sale or other disposition of them by the defendants."

shall go on and perform, or pay damages for a subsequent refusal to recognize the contract as in force.

3. The contract was clearly an entire contract. It was for the sale of all the phosphate rock which should be needed for the ordinary requirements of the plaintiff's factory, and was not a number of single contracts for the sale and delivery of definite quantities as ordered from time to time. The breach went to the whole of the consideration. Cherry Valley Iron Works v. Florence Iron River Co., 64 Fed. 569, 12 C. C. A. 306; Monarch Cycle Co. v. Royer Wheel Co., 44 C. C. RAMEY LUMBER CO., Limited, v. JOHN SCHROEDER LUMBER CO.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 1916. 237 Fed. 39. 150 C. C. A. 241.)

Action at law by the Ramey Lumber Company, Limited, against the John Schroeder Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff sued the defendant on a contract under which plaintiff agreed to sell at specified prices to the defendant all the lumber of certain grades which the plaintiff should manufacture or own during 1911 and the defendant agreed to purchase and receive the lumber. The District Court concluded among other things that the contract was void for want of certainty and mutuality, and dismissed the complaint. Plaintiff brought error. Reversed.

ALSCHULER, J.¹⁰⁰ * * * As to the defenses of uncertainty and want of mutuality, we are unable to concur in the decision of the trial court. The contract did not lack mutuality of obligation. While defendant promised to buy of plaintiff all the lumber of a certain quality that plaintiff might own during the season, plaintiff bound itself, if it did manufacture or acquire any such lumber, to sell all of it to defendant and to no one else. Thus plaintiff deprived itself of the right to sell lumber to whom it pleased. The promise to restrict its freedom by giving up its right to sell to others was real and definite. It was the substantial and contemplated consideration for defendant's promise to buy all that plaintiff might own during the season. There was the mutuality of obligation essential to a bilateral contract; there was the consideration essential to the validity of any contract. Conley Camera Co. v. Multiscope & Film Co., 216 Fed. 892, 133 C. C. A. 96; Burgess Sulphite Fiber Co. v. Broomfield, 180 Mass. 283, 62 N. E. 367. That the plaintiff did not bind itself to acquire or manufacture any such lumber is immaterial. Its promise to deal with defendant was the valid consideration for the obligation by defendant—a consideration that made the undertaking of the other party binding and enforceable.

With regard to the question of uncertainty, a contract is void (save for the possibility of reformation in equity) because of uncertainty, only when it is so worded that the intention of the parties cannot be deduced therefrom. If the intention be clear, the mere uncertainty of the amount involved does not invalidate the obligation, however it may affect the possibility of proving damages for a breach. In the present case the preliminary negotiations demonstrate that defendant wanted to secure all such lumber that it could possibly obtain, without limit, and without binding plaintiff absolutely and under all circumstances to deliver any lumber. The parties had a right to make such a contract, even though the amount that would be deliverable thereunder was not specified, and was in a sense optional with the vendor; and this they did, in terms which are clear and certain.

The contract expresses without uncertainty the intention of obtaining all the lumber plaintiff might acquire and manufacture during that season. That plaintiff might take advantage of market conditions, and buy or refrain from buying heavily, was of the very essence of the agreement. Inasmuch as it gave a valuable consideration for this right, this case is distinguishable from Crane v. Crane, 105 Fed. 869, 45 C. C. A. 96; Tweedie Trading Co. v. Parlin & Orendorff Co., 204 Fed. 50, 122 C. C. A. 364; Oakland Motor Co. v. Indiana Automobile Co., 201 Fed. 499, 121 C. C. A. 319; and Velie Motor Car Co. v. Kopmeier Motor Car Co., 194 Fed. 324, 114 C. C. A. 284.

Moreover, there were definite limitations on the amount that could and must be tendered. While plaintiff had the option either to manufacture and to buy from others, or to refrain therefrom, it was absolutely obligated to sell all that it manufactured or owned during the season. When the contract was executed, the maximum amount that would be deliverable thereunder, while unknown to the parties, and in that sense uncertain, was, under the finding of facts, the amount of specified grades of a definite kind of lumber that could be manufactured between March and July of the year 1911 either by plaintiff or others. So much thereof as plaintiff might own within a definitely limited time, the season of 1911, was the amount that it had obligated itself to sell. This would necessarily have become certain during the season, even if the time limit for plaintiff's ownership included, not merely the manufacturing season, but also the short period thereafter within which delivery must be made.

No claim, however, is made for any lumber not owned by plaintiff prior to defendant's repudiation of the obligation. The amount then owned, and as to which, by reason of plaintiff's ownership, both parties were bound, the one to sell, the other to buy, was necessarily certain, and the amount of lumber, in respect to which damages are claimed, was thus definitely fixed at the date of defendant's repudiation.

We therefore conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to recover as its damages the loss it incurred from defendant's nonacceptance of the 20 carloads, and on account of the 1,455,919 feet on hand at time of repudiation of the contract. * * *

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the District Court to enter a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $4,899.82, together with interest as above stated to date of entry of judgment, and costs.¹⁸¹

"If the plaintiff had taken orders for this quality of glue, and had failed to buy the amount to fill such orders from the defendant, the defendant could have held the plaintiff under the contract and recovered the damages which it sustained by reason of plaintiff's failure to order such glue from the defendant. And this it could have done, no matter how low the market price might have fallen during the year. Both parties acted with full knowledge of their respective methods of doing business, and of the uncertain and fluctuating demand for glue which might come from plaintiff's customers, and which must naturally to some extent be dependent upon the market price. They entered upon this contract with their eyes open to all the conditions then existing, or which might possibly arise, and with the intention of being mutually bound thereby. I believe that under the contract the plaintiff was bound to order from the defendant every pound of this quality of glue which it sold to its customers, and that in like manner defendant was bound to supply every

COLLINS, J.¹²² * * * 1. From the resolution which was incorporated bodily into the instrument executed by both parties as their contract it appears that it was resolved to employ plaintiff as an assistant manager of the corporate business at a fixed salary per year, payable in monthly instalments. The term of employment was determined upon as the period of time during which the corporate business might be carried on; not pound of this quality of glue which plaintiff sold to customers and called upon the defendant to furnish. The mere uncertainty as to the amount which might be required to be furnished under the contract is no reason why it was not a mutual one, nor does it make the contract unenforceable.

"The court has found that the orders in question were received by plaintiff and transmitted to defendant under the contract. The plaintiff's good faith in soliciting those orders, and their validity, have not been successfully attacked. Having a valid and enforceable contract with the defendant, obtained without any unfair dealing on its part, but as the result of the deliberate judgment of both parties thereto, the plaintiff had a right, in the absence of any notification from the defendant that it could not or would not fill all its orders, to proceed legitimately in good faith to solicit orders from the trade for this quality of glue and to expect the filling of these orders by the defendant. The defendant had no right to arbitrarily limit the amount which plaintiff should receive under the contract, and it was therefore properly held liable for the damages which the plaintiff sustained." [Compare Diamond Alkali Co. v. Aetna Explosives Co., 264 Pa. St. 304 (1919)].

Page, J., in a vigorous dissenting opinion, relied on T. W. Jenkins & Co. v. Anaheim Sugar Co., 237 Fed. 278 (1916) which held that if the contract gives one party an option to buy or not as he sees fit it is without consideration, even though that party is prohibited by the contract from buying from any one else, but, treated the contract as in one point of view a provision for plaintiff's requirements as jobber. He then said (pp. 278-279):

"In some of the cases a distinction is sought to be drawn between contracts for requirements, where the subject thereof is an article incidental to the business of the purchaser, or where the purchaser is under contract to resell, and where the purchaser buys to sell again as a principal part of his business (Crane v. C. Crane & Co., 105 Fed. 863, 45 C. C. A. 96); the theory being that the amount in one case is made certain or capable of an approximation to certainty as to the requirements by reference to a standard or measure while in the latter there is no such standard or measure by which the amount of the requirements could even be approximated in advance, and therefore the contract is too indefinite and uncertain to be enforceable.

"The question as I understand it is not dependent for its solution upon the character of the business of the purchaser, but rather whether there is anything whereby the very indefinite and uncertain word 'requirements' can be made approximately definite and certain. Something within the knowledge of both parties, so that their minds met in a mutual understanding of the limit of the quantity to be furnished under the contract. Where a purchaser, to the knowledge of the seller, has entered into a contract for a resale of the goods purchased, the amount called for by the contract of resale would be the measure of the requirements of the purchaser's contract. Shipman v. Straits- to exceed, of course, the life of the corporation as fixed by law. Two provisos were appended to the paragraph relating to the term of employment,—one that plaintiff should properly and efficiently discharge his duties as such assistant; the other, that his term of employment should continue only so long as he owned and held, in his own name, fifty shares, fully paid up, of the defendant's capital stock. A recital that plaintiff had accepted the employment followed, and then the agreement whereby defendant employed plaintiff and the latter entered into the employment, each party being subject to the terms and conditions mentioned and prescribed by the resolution.

ville Mining Co., 158 U. S. 356, 362, 15 Sup. Ct. 886, 39 L. Ed. 1015. Where the purchaser contracts for his requirements of a thing incidental to the business carried on by him, his reasonable needs for the particular article can be approximately arrived at by a consideration of the proportion of the requirements incidental to the main business in which it was employed. For example, to furnish the coal for certain steam vessels for a year (Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 645, 29 N. E. 142, 15 L. R. A. 218), or all the cans needed in a canning factory (E. G. Dalley Co. v. Clark Can Co., 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761), or all the lubricating oil for its own use (Manhattan Oil Co. v. Richardson Lub. Co., 113 Fed. 923, 51 C. C. A. 553). In all such cases a limit to the quantity is fixed at the legitimate needs of the particular article in carrying on the purchaser's main business. While this amount is uncertain it is capable of an approximately accurate forecast.

"Where a contract is made by a jobber or wholesale dealer for goods that he is to sell, but for which he has no present contract of resale, and the contract is for his requirements, it must mean for his regular and ordinary business purposes. In the case of T. W. Jenkins Co. v. Anaheim Sugar Co., supra, the plaintiff only demanded that the defendant should furnish the amount that in previous years had been sold during the period covered by the contract. This would be one test, and if the amount demanded under the contract was greatly in excess of that amount, the question would be whether the orders were in excess of the purchaser's reasonable needs and were justified by the conditions of the business. N. Y. C. Iron Works Co. v. U. S. Radiator Co., supra, 174 N. Y. 335, 66 N. E. 967. While in such a case the amount of the purchaser's requirements are uncertain, and more difficult of forecast than in the case where the article was for incidental use, yet it can be determined with reasonable approximation. Therefore such a contract is not void for uncertainty. But the purchaser is limited to demand such as he requires to meet orders received in the ordinary and usual course of dealing. He must carry out the contract in a reasonable way, with regard to the obligations of good faith and fair dealing that is implied in the contract. It was therefore competent for the defendant to prove that the plaintiff was not acting reasonably or in good faith, but using the contract for a purpose not within the contemplation of the parties, for a speculative, as distinguished from an ordinary and regular, business purpose. N. Y. C. Iron Works Co. v. U. S. Radiator Co., supra.
* * * The facts in this case show conclusively, in my opinion, that the plaintiff was not acting in good faith, but was using the contract speculatively, and not as was contemplated by the parties."

On the dissenting opinion's contention that the buyer could not unreasonably increase his requirements, compare Dowd v. Hercules Powder Co., 66 Colo. 302 (1919).

Counsel for defendant urges several objections to the validity of the contract, but they are all disposed of by considering the claim that it is and was void for lack of mutuality of consideration, the point being that, while the character of the services to be rendered and the compensation were fixed, no definite period of time was agreed upon during which the plaintiff should work or defendant employ and pay. The language used, independent of the provisos, was: "Said employment is to continue during the time the business of said corporation shall be continued, not exceeding the term and existence of the corporation." The only conditions mentioned and imposed being that, while in defendant's employ, the plaintiff should render proper and efficient service, and should own and hold in his own name certain shares of corporate stock.

As we construe the expressions used, the duration of the term of employment was sufficiently defined, for the law does not require that the precise number of days or months or years shall be stated; and there was mutuality of consideration. The term fixed, dependent only upon the condition as to plaintiff's ownership of the stock shares, was for such period of time as defendant corporation might continue to transact business. It might cease to do business voluntarily, or there might be an involuntary termination of its business transactions; for instance by proceedings in insolvency instituted by its creditors, or the business might terminate by operation of law at the end of not to exceed thirty years from the date of its organization,—that being the life term of corporations of this character under the statutes. The defendant agreed to keep plaintiff in its employ so long as he retained as the owner, and held in his own name, the shares, and it continued in business; and plaintiff, in consideration of defendant's agreement, stipulated that, so long as he remained in such employment, he would own and hold the stock, and would perform proper and efficient service. The requirement that plaintiff should own and continue to hold the stock as a condition to his retention by defendant was, presumptively, for the benefit of the latter, and a detriment to the former. It was in defendant's interest to have its stock shares permanently held by its employes, for such holding would serve to stimulate them in the performance of their duties. It was an injury to plaintiff to hold the stock as a condition for his employment, especially when we consider that the business of the concern could be closed out at any time, leaving him out of employment, with the stock upon his hands. Had the plaintiff disposed of his shares, the defendant would have suffered a loss; and, had the latter ceased business, the former would have been injured. Had the relation of employer and employe terminated between these parties through the happening of either of these two contingencies, neither party would have been in statu quo. The consideration for the agreement was ample and mutual, although the term of service might be terminated by defendant's cessation of business or plaintiff's selling his stock in the corporation. See Bolles v. Sachs, 37 Minn. 315, 38 N. W. 862.

The expressions of a contingency whereby the contract might be terminated by the act of either party expressly excluded the idea that each was at liberty to terminate it at any time without regard to the happening of either contingency. * * *

[Order denying a new trial after a verdict for plaintiff]

Affirmed.

CITY OF POCATELLO v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1920. 267 Fed. 181.)

Action by the City of Pocatello against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. Judgment for defendant in sustaining demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

HUNT, J. Action by the city of Pocatello, Idaho, upon a bond given by Mitchell, contractor, with the Fidelity Company as surety, for the faithful performance of a construction contract relating to an additional water supply for the city. The complaint states that work was to begin February 1, 1917, and to be finished not later than May 10. No work was done, and under the provisions of the contract, if the contractor failed diligently to proceed, the city could have the work done at the expense of the contractor. After notice to the contractor to proceed, and after his failure to act, the city did the work at an expense in excess of the contract price, and thereafter brought this action against the surety company to recover the excess sum paid. General demurrer was sustained, and the action was dismissed, whereupon the city brought writ of error.

Article 11 of the contract provided that if—

“for any reason the city of Pocatello shall fail to make sale of and receive money for the $150,000 of waterworks bonds due to be sold on the 8th day of January, 1917, then and in that event this contract, at the option of the party of the second part, may be terminated without the party of the second part becoming liable in any manner or upon any account to the party of the first part upon any claim or demand whatsoever.”

There is no allegation that the city failed to sell the bonds on January 8th, but it is alleged that upon April 16th the city engineer notified the contractor that he must proceed by the 19th, and that on April 19th the contractor said he could not proceed with the work unless the city would grant an extension of time for performance sufficient to cover the delay in selling bonds, and that he would proceed “only upon the condition” that the extension be granted. Whether Mitchell was ever advised by the city that it waived or intended to waive whatever right of option it may have had under article 11 does not appear

Under the contract the option of the city was conditional upon the failure to sell the bonds, and the city had the right to exercise the option of terminating the contract at any time. Had Mitchell proceeded with the work, he would have done so, knowing that the city could terminate the contract any time without liability to him in any manner, or upon any account, or upon any claim or demand that he might have had for work he had already done. There is no provision in the contract requiring the city to make an effort to sell its bonds, and no specification as to terms or conditions upon which sale of the bonds was to have been had. The purpose of the city, as made apparent by the language of article 11, was to reserve the right to terminate the contract, provided it did not dispose of its bonds, and in the exercise of such right, to escape any liability to any one upon any claim or demand whatever. A contract of such a nature could not be enforced; it lacks mutuality. There was no performance by either party to the contract and no waiver of lack of mutuality. Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) 486.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMAS v. THOMAS.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1842. 2 Q. B. 851.)

Assumpsit by a widow against her deceased husband's executors. At the trial, it appeared that John Thomas, the deceased husband of the plaintiff, at the time of his death, in 1837, was possessed of a row of seven dwelling houses in Merthyr Tidvil, in one of which, being the dwelling house in question, he was himself residing; and that by his will he appointed his brother Samuel Thomas (since deceased) and the defendant executors thereof, to take possession of all his houses, etc., subject to certain payments in the will mentioned, among which were certain charges in money for the benefit of the plaintiff. In the evening before the day of his death he expressed orally a wish to make some further provision for his wife; and on the following morning he declared orally, in the presence of two witnesses, that it was his will that his wife should have either the house in which he lived and all that it contained, or an additional sum of £100 instead thereof.

This declaration being shortly afterward brought to the knowledge of Samuel Thomas and the defendant, the executors and residuary legatees, they consented to carry the intentions of the testator so expressed into effect; and, after the lapse of a few days, they and the plaintiff executed the agreement declared upon; which, after stating the parties, and briefly reciting the will, proceeded as follows:

"And, whereas the said testator, shortly before his death, declared, in the presence of several witnesses, that he was desirous his said wife should have and enjoy during her life, or so long as she should continue his widow, all and singular the dwelling house," etc., "or £100 out of his personal estate," in addition to the respective legacies and bequests given her in and by his said will; "but such declaration and desire was not reduced to writing in the lifetime of the said John Thomas and read over to him; but the said Samuel Thomas and Benjamin Thomas are fully convinced and satisfied that such was the desire of the said testator, and are willing and desirous that such intention should be carried into full effect. Now these presents witness, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the parties, that, in consideration of such desire and of the premises," the executors would convey the dwelling house, etc., to the plaintiff and her assigns during her life, or for so long a time as she should continue a widow and unmarried: "provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby further agreed and declared, that the said Eleanor Thomas, or her assigns, shall and will, at all times during which she shall have possession of the said dwelling house, etc., pay to the said Samuel Thomas and Benjamin Thomas, their executors, etc., the sum of £1 yearly toward the ground rent payable in respect of the said dwelling house and other premises thereto adjoining, and shall and will keep the said dwelling house and premises in good and tenantable repair;" with other provisions not affecting the questions in this case.

The plaintiff was left in possession of the dwelling house and premises for some time; but the defendant, after the death of his co-executor, refused to execute a conveyance tendered to him for execution pursuant to the agreement, and, shortly before the trial, brought an ejectment, under which he turned the plaintiff out of possession. A verdict being found for the plaintiff on all the issues, a rule nisi was obtained pursuant to leave reserved to move to enter a nonsuit.

LORD DENMAN, C. J.¹³³ There is nothing in this case but a great deal of ingenuity, and a little wilful blindness to the actual terms of the instrument itself. There is nothing whatever to show that the ground rent was payable to a superior landlord; and the stipulation for the payment of it is not a mere proviso, but an express agreement. (His Lordship here read the proviso.) This is in terms an express agreement, and shows a sufficient legal consideration quite independent of the moral feeling which disposed the executors to enter into such a contract. Mr. Williams's definition of consideration is too large; the word causa in the passage referred to means one which confers what the law considers a benefit on the party.¹³⁴ Then the obligation to repair is one which might impose charges heavier than the value of the life estate.

¹³³ The statement of the pleadings is omitted from the statement of facts.

¹³⁴ E. V. Williams, counsel for defendant, had asked in arguing: "What is meant by the consideration for a promise, but the cause or inducement for making it" and had quoted from Plowden's note to Sharlington v. Strotton, Plowd. 309 and from Chitty on Contracts.

PATTERSON, J. It would be giving to causa too large a construction if we were to adopt the view urged for the defendant; it would be confounding consideration with motive. Motive is not the same thing with consideration. Consideration means something which is of some value in the eye of the law, moving from the plaintiff; it may be some benefit to the plaintiff, or some detriment to the defendant; but at all events it must be moving from the plaintiff. Now that which is suggested as the consideration here, a pious respect for the wishes of the testator, does not in any way move from the plaintiff; it moves from the testator; therefore, legally speaking, it forms no part of the consideration. Then it is said that, if that be so, there is no consideration at all, it is a mere voluntary gift; but when we look at the agreement we find that this is not a mere proviso that the donee shall take the gift with the burdens; but it is an express agreement to pay what seems to be a fresh apportionment of a ground rent, and which is made payable not to a superior landlord, but to the executors. So that this rent is clearly not something incident to the assignment of the house, for in that case, instead of being payable to the executors, it would have been payable to the landlord. Then as to the repairs, these houses may very possibly be held under a lease containing covenants to repair; but we know nothing about it, for anything that appears the liability to repair is first created by this instrument. The proviso certainly struck me at first as Mr. Williams put it, that the rent and repairs were merely attached to the gift by the donors; and, had the instrument been executed by the donors only, there might have been some ground for that construction; but the fact is not so. Then it is suggested that this would be held to be a mere voluntary conveyance as against a subsequent purchaser for value; possibly that might be so, but suppose it would, the plaintiff contracts to take it, and does take it, whatever it is, for better for worse, perhaps a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration might override it, but that cannot be helped.

COLERIDGE, J. The concessions made in the course of the argument have, in fact, disposed of the case. It is conceded that mere motive need not be stated, and we are not obliged to look for the legal consideration in any particular part of the instrument, merely because the consideration is usually stated in some particular part; ut res magis valeat, we may look to any part. In this instrument, in the part where it is usual to state the consideration, nothing certainly is expressed but a wish to fulfill the intentions of the testator, but in another part we find an express agreement to pay an annual sum for a particular purpose, and also a distinct agreement to repair. If these had occurred in the first part of the instrument, it could hardly have been argued that the declaration was not well drawn and supported by the evidence. As to the suggestion of this being a voluntary conveyance, my impression is that this payment of £1 annually is more than a good consideration, it is a valuable consideration, it is clearly a thing newly created and not part of the old ground rent.

STRONG v. SHEFFIELD.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1895. 144 N. Y. 392, 39 N. E. 330.)

ANDREWS, C. J. The contract between a maker or endorser of a promissory note and the payee forms no exception to the general rule that a promise, not supported by a consideration, is nudum pactum. The law governing commercial paper which precludes an inquiry into the consideration as against bonâ fide holders for value before maturity, has no application where the suit is between the original parties to the instrument. It is undisputed that the demand note upon which the action was brought was made by the husband of the defendant and endorsed by her at his request and delivered to the plaintiff, the payee, as security for an antecedent debt owing by the husband to the plaintiff. The debt of the husband was past due at the time, and the only consideration for the wife's endorsement, which is or can be claimed, is that as part of the transaction there was an agreement by the plaintiff when the note was given to forbear the collection of the debt, or a request for forbearance, which was followed by forbearance for a period of about two years subsequent to the giving of the note. There is no doubt that an agreement by the creditor to forbear the collection of a debt presently due is a good consideration for an absolute or conditional promise of a third person to pay the debt, or for any obligation he may assume in respect thereto. Nor is it essential that the creditor should bind himself at the time to forbear collection or to give time. If he is requested by his debtor to extend the time, and a third person undertakes in consideration of forbearance being given to become liable as surety or otherwise, and the creditor does in fact forbear in reliance upon the undertaking, although he enters into no enforceable agreement to do so, his acquiescence in the ¹⁸⁵ Of Thomas v. Thomas, Professor Williston says: "There the plaintiff in return for a promise to convey a life estate in a house agreed to pay a portion of the ground rent and keep the premises in repair at all times during which she should have possession. As there was no promise on her part, and none could fairly be implied, that she should take possession or keep possession, it was wholly at her option whether she should incur any detriment or not. Remaining out of possession was no legal detriment since she had no right of possession at the time the agreement was made. The point was not raised, and the court held the agreement binding." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 105, p. 220 n. 91. But does not this undervalue the fact that plaintiff already was in possession and remained there, so at once incurred a detriment which might possibly suffice for consideration purposes if a contract, and not merely a gift upon condition in the guise of a contract, was intended?

request, and an actual forbearance in consequence thereof for a reasonable time, furnishes a good consideration for the collateral undertaking. In other words, a request followed by performance is sufficient, and mutual promises at the time are not essential, unless it was the understanding that the promisor was not to be bound, except on condition that the other party entered into an immediate and reciprocal obligation to do the thing requested. (Morton v. Burn, 7 A. & E. 19; Wilby v. Elgee, L. R., 10 C. P. 497; King v. Upton, 4 Maine, 387; Leake on Con., p. 54; Am. Lead. Cas., Vol. II., p. 96 et seq. and cases cited.)¹⁸⁶ The general rule is ¹⁸⁶In Manter v. Churchill (1878-1879), 127 Mass. 31, defendant promised plaintiff to pay an indebtedness due plaintiff from the estate of a third party, and plaintiff was induced by this promise to forbear bringing action for the indebtedness against the administratrix of the estate, for three months. Judgment for defendant, in a suit on this promise, was affirmed. Lord, J., said that "Mere forbearance to sue is not a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay the debt of another. Macorney v. Stanley, 8 Cush. 85." In the case of Macorney v. Stanley, cited, the reason given is that "It [forbearance] is a mere omission on the part of the creditor to exercise his legal right to which he is not bound by any promise, which right he may at any moment at his own pleasure enforce. * * * To constitute a forbearance to sue a third person a good consideration for a promise by a stranger to the original consideration, it must have been in pursuance of an agreement to forbear. In such a case, the injury to the promisee and the benefit to the debtor, both concur in making the consideration valid. It is undoubtedly true that an actual forbearance to sue may often, in connection with other facts, be evidence of an agreement to forbear, and as such, form a good consideration for a promise. But this is a very different proposition from that contended for by the plaintiff that forbearance of itself without any promise, is a good consideration." See Saunders v. Bank of Mecklenburg, 112 Va. 443 (1911).

Yet, as in Strong v. Sheffield, the principal case, it is stated just as positively the other way that "forbearance, even without an agreement to forbear, will serve as a consideration, if it be completed." Learned Hand, J., in In re All Star Feature Corp., 232 Fed. 1004, 1009 (1916).

In Fullerton v. Provincial Bank of England, [1903] A. C. 309, 313-314, Lord Macnaghten said of a contention that there was no stipulation for forbearance for any definite time and so no consideration for the agreement to create an equitable charge before the court: "In such a case as this it is not necessary that there should be an arrangement for forbearance for any definite or particular time. It is quite enough if you can infer from the surrounding circumstances that there was an implied request for forbearance for a time, and that forbearance for a reasonable time was in fact extended to the person who asked for it. That proposition seems to me to be established by the case of Alliance Bank v. Broom, 2 D. & S. 289 (1864) * * * and other cases * * * and I may add that the proposition seems to be good sense."

In Edgerton v. Weaver, 105 Ill. 43 (1882) Schofield, J., said: "A promise to pay the debt of another, it has been held, can not be rendered binding by proof that it was followed by forbearance, unless there be something to show, not only that it was made for the purpose of obtaining time, and that time was actually given, but that the indulgence thus accorded was in clearly and in the main accurately, stated in the note to Forth v. Stanton (1 Saund. 210, note b). The learned reporter says: "And in all cases of forbearance to sue, such forbearance must be either absolute or for a definite time, or for a reasonable time; forbearance for a little, or for some time, is not sufficient." The only qualification to be made is that in the absence of a specified time a reasonable time is held to be intended. (Oldershaw v. King, 2 H. & N. 517; Calkins v. Chandler, 36 Mich. 320.)¹⁸⁷ The note in question did not in law extend the payment of the debt. It was payable on demand, and although being payable with interest it was in form consistent with an intention that payment should not be immediately demanded, yet there was nothing on its face to prevent an immediate suit on the note against the maker or to recover the original debt. (Merritt v. Todd, 23 N. Y. 28; Shutts v. Fingar, 100 N. Y. 539.)

In the present case the agreement made is not left to inference, nor was it a case of request to forbear, followed by forbearance, in pursuance of the request, without any promise on the part of the creditor at the time. The plaintiff testified that there was an express agreement on his part to the effect that he would not pay the note away, nor put it in any bank for collection, but (using the words of the plaintiff) "I will hold it until such time as I want my money, I will make a demand on you for it." And again: "No, I will keep it until such time as I want it." Upon this alleged agreement the defendant endorsed the note. It would have been no violation of the plaintiff's promise if, immediately on receiving the note, he had commenced suit upon it. Such a suit would have been an assertion that he wanted the money and would have fulfilled the condition of forbearance. The debtor and the defendant, when they became parties to the note, may have had the hope or expectation that forbearance pursuance of the request implied by the promise. Snyder v. Leibengood, 4 Barr. 305; Cobb v. Page, 5 Harris 469; Shape v. Galbraith, 8 Casey, 10; Young v. Hill et al., 67 N. Y. 167. The question is one of fact, which can not be found affirmatively in the absence of proof. Ibid. And so, obviously, whether actual forbearance, following a promise to pay interest upon interest for forbearing, is evidence of an acceptance of the promise, is a question of fact. If, under all the circumstances in evidence throwing light upon the question, it is reasonable to believe the party acted upon the faith of and pursuant to the promise, a jury would be justified in finding that he so acted—otherwise not."

On mere forbearance to sue as consideration for a promise by a third person to pay an existing obligation, see 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 842, note.

would follow, and there was forbearance in fact. But there was no agreement to forbear for a fixed time or for a reasonable time, but an agreement to forbear for such time as the plaintiff should elect. The consideration is to be tested by the agreement, and not by what was done under it. It was a case of mutual promises, and so intended. We think the evidence failed to disclose any consideration for the defendant's endorsement, and that the trial court erred in refusing so to rule.

The order of the General Term reversing the judgment should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed for the defendant on the stipulation with costs in all courts.

Ordered accordingly.

WOOD v. LUCY, LADY DUFF-GORDON.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1917. 222 N. Y. 88, 118 N. E. 1082.)

Action by Otis F. Wood against Lucy, Lady Duff-Gordon. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (177 App. Div. 634, 164 N. Y. Supp. 576), which reversed an order denying defendant's motion for judgment on the pleading, and which dismissed the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

CARDOZO, J. The defendant styles herself "a creator of fashions." Her favor helps a sale. Manufacturers of dresses, millinery, and like articles are glad to pay for a certificate of her approval. The things which she designs, fabrics, parasols, and what not, have a new value in the public mind when issued in her name. She employed the plaintiff to help her to turn this vogue into money. He was to have the exclusive right, subject always to her approval, to place her indorsements on the designs of others. He was also to have the exclusive right to place her own designs on sale, or to license others to market them. In return she was to have one-half of "all profits and revenues" derived from any contracts he might make. The exclusive right was to last at least one year from April 1, 1915, and thereafter from year to year unless terminated by notice of 90 days. The plaintiff says that he kept the contract on his part, and that the defendant broke it. She placed her indorsement on fabrics, dresses, and millinery without his knowledge, and withheld the profits. He sues her for the damages, and the case comes here on demurrer.

The agreement of employment is signed by both parties. It has a wealth of recitals. The defendant insists, however, that it lacks the elements of a contract. She says that the plaintiff does not bind himself to anything. It is true that he does not promise in so many words that he will use reasonable efforts to place the defendant's indorsements and market her designs. We think, however, that such a promise is fairly to be implied. The law has outgrown its primitive stage of formalism when the precise word was the sovereign talisman, and every slip was fatal. It takes a broader view today. A promise may be lacking, and yet the whole writing may be "instinct with an obligation," imperfectly expressed (Scott, J., in McCall Co. v. Wright, 133 App. Div. 62, 117 N. Y. Supp. 775; Moran v. Standard Oil Co., 211 N. Y. 187, 198, 105 N. E. 217). If that is so, there is a contract.

The implication of a promise here finds support in many circumstances. The defendant gave an exclusive privilege. She was to have no right for at least a year to place her own indorsements or market her own designs except through the agency of the plaintiff. The acceptance of the exclusive agency was an assumption of its duties. Phoenix Hermetic Co. v. Filtrine Mfg. Co., 164 App. Div. 424, 150 N. Y. Supp. 193; W. G. Taylor Co. v. Bannerman, 120 Wis. 189, 97 N. W. 918; Mueller v. Mineral Spring Co., 88 Mich. 390, 50 N. W. 319. We are not to suppose that one party was to be placed at the mercy of the other. Hearn v. Stevens & Bro., 111 App. Div. 101, 106, 97 N. Y. Supp. 566; Russell v. Allerton, 108 N. Y. 288, 15 N. E. 391. Many other terms of the agreement point the same way. We are told at the outset by way of recital that:

"The said Otis F. Wood possesses a business organization adapted to the placing of such indorsements as the said Lucy, Lady Duff-Gordon, has approved."

The implication is that the plaintiff's business organization will be used for the purpose for which it is adapted. But the terms of the defendant's compensation are even more significant. Her sole compensation for the grant of an exclusive agency is to be one-half of all the profits resulting from the plaintiff's efforts. Unless he gave his efforts, she could never get anything. Without an implied promise, the transaction cannot have such business "efficacy, as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have." Bowen, L. J., in the Moorcock, 14 P. D. 64, 63. But the contract does not stop there. The plaintiff goes on to promise that he will account monthly for all moneys received by him, and that he will take out all such patents and copyrights and trade-marks as may in his judgment be necessary to protect the rights and articles affected by the agreement. It is true, of course, as the Appellate Division has said, that if he was under no duty to try to market designs or to place certificates of indorsement, his promise to account for profits or take out copyrights would be valueless. But in determining the intention of the parties the promise has a value. It helps to enforce the conclusion that the plaintiff had some duties. His promise to pay the defendant one-half of the profits and revenues resulting from the exclusive agency and to render accounts monthly was a promise to use reasonable efforts to bring profits and revenues into existence. For this conclusion the authorities are ample. Wilson v. Mechanical OrguINETTE Co., 170 N. Y. 542, 63 N. E. 550; Phoenix Hermetic Co. v. Filtrine Mfg. Co., supra; Jacquin v. Boutard, 89 Hun 437, 35 N. Y. Supp. 496; Id. 157 N. Y. 686, 51 N. E.

1091; Moran v. Standard Oil Co., supra; City of N. Y. v. Paoli, 202 N. Y. 18, 94 N. E. 1077; McIntyre v. Belcher, 14 C. B. [N. S.] 654; Devonald v. Rosser & Sons [1906] 2 K. B. 728; W. G. Taylor Co. v. Bannerman, supra; Mueller v. Mineral Spring Co., supra; Baker Transfer Co. v. Merchants' R. & I. Mfg. Co., 1 App. Div. 507, 37 N. Y. Supp. 276.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the order of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in the Appellate Division and in this court.

*Order reversed, etc.*¹⁸⁸

DEMENT BROS. CO. v. COON, ET UX.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1919. 104 Wash. 603, 177 Pac. 354.)

Action by the Dement Brothers Company against Carl Coon and Eva Coon, his wife. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

MITCHELL, J.¹⁸⁹ A transaction occurred between the parties to this action on August 4, 1916, and thereafter another, relating to the same subject-matter, both of which were reduced to writing and signed, as follows:

"August 4, 1916.

"I sell to Dement Bros. Co. 6,000 bushels of bluestem wheat basis No. one grade, 201 sacks turkey red wheat basis No. one grade and 500 bushels fortyfold wheat basis No. one grade all at $1.03½ per bushel f. o. b. Reese or Welland seller's option. Delivery to be made on or before Sept. 30, 1916.

Carl Coon.

"Confirmed:

"Dement Bros. Co., by Morrison."

* * * No wheat was delivered, and suit for damages followed.
* * * The court granted plaintiff's motion [for judgment notwithstanding the verdict] and entered judgment for the full amount of damages claimed. Defendants appeal. * * *

Errors assigned are expressed by three contentions of appellants as follows: (1) That said contract is void for want of mutuality. * * *

As to the first contention: The contract is an executory one, and evidently it was intended to be and is bilateral. Appellants argue that the contract contains no promise on the part of respondent to receive the wheat nor to pay for it. We are satisfied to the contrary. By the writing signed by Carl Coon, he said that he sells wheat to respondent, future delivery, at a stated price, f. o. b. at either of two places the seller prefers. Respondent wrote the word "confirmed" and signed it * * * The rule by which we determine the intent of the parties and the meaning or lack of meaning of such a written instrument does not encourage an attempt to charm or transform it into a word puzzle, nor to do otherwise than take the words and signatures in their ordinary, everyday, popular sense. The contract is not an option given by Carl Coon, nor is it a unilateral agreement, such as the offer of a reward. By it Carl Coon said he sells wheat, future delivery, at a certain price, to Dement Bros. Company. It is impossible to sell unless at the same time there is a purchaser. The one obligation must have its corresponding and correlative obligation. Therefore, when Carl Coon signed the contract he obligated himself to sell wheat, future delivery, at the price stated, to Dement Bros. Company, and, when the latter wrote on it the word "confirmed" and then signed it, respondent entered into the correlative obligation of purchasing wheat, future delivery, at the price stated, from Carl Coon. The same may be said with reference to the obligation of respondent to receive the wheat. Butler v. Thomson et al., 92 U. S. 412, 23 L. Ed. 684; Jordan v. Patterson, 67 Conn. 473, 35 Atl. 521. * * *

*Judgment affirmed.*¹⁹⁰

¹⁹⁰ "A contract includes not only what the parties said but also what is necessarily to be implied from what they said. (Milliken v. Western Union Tel. Co., 110 N. Y. 403, 408.) Thus the words 'cash on delivery' with no other promise to pay 'imply a promise and create an obligation' to make payment upon delivery. (Justice v. Lang, supra.) So the word 'sold' in a written agreement implies not only a contract to sell but also a contract to buy (Butler v. Thomson, 92 U. S. 412, 414); and a contract to buy with no express promise to sell implies the latter obligation. (Hudson Canal Co. v. Penn. Coal Co., 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 276, 289.) 'What is implied in an express contract is as much a part of it as what is expressed' [Bishop on Contracts (3d ed.), § 241]; for 'the law is a silent factor in every contract.' (Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 94, 95.)

"A mutual agreement implies an offer and acceptance, or a promise for a promise in some form, and if, as alleged, it was 'mutually agreed * * * that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $500 for such superintendence [of the work of altering the buildings of defendant,]' necessarily there was not only an express promise by the defendant to pay but also an implied promise by the plaintiff to superintend. (Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. 476, 479; Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14, 23; Hadden v. Dimick, 31 How. Pr. 196, 226; Stilwell v. Ocean Steamship Co., 5 App. Div. 212, 214; Jones & Co. v. Binford, 74 Me. 439; Foulks v. Falls, 91 Ind. 315, 320.) Payment of the sum named was to be made by the one for something to be done by the other, or for "such superintendence," and by necessary implication the service of superintendence was to be rendered by the plaintiff. His implied promise to superintend had the same effect as an express promise, and thus there was a promise for a promise, which constitutes a good consideration

HOLT v. WARD CLARENCIEUX.

(Court of King's Bench, 1732. 2 Strange, 937.)

The plaintiff declared that it was mutually agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that they should marry at a future day which is past, and that, in consideration of each other's promise, each engaged to the other; notwithstanding which the defendant did not marry the plaintiff, but had married another, which she lays to her damage of £4,000.

The defendant, with leave of the court, pleaded double; viz., non assumpsit, and that the plaintiff, at the time of the promise, was an infant of fifteen years of age.

The plaintiff joins issue on the non assumpsit, and a verdict is found for her, with £2,000 damages. And, as to the plea of infancy, demurred.

The Chief Justice, [Sir Robert Raymond,] delivered the resolution of the court.

The objection in this case is, that, the plaintiff not being bound equally with the defendant, this is nudum pactum, and the defendant cannot be charged in this action. Formerly it was made a doubt by my Lord Vaughan whether any action could be maintained on mutual promises to marry; but that is now a point not to be disputed.¹⁹¹ And as to the present case, we should have had no difficulty in giving judgment for the plaintiff, if we could have been satisfied by the arguments of the civilians that, as the plaintiff was of the age of consent, any remedy, though not by and also makes the engagement mutual." Vann, J., in Grossman v. Schenker, 306 N. Y. 466, 469 (1912).

"A 'promise' is an express undertaking or agreement to carry the purpose into effect; a declaration which binds the person who makes it, either in honor, conscience, or law, to do or forbear a certain specific act. It is a declaration which gives to the person to whom made a right to expect or claim the performance of some particular thing. 32 Cyc. 633. In Harrow v. Dugan, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 341, the words 'I have borrowed so much money' were held to import a promise to pay. In Cheatham v. Cheatham, 6 Ky. Op. 450, a writing executed by an administrator, stating there is due a certain person as his share of the estate $200, 'to be paid' was properly treated, not as an agreement to pay the debt out of the administrator's individual funds, but as the evidence of a fiducial liability, and therefore was not affected by the bankruptcy of the administrator individually. The expression in a writing, 'to be paid in solvent notes,' was held in Williams v. Sims, 22 Ala. 512, to be a contract on the part of the maker to pay the sum specified. The words 'to be paid' and 'payable' were treated as convertible terms. In Webster's New International Dictionary 'promise' is defined as:

"To engage to do, give or make; to covenant; to engage; to afford reason to expect." * * *

"The words 'to be paid,' as used in the mortgage, import an undertaking or agreement that the debt would be settled, an obligation to see to its payment; that is, a promise to pay." Quin, J., in Hoskins v. Black (Ky.) 226 S. W. 384, 385-386 (1920).

¹⁹¹In Harrison v. Cage, 5 Mod. 411 (1698), the point was settled. It was there held that the man could sue the woman for breach of promise.

way of action for damages could be had against her. But since they seem to have had no precedent in the case, we must consider it upon the foot of the common law. And upon that the single question is, whether this contract, as against the plaintiff, was absolutely void. And we are all of opinion that this contract is not void, but only voidable at the election of the infant; and as to the person of full age it absolutely binds.

The contract of an infant is considered in law as different from the contracts of all other persons. In some cases his contract shall bind him; such is the contract of an infant for necessities, and the law allows him to make this contract as necessary for his preservation; and therefore in such case a single bill shall bind him, though a bond with a penalty shall not. 1 Lev. 87.

Where the contract may be for the benefit of the infant, or to his prejudice, the law so far protects him as to give him an opportunity to consider it when he comes of age; and it is good or voidable at his election. Cro. Car. 502; 2 Rol. 24, 427; Hob. 69; 1 Brownl. 11; 1 Sid. 41; 1 Vent. 21; 1 Mod. 25; Sir W. Jones, 164. But though the infant has this privilege, yet the party with whom he contracts has not; he is bound in all events. And as marriage is now looked upon to be an advantageous contract, and no distinction holds whether the party suing be man or woman, but the true distinction is whether it may be for the benefit of the infant, we think, that though no express case upon a marriage contract can be cited, yet it falls within the general reason of the law with regard to infants' contracts. And no dangerous consequence can follow from this determination, because our opinion protects the infant even more than if we rule the contract to be absolutely void. And as to persons of full age, it leaves them where the law leaves them, which grants them no such protection against being drawn into inconvenient contracts.

For these reasons we are all of opinion that the plaintiff ought to have her judgment upon the demurrer.¹⁹²

See Wright v. Buchanan, 287 Ill. 468 (1919); Voorhees v. Walt, 15 N. J. L. 343 (1836); O'Rourke v. John Hancock L. Ins. Co., 23 R. I. 457 (1902).

In Holmes v. Rice, 45 Mich. 142, 7 N. W. 772 (1881). Marston, C. J., said: "The law in recognizing the incapacity of infants to enter into certain contracts and declaring such contracts voidable does so for the infant's protection. Their contracts are not void but voidable, and it is for the infant to avoid the contract or ratify it, and not within the power of a stranger, certainly not of a wrongdoer, to set up the infant's incapacity to contract as a protection to himself. The contract though voidable, at the option

ALLEN, by his guardian STEPHENS v. BERRYHILL.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1869. 27 Iowa 534, 1 Am. Rep. 309.)

DILLON, C. J.¹⁹⁸ In substance this action is one to recover judgment upon the notes made by the defendant to Allen [a person of unsound mind.] * * *

The peculiarity of the case now under consideration consists in the fact that the representative of the party alleged to be insane, and with whom the contract was made, is the party seeking to have it enforced. It is the sane party to the contract that makes defense, and the defense is that the other party to the contract was totally insane at the time it was entered into. * * * This circumstance is regarded as important, and as distinguishing the case from those in which it is the insane party who pleads his incapacity and seeks to prevent the sane party to the contract from enforcing it against him.

It is the opinion of the court, that justice and sound policy concur of the infant, is valid as to third parties who are strangers to both parties to the contract, and not claiming under either."

In Baldwin, Executrix v. Van Deusen, 37 N. Y. 487 (1868) the action was by an executrix, against Norman Van Deusen, upon a promissory note made by the defendant for $85, the purchase price of another promissory note made by an infant, named Onley, who had refused payment on the ground that he was a minor. At the time of the sale of the infant's note, the plaintiff agreed with the defendant merely that the note was the genuine note of Onley, the maker. Because Onley did not pay his note, the defendant offered to rescind the contract of sale of the Onley note, and return the same to the plaintiff, on the ground that Onley was an infant, and demanded a return of the note in suit. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, Grover, J., said: "The sale by the plaintiff to the defendant of the Onley note, constituted a good consideration for the note in suit. Although Onley was an infant, that did not make his note void; he had the right to ratify it, upon coming of age, and thus render it entirely valid. (Roof v. Stafford, 7 Cow. 169, and cases cited.) This ratification required no new consideration. The Onley note was not entirely without value, and unless this appeared the consideration of the note in suit was valid." And Woodruff, J., said: "The purchaser may, if he will, take upon himself the hazard or chance that the infant will pay the note which he has signed, and if he chooses to pay, or promises to pay, therefor, he will be bound."

In England by the Infants Relief Act of 1874 many contracts of infants are absolutely void (see note 87 to Kent v. Rand, reported, ante, p. 295). Contracts which are not made void by statute and which are for the infant's benefit are binding there. Clements v. London & N. W. R. Co. [1894], 2 Q. B. 482; Stephens v. Dudbridge Iron Works Co. [1894], 2 K. B. 225; Roberts v. Gray [1913], 1 K. B. 520. The English common law rule is followed in Rhode Island. Pardey v. American Ship Windlass Co., 20 R. I. 147 (1897). But the great weight of authority in the United States is that the infant's contract is voidable by him, even though beneficial to him.

On the infant's capacity to contract, see 18 Am. St. Rep. 573, note.

¹⁹⁸The statement of facts, parts of the opinion of Dillon, C. J., and all of the dissenting opinion of Cole, J., are omitted.

in requiring it to hold, as it does, that where a contract has been entered into (under circumstances which would ordinarily make it binding) by a sane person with one who is insane, and that contract has been adopted and is sought to be enforced by the representatives of the latter, it is no defense to the sane party merely to show that the other party was non compos mentis at the time the contract was made.

There are obvious reasons, founded on the justice and propriety of protecting those whom the visitations of providence have incapacitated from protecting themselves, against contracts which are discovered to be prejudicial to their interests. Their incapacity to contract is a shield which the law places in their own hands to protect them, not a sword in the hands of others with which to cut down their rights.

If a person who is of unsound mind, or who is afterwards shown to have been of unsound mind, shall chance to make a contract which is really advantageous to him, can a satisfactory reason be given why he should not have the right to enforce it? No such reason occurs to us.

The reason advanced by the appellant is, that in law two minds must concur to make a contract; that where one of the parties is insane there are not two minds capable of contracting; hence there is and can be no contract; and, therefore, no liability by either party to the other thereon. It cannot be denied that there is to the legal mind, prone to draw and often delighting to indulge in refined and acute distinctions, much that is plausible in the ground here assumed. But, after all, is that ground really tenable?

As applied to this case, the defendant says to the plaintiff: "You cannot recover because you have no contract." The plaintiff replies, "But I have a contract: here it is: it consists in your own notes." Now what does the defendant rejoin: "I admit you have my notes, but, though signed by me, they are not, in legal contemplation, my act, because you had no power to agree to take them." Is this rejoinder not subtle rather than substantial? In fact, the plaintiff has the promise or contract of the defendant, and, if fairly obtained, it ought to be no defense to a sane defendant, that the plaintiff's mind was not sound at the time the contract was made. The objection relied on by the defendant is one of the many difficulties which have arisen out of the use of the words "void" and "voidable," and the uncertain extent of meaning attached to them.

The conclusion which we reach derives a very strong support in the analogies of the law. Thus, if an infant make a contract with one of full age it may, as is well known, be enforced by the infant against the adult, but not by the adult against the infant, if the latter pleads (and the plea is purely personal) his disability.

So also the same doctrine applies to the disability of coverture. And this court has decided, that, while, as a general rule, it is true that the discharge of a principal releases a surety, yet it holds that "where a person sui juris becomes surety for a married woman, a minor, or other person incapable of contracting," the surety is bound, notwithstanding a successful plea of disability on the part of the principal. Jones v. Crosthwaite, 17 Iowa 393, 396, and cases cited.

Another illustration: delivery is essential to a deed, and acceptance essential to delivery, and there can be no acceptance without mental assent. This is a general rule of law, and yet a deed made to an infant or to a lunatic, although there be no mental capacity capable of understanding the nature of the instrument, is valid. The law supplies or presumes the requisite assent to an act beneficial to the party; or it dispenses with it.

So here. Where a person of unsound mind makes a contract which is beneficial to him, the law supplies or presumes the existence of the requisite capacity, or, for his protection, estops the other party to set up and sustain this objection.

The subject might be further elaborated, but it is scarcely needful to do so. * * *

[Order sustaining demurrer to answer]

*Affirmed.*¹⁹⁴

¹⁹⁴"An insane person, * * * not a raving madman or an idiot, is capable of an act, even if his act be voidable. The promise of an insane man is not absolutely void. Carrier v. Sears, 4 Allen, 336, 337; Bullard v. Moor, 158 Mass. 418, 424. So that it cannot be argued that the contract was formally defective and void because only one party had done the necessary overt act. A voidable promise is a sufficient consideration. Plympton v. Dunn, 148 Mass. 523, 527. If a person unwittingly dealing with an insane man were given the right to avoid his contract when he found out the fact, it would be on grounds of policy and fairness, and of course it would be possible to read in a condition or personal exception to that effect. But there seems to be no more reason to do it in this case than when a man has contracted with an infant. The general rule is that a man takes the risk of facts which he deems material, unless he expressly stipulates for them in his contract, or unless he is misled by a fraudulent misrepresentation. See Ring v. Phoenix Assurance Co., 145 Mass. 426, 429. The right to avoid is for the personal protection of the insane, and those who deal with them have been held to have no corresponding rights in all the cases which we have seen. * * * We express no opinion as to the law in case of a bilateral contract wholly unexecuted on both sides." Holmes, J., in Atwell v. Jenkins, 163 Mass. 362, 363-364 (1895).

The contracts of lunatics not under guardianship are generally treated as voidable only by the infant as above. But some cases hold the contracts of lunatics void. American Trust & Banking Co. v. Boone, 102 Ga. 202 (1897); Bursinger v. Bank of Watertown, 67 Wis. 75 (1886). Still others are inclined to accept the English view that if the other party does not know that the lunatic was so insane as not to be capable of understanding what he was about the contract is binding on the lunatic (Imperial Loan Co. v. Stone [1892], 1 Q. B. 601), provided the contract is so far executed that the parties cannot be put in status quo and no advantage was taken of the lunatic. Merry v. Bergfeld, 264 Ill. 84 (1914); Bokemper v. Hazen, 96 Ia. 221 (1895); Swartwood v. Chance, 131 Ia. 714 (1906); Gribben v. Maxwell, 34 Kan. 8 (1885); *Flach v. BIDWELL v. CATTON.

(At Nisi Prius, 1618. Hobart, 216.)

Bidwell, an attorney, brought an action of the case against Catton, executor of Reve, and counted that, whereas he had in Michaelmas Term, 14 Jac., prosecuted an attachment of privilege against Reve the testator, returnable in Hill. Term, the testator knowing of it, in consideration that, at his request, the plaintiff would forbear to prosecute the said writ any further against the testator, the testator did promise to pay him 50 pounds and then avers, &c. And after a verdict it was excepted in arrest of judgment:

First, that it was not alleged that the plaintiff had any just cause of (1896). It is to be noticed therefore that Iowa has thus restricted the cases where the contracts are voidable by the lunatic.

If the lunatic is under guardianship at the time of the alleged contract, the general rule is that the contract is void. Church v. Rosenstein, 85 Conn. 279 (1912); Barnham v. Kidwell, 113 Ill. 425 (1885).

On the capacity of insane persons to contract, see 71 Am. St. Rep. 638, note.

DRUNKENNESS. Drunkenness is a matter of degree, and the courts do not look with the same favor on this defense as on insanity. See Burroughs v. Richman, 1 Green (13 N. J. L.) 233, 238 (1832); Oakley v. Shelley, 129 Ala. 467 (1900). But if it is extreme enough it is dealt with in the same way, in general, as the defense of insanity. In some states extreme intoxication, preventing a contracting mind, makes the contract void. Shackleton v. Sebree, 86 Ill. 616 (1877); Hunter v. Tolbard, 47 W. Va. 258 (1899). But in most states it is only voidable by the drunkard.

In Mansfield v. Watson, 2 Iowa 111 (1855), Wright, C. J., said: "In law, the acts of the drunkard are avoided on the ground of incompetency; in equity, on that of fraud. But as mere moderate drunkenness does not deprive the mind of the power of rational consent, and is not always apparent to others, it should not of itself avoid any deed or contract. In order to avoid the deed or contract, there must be that state of excessive drunkenness which deprives the person of the consciousness of what he is doing. This is the modern English doctrine, and that followed by the courts of this country, as well as of France. Ray's Med. Ins. of Ins., § 450; Story's Eq. Jur., § 231. And this excessive drunkenness is a defense, whether voluntary, or caused by the fraud or procurement of the other party to the contract. 2 Greenl. Ev., § 374. But there may be such contrivance or management on the part of the plaintiff, to draw the party into drink, and thus to take advantage of his intoxication, as would justify the interposition of a court of equity, on the ground of fraud, even where the drunkenness is less than excessive. Story's Eq. Jur., § 231. In either event, such intoxication only renders the contract voidable, and not void, and the party, on recovering his understanding, may adopt the same. Story on Cont., § 27; Reiniker v. Smith, 2 Har. & John. (Md.) 423; Reynolds v. Waller's Heirs, 1 Wash. 164."

See Martin v. Harsh, 231 Ill. 384 (1907).

In Bawlf Grain Co. v. Ross, 55 Canada Sup. Ct. Rep. 232 (1917), the court divided over whether the fact that a drunken man, with whom a contract was made for the sale of wheat for future delivery, was bound where he did not disaffirm within a reasonable time after becoming sober. The majority held the contract voidable only and subject to ratification and ratified if not disaffirmed action.

Secondly, that this action still remains. * * *

But the court¹⁹⁵ nevertheless gave judgment: For first, suits are not presumed causeless, and the promise argues cause, in that he desired to stay off the suit.¹⁹⁶ Quere, if the defendant had averred that there was no cause of suit.

Secondly, though this did not require a discharge of the action, yet it requires a loss of the writ, and a delay of the suit, which was both a benefit to the one, and a loss to the other. * * *

within a reasonable time. The minority held that it was not binding where only lapse of time without disaffirmance was shown. Most courts in the United States agree with the majority opinion. See Wright v. Waller, 127 Ala. 557 (1900). But see Reinskopf v. Rogge, 37 Ind. 207 (1871).

DURESS. In United States, Lyon, et al. v. Huckabee, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 414, 432 (1872), Clifford, J., said: "Unlawful duress is a good defense to a contract, if it includes such degree of constraint or danger, either actually inflicted or threatened and impending as is sufficient in severity or apprehension to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness. Chitty on Contracts, 217; 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, 283. Decided cases may be found which deny that contracts procured by menace of a mere battery to the person, or of trespass to lands, or loss of goods, can be avoided on that account, as such threats, it is said, are not of a nature to overcome the will of a firm and prudent man; but many other decisions of high authority adopt a more liberal rule, and hold that contracts procured by threats of battery to the person, or of destruction of property, may be avoided by proof of such facts, because, in such a case, there is nothing but the form of a contract without the substance. Foshay v. Ferguson, 5 Hill. (N. Y.) 158; Central Bk. v. Copeland, 18 Md. 317; Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 12; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., 9th ed. 239. Positive menace of battery to the person, or of trespass to lands, or of destruction of goods, may undoubtedly be, in many cases, sufficient to overcome the mind and will of a person entirely competent, in all other respects, to contract, and it is clear that a contract made under such circumstances is as utterly without the voluntary consent of the party menaced as if he were induced to sign it by actual violence; nor is the reason assigned for the more stringent rule, that he should rely upon the law for redress, satisfactory, as the law may not afford him anything like a sufficient and adequate compensation for the injury. Baker v. Morton, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 158."

See Ann. Cas. 1917C, 1031, note.

¹⁹⁵ Part of the report of the case is omitted.

¹⁹⁶ "It has been ruled by this court that the compromise of matters in dispute between parties or litigants, in the absence of fraud, is of itself a sufficient consideration to uphold a contract of settlement which, when made, was binding on both parties. Wyatt v. Evins, 52 Ala. 285; Allen v. Prater, 30 Ala. 458. On a subsequent appeal in the latter case (35 Ala. 169), it is said that the mere existence of a controversy, with no suit pending, without more, is not a sufficient consideration to support a verbal settlement; that there must in addition, be some reasonable ground for the controversy. This has been frequently repeated by this court. Crawford v. Engram, 157 Ala. 321.

LOYD v. LEE.

(At Nisi Prius, 1718. 1 Strange, 94.)

A married woman gives a promissory note as a feme sole; and after her husband's death, in consideration of forbearance, promises to pay it. And now in an action against her it was insisted that though she being under coverture at the time of giving the note, it was voidable for that reason; yet by her subsequent promise, when she was of ability to make a promise, she had made herself liable, and the forbearance was a new consideration. But the Chief Justice [Pratt] held the contrary, and that the note was not barely voidable but absolutely void; and forbearance, where originally there is no cause of action, is no consideration to raise an assumpsit. But he said it might be otherwise where the contract was but voidable. And so the plaintiff was called.¹⁹⁷

WADE v. SIMEON.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1846. 2 C. B. 548.)

TINDAL, C. J.¹⁹⁸ The only question now remaining is upon the demurrer to the fourth plea. I am of opinion that the fourth plea is a good and valid plea, on general demurrer. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff had commenced an action against the defendant in the Exchequer, to recover two sums of £1300 and £700 respectively, which action was about to be tried, and that, in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear proceeding in that action, until December 14th then next, the defendant promised the plaintiff that he would on that day pay the money, with interest and costs; that the plaintiff, confiding in the defendant's promise, forbore prosecuting the action, and stayed the proceedings until the day named; but that the defendant did not pay the money or the costs. The fourth plea states that the plaintiff never had any cause of action against the defendant in respect of the subject-matter of the action in the Court of Exchequer, which he, the plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of the said action, and hence until the time of the making the promise in the first count mentioned, well knew. By demurring to that plea, the plaintiff admits that he had no cause of action against the defendant in the action therein mentioned, and that he knew it. It appears to me, therefore, that he is estopped from saying that there was any valid consideration for the defendant's promise. It is almost contra bonos mores, and certainly contrary to all the principles of natural justice, that a man should institute proceedings against another, when he is conscious that he has no good cause of action. In order to constitute a binding promise, the plaintiff must show a good consideration, something beneficial to the defendant, or detrimental to the plaintiff. Detrimental to the plaintiff it cannot be, if he has no cause of action; and beneficial to the defendant it cannot be; for, in contemplation of law, the defense upon such an admitted state of facts must be successful, and the defendant will recover costs, which must be assumed to be a full compensation for all the legal damage he may sustain. The consideration, therefore, altogether fails. On the part of the plaintiff it has been urged, that the cases cited for the defendant were not cases where actions had already been brought, but only cases of promises, to forbear commencing proceedings. I must, however, confess that, if that were so, I do not see that it would make any substantial difference. * * * The defendant asserts, and the plaintiff admits, that there never was any cause of action in the original suit and that the plaintiff knew it. I therefore think the fourth plea affords a very good answer, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment thereon.

CRESSWELL, J. * * * It has been surmised, in the course of the argument, that there is a distinction between abstaining from commencing an action and forbearing to prosecute one already commenced. In the older cases I find no such distinction. Lord Coke lays it down broadly that the staying of an action that has been unjustly brought is no consideration for a promise to pay money. I cannot help thinking, on general principles, that the staying proceedings in an action brought without any cause is no good consideration for a promise such as is relied on here. The plea, in plain terms, avers that the plaintiff never had any cause of action, and that he well knew it. Are we to assume that the defendant might, by some slip in pleading, have failed in his defense to that action, if it had proceeded? I think not. On general demurrer the plea appears to me to be sufficient * * * ¹⁹⁰ See Melcher v. Insurance Co. of Pa., 97 Me. 512 (1903); Elmengreen v. Kern (Wis.) 182 N. W. 947 (1921).

In Smith v. Monteith, 13 M. & W. 426 (1844), the action was on a promise by defendant made to secure and which did secure the discharge from arrest of one C. J., Dunlop, in a civil action brought against Dunlop by the plaintiffs. After argument on special demurrer to the plea, Pollock, C. B., said: "The substance of the plea is that there was not any claim or demand or cause of action, in respect of which the plaintiffs were entitled to sue the defendant in the former action; but there is no averment that the plaintiffs were aware of that; and for anything that is stated in the plea, the original inception of that action was perfectly bona fide, although the plaintiffs may have been mistaken as to their remedy or the form of proceedings adopted by them. The plea goes on to state, that the plaintiffs did not, by discharging Dunlop, give up or part with any available remedy against him. The words 'available remedy' are rather loose and vague; they may mean several things; they would be satisfied by the fact of Dunlop being a mere pauper, for it is not stated that the plaintiffs had no legal right or remedy which they gave up, but merely that

HERRING v. DORELL.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1840. 8 Dowling's Practice Cases, 604.)

R. V. Richards showed cause against a rule nisi, obtained by V. Williams for arrest of judgment or a new trial in this case. The case had been tried before the sheriff of Brecon, and a verdict found in favor of the plaintiff for £2 10s. 1d. The ground of seeking to arrest the judgment was, that no sufficient consideration for the promise by the defendant was disclosed on the face of the declaration. The substance of the declaration was that a person named Watkins and a person named Voss were joint debtors to the plaintiff. The plaintiff proceeded against them, and ultimately took Watkins and Voss in execution. An arrangement was made between Watkins and the plaintiff, and accordingly the former was discharged out of custody. Voss remained in custody, and in consideration of the discharge of Voss, the declaration alleged that the defendant undertook to pay the sum of £2 10s. 1d. due from Voss to the plaintiff, and Voss was accordingly discharged. It was contended, in support of the rule, that the plaintiff having discharged Watkins, who was they had no available remedy. So also those words would be satisfied if there were some latent defect which might appear in pleading or come out in evidence; yet the action might be honestly commenced, and the claim founded in justice; and it cannot be said that, because the proceedings were open to such latent defect, the defendant's promise would not be founded on a good consideration. And this is the only part of the plea as to which there is any averment of the plaintiff's knowledge. It then goes on to say that the action against Dunlop was not brought for the purpose of trying any doubtful or contested right. It seems to me that the declaration in its form calls for an answer, and that this plea is no sufficient answer. I agree with the general scope of Mr. Peacock's argument. If a party does an illegal act, or if he abuses the process of the court to make it the instrument of oppression or extortion, that is a fraud on the law; and if the original arrest, or the continuance of that arrest, were of that character, and were shown to be so by proper averments in the plea, that would very probably constitute a good defence to an action like the present. But this plea falls far short of that, the arrest being legal, and there being no averment of knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs except that they knew they did not part with any available remedy by discharging Dunlop out of custody. It does not, therefore, contain a sufficient statement in fact to bring it within the scope of Mr. Peacock's argument or the cases cited by him. The judgment must therefore be for the plaintiffs."

In Anderson v. Nystrom, 103 Minn. 168 (1908), it was held that a promise to make an insolvent estate of a deceased person no trouble on account of notes barred by the statute of limitations did not constitute a consideration for a promissory note given by the heirs of the deceased. Brown, J., said: "The old notes were outlawed and the estate was insolvent. Defendants were neither legally nor morally bound to pay them and there was no trouble plaintiff could make, conceding that a promise to refrain therefrom would constitute a sufficient consideration for the new note. Whatever efforts plaintiff would have been able to make to collect the old notes from the estate would have been fruitless. He lost nothing by his promise, and was deprived, at most, of a little recreation in pursuing in the probate court an insolvent estate."

jointly liable with Voss, that had the effect of entitling Voss to his discharge.

Richards submitted that even after the discharge of Watkins, some step being necessary, in order to obtain the discharge of Voss, some portion of his imprisonment, until that step could be taken, must be considered as lawful. * * * In the present case Voss was not taken in execution after the discharge of Watkins, but both were legally in custody at the time of Watkins' discharge. The detention of one prisoner in such a case could not be considered as a trespass. But suppose it should be said that the plaintiff was bound to take steps to discharge Voss. If he was, he was entitled to a reasonable time for that purpose. During the time that elapsed before his actual discharge he was in legal custody. That custody furnished a sufficient consideration to support the defendant's promise.

V. Williams in support of the rule. This was an action on a promise alleged to have been made by the defendant to pay a certain debt due from Voss, who was in custody, if the plaintiff would release him. The joint debt of the two had, in point of law, been satisfied, by taking defendants, Watkins and Voss, in execution and discharging Watkins out of custody. It was, therefore, no consideration for the plaintiff to consent to the discharge of Voss out of custody, since it was that to which he was absolutely entitled. * * *

COLERIDGE, J. The question in this case, whether this was a good consideration or not, depends upon the situation of Voss at the time of his discharge. Both he and Watkins had been taken under a joint execution. Watkins made certain terms with the plaintiff, and the latter voluntarily discharged him. No terms were made as to the situation of Voss, his rights were, therefore, to be considered according to the situation in which the law had placed him. Suppose Watkins alone had been in custody, it is clear that the voluntary discharge of him would have been a discharge of the debt, and no other proceedings could have been taken to recover it. It seems to me in the same way that the discharge of Watkins operated to release Voss his co-debtor. I think, therefore, both on principle and authority that this rule ought to be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

COOK v. WRIGHT.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1861. 1 Best & Smith, 559.)

BLACKBURN, J. In this case it appeared on the trial that the defendant was agent for a Mrs. Bennett, who was non-resident owner of houses in a district subject to a local act. Works had been done in the adjoining street by the commissioners for executing the act, the expenses of which, under the provisions of their act, they charged on the owners of the adjoining houses. Notice had been given to the defendant, as if he had himself been owner of the houses, calling on him to pay the proportion chargeable in respect of them. He attended at a board meeting of the commissioners, and objected both to the amount and nature of the charge, and also stated that he was not the owner of the houses, and that Mrs. Bennett was. He was told that if he did not pay he would be treated as one Goble had been. It appeared that Goble had refused to pay a sum charged against him as owner of some houses, and the commissioners had taken legal proceedings against him, and he had then submitted and paid with costs. In the result it was agreed between the commissioners and the defendant that the amount charged upon him should be reduced, and that time should be given to pay it in three instalments; he gave three promissory notes for the three instalments; the first was duly honored, the others were not, and were the subject of the present action. At the trial it appeared that the defendant was not in fact owner of the houses. As agent for the owner he was not personally liable under the act. In point of law, therefore, the commissioners were not entitled to claim the money from him; but no case of deceit was alleged against them. It must be taken that the commissioners honestly believed that the defendant was personally liable, and really intended to take legal proceedings against him, as they had done against Goble. The defendant, according to his own evidence, never believed that he was liable in law, but signed the notes in order to avoid being sued as Goble was. Under these circumstances the substantial question reserved (irrespective of the form of the plea) was whether there was any consideration for the notes. We are of opinion that there was.

There is no doubt that a bill or note given in consideration of what is supposed to be a debt is without consideration if it appears that there was a mistake in fact as to the existence of the debt, (Bell v. Gardiner, 4 M. & Gr. 11); and, according to the cases of Southall v. Rigg and Forman v. Wright, 11 C. B. 481, the law is the same if the bill or note is given in consequence of a mistake of law as to the existence of the debt. But here there was no mistake on the part of the defendant either of law or fact. What he did was not merely the making an erroneous account stated, or promising to pay a debt for which he mistakingly believed himself liable. It appeared on the evidence that he believed himself not to be liable; but he knew that the plaintiffs thought him liable, and would sue him if he did not pay, and in order to avoid the expense and trouble of legal proceedings against himself he agreed to compromise; and the question is, whether a person who has given a note as a compromise of a claim honestly made on him, and which but for that compromise would have been at once brought to a legal decision, can resist the payment of the note on the ground that the original claim thus compromised might have been successfully resisted.

If the suit had been actually commenced, the point would have been concluded by authority. In Longridge v. Dorville [5 B. & A. 117,] it was held that the compromise of a suit instituted to try a doubtful question of law was a sufficient consideration for a promise. In Atlee v. Blackhouse, 3 M. & W. 633, where the plaintiff's goods had been seized by the excise, and he had afterwards entered into an agreement with the commissioners of excise that all proceedings should be terminated, the goods delivered up to the plaintiff, and a sum of money paid by him to the commissioners, Parke, B., rests his judgment, p. 650, on the ground that this agreement of compromise honestly made was for consideration, and binding. In Cooper v. Parker, 15 Com. B. 822, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the withdrawal of an untrue defense of infancy in a suit, with payment of costs, was a sufficient consideration for a promise to accept a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger.

In these cases, however, litigation had been actually commenced; and it was argued before us that this made a difference in point of law, and that though, where a plaintiff has actually issued a writ against a defendant, a compromise honestly made is binding, yet the same compromise, if made before the writ actually issues, though the litigation is impending, is void. Edwards v. Baugh [11 M. & W. 641,] was relied upon as an authority for this proposition. But in that case Lord Abinger expressly bases his judgment (pp. 645, 646) on the assumption that the declaration did not, either expressly or impliedly, show that a reasonable doubt existed between the parties. It may be doubtful whether the declaration in that case ought not to have been construed as disclosing a compromise of a real bona fide claim, but it does not appear to have been so construed by the court. We agree that unless there was a reasonable claim on the one side, which it was bona fide intended to pursue, there would be no ground for a compromise; but we cannot agree that (except as a test of the reality of the claim in fact) the issuing of a writ is essential to the validity of the compromise. The position of the parties must necessarily be altered in every case of compromise, so that, if the question is afterward opened up they cannot be replaced as they were before the compromise. The plaintiff may be in a less favorable position for renewing his litigation, he must be at an additional trouble and expense in again getting up his case, and he may no longer be able to produce the evidence which would have proved it originally. Besides, though he may not in point of law be bound to refrain from enforcing his rights against third persons during the continuance of the compromise, to which they are not parties, yet practically the effect of the compromise must be to prevent his doing so. For instance, in the present case, there can be no doubt that the practical effect of the compromise must have been to induce the commissioners to refrain from taking proceedings against Mrs. Bennett, the real owner of the houses, while the notes given by the defendant, her agent, were running; though the compromise might have afforded no ground of defense had such proceedings been resorted to. It is this detriment to the party consenting to a compromise arising from the necessary alteration in his position which, in our opinion forms the real consideration for the promise, and not the technical and almost illusory consideration arising from the extra cost of litigation. The real consideration therefore depends, not on the actual commencement of a suit, but on the reality of the claim made and the bona fides of the compromise.

In the present case we think that there was sufficient consideration for the notes in the compromise made as it was.

The rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff must be made absolute.

*Rule absolute.*²⁰⁰

SMITH v. FARRA.

(Supreme Court of Oregon, 1891. 21 Ore. 395, 28 Pac. 241, 20 L. R. A. 115.)

Action by Cyrus Smith against G. R. Farra and D. B. Montieth to recover $700 on an agreement of compromise between plaintiff and the defendant Farra. Judgment for plaintiff. Farra appeals. Affirmed.

On July 24, 1888, defendant, Farra, and one Montieth, for $305 cash, ²⁰⁰ "A bona fide claim, with a color of right, although there be in fact no right, so long as the party asserting it does not know he has no right, and acts in good faith, is sufficient to sustain a compromise; for a party may buy his peace in a case in which he knows there is no right against him.

"There would be no such thing as a compromise or settlement of a dispute by the party if the original controversy was not thereby closed." Manning, J., in Gates v. Shutts, 7 Mich. 127, 132 (1859).

"But a party may buy his peace, and when an action is brought against one who compromises it by the payment of money, he cannot recover the money back on the ground that had the litigation been pursued the plaintiff would have failed in his case. This is elementary; and if it is true, then it follows that a contract for the compromise of such litigation may be enforced." Irvine, C., in Carter White Lead Co. v. Kinlin, 47 Neb. 409, 416-417 (1896).

"It is the settled law of this state that if a debt or claim be disputed or contingent at the time of payment the payment when accepted of a part of the whole debt is a good satisfaction and it matters not that there was no solid foundation for the dispute. The test in such cases is, was the dispute honest or fraudulent? If honest it affords the basis for an accord between the parties, which the law favors, the execution of which is the satisfaction. (Simons v. American Legion of Honor, 178 N. Y. 263.)

"The law wisely favors settlements and where there is a real and genuine contest between the parties and a settlement is had without fraud or misrepresentation for an amount determined upon as a compromise between the conflicting claims such settlement should be upheld, although such amount is materially less than the amount claimed by the person to whom it is paid." Chase, J., in Post v. Thomas, 212 N. Y. 264, 272-273 (1914).

sold and conveyed by deed containing covenants of title and warranty, lots 7 and 8 in block 4, in West Yaquina, Benton County, Or., to plaintiff. In August, 1890, Farra discovering that he and Montieth did not own the property sold to plaintiff, wrote him the following letter: "Corvallis, Oregon, Aug. 7th, 1890. Mr. Cyrus Smith, Amity, Or.—Dear Sir: The men who have been engaged in getting up an abstract of Benton county have made a discovery that we sold you two lots—Nos. 7 and 8, in block 4, in West Yaquina—that had been sold and deeded before to Mr. W. P. Keady. We would like you to select two other lots in or near those, or even in some other portion, of about the same value, and we will deed them to you. Yours, respectfully, G. R. Farra." To this letter plaintiff replied as follows: "Amity, Oregon, Aug. 11th, 1890. Dr. G. R. Farra—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 7th inst. is at hand, and in reply will say I was very much surprised to hear that Mr. Keady had a deed made prior to mine to the lots in West Yaquina that you had deeded to me. I was also a little diverted at the idea that you should say, 'The lots Mr. Buford sold you,' when the record shows that you and Mr. Montieth sold me the lots, and Mr. Buford not known in the transaction. I have had those lots in a real-estate man's hands for some time. He has been instructed by me to sell the two for one thousand dollars, and nothing less. I have been offered eight hundred dollars for them, and refused it. I have taken counsel in the matter, and have been told that beyond a doubt I could recover from you and Mr. Montieth all the damage it is to me, but, as I am averse to lawsuits, I had much rather settle the matter ourselves, providing I can do so without too much loss. Please write me how it happened that you deeded those lots to me after you had deeded them to Mr. Keady. In regard to taking other lots in place of them, I would do so, providing I could get what I consider a fair deal. I know every foot of that ground, and excepting about six lots, I would rather have those lots than any other two lots in West Yaquina. Please send me a plat of West Yaquina, marking all the lots sold. Also make me an offer of what you propose to do, and oblige, yours truly, Cyrus Smith." Several other letters of both parties appear in the record, which are unnecessary to be set out here, but which show an honest, bona fide attempt on the part of each to arrive at some satisfactory settlement of the controversy, but, without being able to do so, until September 8, 1890, when plaintiff wrote to defendant the following letter: "Amity, Sept. 8th, 1890. Dr. G. R. Farra—Dear Sir: Yours in answer to my inquiry as to your least cash price on certain lots in West Yaquina came to hand over a week ago, but not before I had informed you that I did not want them at any price. For some reason I have received no answer to my last letter to you, written Aug. 30th. I now write to inform you that something must be done. We have talked this matter over enough to come to some conclusion. I want it understood that I refuse to take the lots you have offered me for those I bought of you, and I presume you will not contend that I am under any obligation to do so. I merely want you and Mr. Montieth to perfect my title to the lots I bought of you, or I want you to pay me eight hundred dollars. I think I am very reasonable in this offer. In fact you have indirectly offered me that, for you have offered me two lots that you valued at $350 each, and $100, which is exactly $800. I am aware that you would rather dispose of the lots than come out with the money, which I presume is the reason you don't give me my choice to take the money or the lots. But the lots I bought of you I bought for a particular purpose, and the lots you have offered me won't fill that purpose in any sense, owing to the lay of the land. In fact I would rather have the lots I bought of you than lots 1 and 2 immediately in front of them. Please let me know immediately your final conclusion. Yours, truly, Cyrus Smith." To this letter Farra replied as follows: "Corvallis, Oregon, Sept. 22, 1890. Mr. Cyrus Smith, Amity, Or.—Dear Sir: Your last has been to hand for quite a while, but I have been conferring with others of the company to know what best to do. We have decided that we made you a fair proposition on your lots and more than the lots can be sold for to-day, and more than you can collect for them if carried into litigation. We will make you one more proposition: We will give you, as stated in one of my letters, two lots in block 3, facing as yours face, and one hundred dollars ($100,) or we will give you seven hundred dollars in cash. If this is not satisfactory, you can proceed to collect your damages by law. Yours, respectfully, G. R. Farra." Upon receipt of this letter plaintiff wrote, accepting the cash offer of $700, as follows: "Amity, Sept. 24, 1890. Dr. G. R. Farra, Corvallis, Or.—Dear Sir: Yours of the 22nd was received yesterday, and in reply will say in justice I believe I am entitled to eight hundred dollars, but I can't afford to go into litigation for one hundred dollars. Therefore I accept your offer of seven hundred dollars, and on receipt of the money I will relinquish all my claims on you and Mr. Montieth for lots seven and eight in block 4 of West Yaquina. Send check on the bank, and I will receipt you for it. Yours truly, Cyrus Smith." Defendant having refused to comply with his agreement and pay the $700, this action was brought. The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

BEAN, J. The only question presented on this record is the validity of the agreement of compromise between plaintiff and defendant under the facts heretofore stated. The contention of defendant is that for a breach of the covenant of title contained in his deed to plaintiff the law fixes the measure of damages at the purchase price and interest, and that, therefore, the claim of plaintiff was a fixed and liquidated one, and in no sense such a doubtful claim as will support an agreement of compromise. Upon this record it must be conceded that plaintiff had a valid cause of action against defendant for a breach of the covenants of the deed upon which he could have successfully maintained legal proceedings, and that both parties in their negotiations for a settlement, in good faith, believed that the measure of damages was the actual value of the property conveyed at the time the negotiations took place; and not the consideration and interest; and, in order to avoid litigation, and compromise the matter in dispute between them, the agreement sued on was made. Both parties were acting in the utmost good faith, with equal knowledge of the facts, and plaintiff had reasonable ground to think, for he had taken legal advice on the question, that his damages amounted to $800, and intended in good faith to assert his claim, but to avoid litigation he forebore to do so, on account of defendant's promise to pay him $700, preferring to accept that amount rather than go into litigation, and defendant preferring to pay that sum rather than to suffer the consequences of a lawsuit. That there was an actual, bona fide dispute between these parties as to the amount of plaintiff's damages, which each in good faith believed to be doubtful, and that the settlement was intended, in good faith, as a compromise of such dispute, is not open to question on this record. But it is now insisted that the dispute was about a matter not in fact doubtful, although the parties so considered it, and therefore the agreement of compromise is without consideration. The law favors voluntary settlements of controversies between the parties, which are characterized by good faith and a full disclosure of all the facts. Wells v. Neff, 14 Or. 66, 12 Pac. Rep. 84, 88. And such settlements will be upheld and enforced, although the disposition made by the parties in their agreement may not be what the court would have adjudged had the controversy been brought before it for decision. Nor need the dispute to have been about a claim or matter actually doubtful. If the parties bona fide, and on reasonable grounds, believed it to be doubtful, it is a sufficient consideration to support the compromise. "If the requisites of good faith exist," says Mr. Pomeroy, "it is not necessary that the dispute should be concerning a question really doubtful, if the parties bona fide consider it so. It is enough that there is a question between them to be settled by their compromise." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 850. And "no investigation into the character or value of the different claims submitted," says Mr. Parsons, "will be entered into for the purpose of setting aside a compromise, it being sufficient if the parties entering into the compromise thought at the time that there was a dispute between them." 1 Parsons, Cont. (7th Ed.) 439. It is not every disputed claim, however, which will support a compromise, but it must be a claim honestly and in good faith asserted, concerning which the parties may bona fide and upon reasonable grounds disagree. The compromise of such a claim in good faith is a good consideration to pay money in settlement thereof, and when an action is brought upon such promise it is no defense to say that the claim was not in fact a valid one, or that the parties were mistaken either as to the law or the facts. Stewart v. Ahrenfeldt, 4 Denio 189; Crans v. Hunter, 28 N. Y. 389; White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 505;

Griswold v. Wright, 61 Wis. 195, 21 N. W. Rep. 44; Brooks v. Hall (Kan.) 14 Pac. Rep. 236; Flannagan v. Kilcome, 58 N. H. 443; Wehrum v. Kuhn, 61 N. Y. 623. Nor is it a defense that the claim could not have been maintained if suit or action had been brought upon it, or that the parties were mistaken as to the law; for if it is, then it would follow that contracts by the parties settling their own disputes would at least be made to stand or fall according to the opinion of the courts as to how the law would have determined it. "If, therefore," says Logan, J., "the solemn compromise of the parties is made to depend on the question whether the parties have so settled the dispute as the law would have done, then it may be truly said that a compromise is an unavailing, idle act, which questions even the power of the parties to bind themselves." Fisher v. May, 2 Bibb. 448.

The settlement of a controversy is valid and binding, not because it is the settlement of a valid claim, but because it is the settlement of a controversy. And when such settlement is characterized by good faith the court will not look into the question of law or fact in dispute between the parties, and determine which is right. All that it needs to know is that there was a controversy between the parties, each claiming in good faith rights in himself against the other, and that such controversy has been settled. In Cook v. Wright, 1 Best & S. 559, it appeared from the evidence that defendant believed himself not liable on the demand of plaintiff; but he knew that plaintiff thought him liable, and would sue him if he did not pay, and, in order to avoid the expense and trouble of legal proceedings against him, agreed to compromise, and gave his note for the amount agreed on in compromise, and the question was whether a person who has given a note as a compromise of a claim honestly made upon him, and which, but for that compromise, would at once have been brought to a legal decision, can resist payment of the note on the ground that the original claim thus compromised might have been successfully resisted; and it was held he could not, Blackburn, J., saying: "The real consideration depends on the reality of the claim made and the bona fides of the compromise." In Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449, the plaintiff claimed that certain moneys were due him from the government of Honduras, and was about to take proceedings to enforce payment, and, in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear taking such proceedings for an agreed time, the defendant promised to deliver to him certain debentures. In an action for a breach of the contract the plea was that at the time of making the contract no money was due the plaintiff from the government of Honduras. This plea was held bad on demurrer, Cockburn, C. J., saying: "No doubt it must be taken that there was in fact no claim by the plaintiff against the Honduras government which could be prosecuted by legal proceedings to a successful issue; but this does not vitiate the contract, and destroy the validity of what is alleged as the consideration. The authorities clearly establish that, if an agreement is made to compromise a disputed claim, forbearance to sue in respect of that claim is a good consideration, and, whether proceedings to enforce the disputed claim have or have not been instituted, makes no difference."²⁰¹ In Grandin v. Grandin, 49 N. J. Law, 508, 9 Atl. Rep. 756, the plaintiff was an heir at law of the deceased, and in good faith filed objections to the probate of the will, and, in consideration of his withdrawing his objections and making no further opposition to the probate of the will, the defendant agreed to pay him $300. In an action on this promise it was held that the compromise was valid and binding, although it ultimately appeared that the claim of the plaintiff was wholly unfounded. In Bellows v. Sowles, 55 Vt. 391, the facts are as in the case last above cited, except that the plaintiff had not instituted proceedings to contest the will, but was making arrangements to do so, and defendant promised to pay him $5,000 if he would desist from such opposition to the will. In an action on the promise the court held that plaintiff was not bound to show that his ground of opposition to the will would have been sufficient to have defeated its probate. It was enough if he was able to show that he honestly thought he had good and reasonable ground for making the claim that the will, so far as it related to him, was the production of undue influence, and for that reason he honestly and in good faith intended to oppose its establishment. In some of the authorities it is said that, in order that a compromise may constitute a sufficient consideration to support an executory contract, the claim must be at least doubtful, and there must be colorable ground of dispute, and some legal or equitable foundation for the claim. Anthony v. Boyd, 15 R. I. 495, 8 Atl. Rep. 701, and 10 Atl. Rep. 657; Mortgage Co. v. Henderson, 111 Ind. 24, 12 N. E. Rep. 88. This statement must be construed with reference to the facts of the particular case, and, when so read, will, we think, be found to mean nothing more than that the claim must be a serious one, honestly made, which the party asserting does not know is unsubstantial, but believes he has a fair chance of sustaining, or does not know facts to ²⁰¹ In Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, quoted in the text, Cockburn, C. J., added: "If the defendant's contention were adopted, it would result that in no case of a doubtful claim could a compromise be enforced. Every day a compromise is effected on the ground that the party making it has a chance of succeeding in it, and if he bona fide believes he has a fair chance of success, he has a reasonable ground for suing, and his forbearance to sue will constitute a good consideration. When such a person forbears to sue he gives up what he believes to be a right of action, and the other party gets an advantage, and, instead of being annoyed with an action, he escapes from the vexations incident to it. The defendant's contention is unsupported by authority.

"It would be another matter if a person made a claim which he knew to be unfounded, and, by a compromise, derived an advantage under it; in that case his conduct would be fraudulent. If the plea had alleged that the plaintiff knew he had no real claim against the Honduras Government, that would have been an answer to the action."

his knowledge unknown to the other party, which show his claim a bad one.

As a result from the authorities, we think a doubtful or disputed claim, sufficient to constitute a good consideration for an executory contract of compromise, is one honestly and in good faith asserted, arising from a state of facts upon which a cause of action can be predicated, with the reasonable belief on the part of the party asserting it that he has a fair chance of sustaining his claim, and concerning which an honest controversy may arise, although in fact the claim may be wholly unfounded. In the case before us plaintiff not only had a cause of action, but an admitted right of action, growing out of the sale of the property and the execution and delivery of the deed, which he could have prosecuted to a successful issue, and upon the facts of which he honestly and in good faith believed his damages amounted to at least $800. This question he intended to submit to judicial decision: It was a question concerning which there could be and actually was an honest controversy. The proposition of settlement came from defendant, and the compromise was effected after weeks of negotiation, at his solicitation. He had as full and complete knowledge of all the facts as the plaintiff, and presumably more so. By the compromise, and on the faith of defendant's promise, plaintiff forebore to assert his claim in the courts, and gave up a portion of what he believed to be a valid claim, and defendant, instead of being annoyed with an action, escaped the vexations incident thereto, although other motives may have prompted him to make the proposition of settlement; and this is a sufficient consideration to support defendant's promise. This is so, although it may now be clear that plaintiff could only have recovered in an action the consideration by him paid for the property, and that his claim for $800 was in law wholly unfounded. The defendant cannot escape liability on his solemn contract, entered into at his request and solicitation, by now showing or claiming that he was mistaken as to the law. It is sufficient for us to know that there was a dispute between the parties, and that it has been in the utmost good faith settled. Whether it was entirely the desire to avoid litigation, or what appeared to him some sufficient consideration, that induced the defendant to make the offer of settlement accepted by plaintiff, is unnecessary for us to inquire. It is enough that with full knowledge of all the facts, and without any fraud or concealment on the part of plaintiff, the offer was made and accepted. Nor is it necessary for plaintiff to show that the law would have awarded him the damages claimed. It is enough if he had an honest, reasonable ground to think his damages amounted to $800, and intended in good faith to assert it, and forebore to do so on account of defendant's promise. Conceding, therefore, that the measure of damages growing out of the sale of the property and execution and delivery of the deed from defendant to plaintiff is the purchase price and interest,—a question, however, we are not called upon to determine,—the compromise between plaintiff and defendant was supported by a sufficient consideration, and is valid and binding.

BLOUNT v. DILLAWAY, ET AL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1908. 199 Mass. 330, 85 N. E. 477, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1036.)

Suit by Edith Eliza Dillaway Blount against Frank Henry Dillaway and Frank A. Wheeler to compel specific performance of an agreement of compromise. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

LORING, J.²⁰² This is a bill brought by a sister against her brother and against the executor of the will of their mother. The plaintiff seeks to establish an agreement of compromise between her brother and herself as to the will and property of their mother, and to have the executor directed to pay to her one-third of the residue when his accounts are settled in the Probate Court and the time for distribution shall come.

* * *

The judge made findings of the material facts and ordered a decree to be entered for the plaintiff. In pursuance of that order a decree was entered declaring that by virtue of the agreement of compromise the plaintiff was entitled to one-third of all moneys coming to the defendant in addition to one-third of the legacy of $5 bequeathed to her, and directing the defendant Wheeler as executor to make said payments after the settlement of his final account in the Probate Court. It was further provided in said decree that the plaintiff should have the same standing in the probate proceedings that she would have had if the plaintiff and defendant had been residuary legatees.

The case is now before us on appeal by both defendants. * * *

The judge * * * found that "the plaintiff in good faith stated to the defendant, her brother, that she would contest the will on the ground of undue influence and want of sanity, and in consideration of his agreement to share the estate with her promised not to make any contest."

* * *

The judge further ruled "that she is not required to go further and prove that there was a doubtful question as to sanity or undue influence in order to establish a valid consideration. She had the right, acting in good faith, to go to court and make a contest and she promised not to exercise that right, and did not exercise it."

There are decisions in other jurisdictions for the position taken by the appellants. A collection of the decisions to that effect may be found in Wald's Pollock on Contracts (3d Am. Ed.) 214, note 23. But since the decision of this court in Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District, 154 Mass. 450, 28 N. E. 679, those cases are not law in this commonwealth, and the earlier case of Palfrey v. Portland, Saco & Portsmouth Ry. Co., 4 Allen 55, must be taken to be modified accordingly. This court in Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District adopted the rule finally established in England in Miles v. New Zealand Alford Estate Co., 32 Ch. D. 266, in which Cook v. Wright, 1 B. & S. 559, Callisher v. Bischoffsheim, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449, Ockford v. Barrelli, 20 W. R. 116, and the doubts thrown on those decisions by Lord Esher, M. R., in Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, 490, were considered at length. The rule there laid down was stated on page 291 with accuracy by Lord Bowen to be: "If an intending litigant bona fide forbears a right to litigate, he does give up something of value." He added, speaking of the case then before him: "I think therefore that the reality of the claim which is given up must be measured, not by the state of the law as it is ultimately discovered to be, but by the state of the knowledge of the person who at the time has to judge and make the concession." Again, on page 292, Lord Bowen says: "When the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, says he doubts, if there was really and obviously no cause of action, whether the belief of the parties that there was, would be sufficient ground for a compromise, I agree if by that he means there must be a real cause of action, that is to say, one that is bona fide and not frivolous or vexatious; but I do not agree if he means by a real cause of action some cause of action which commends itself to the ultimate reasoning of the tribunal which has to consider and determine the case." The case of Prout v. Pittsfield Fire District, 154 Mass. 450, 453, 28 N. E. 679, was affirmed in Kennedy v. Welch (Mass.) 83 N. E. 11.

In the case at bar, having regard to the knowledge of the plaintiff, can it be said that her claim was a vexatious or frivolous one? Unless a duly executed will had been made she was entitled as one of the two next of kin to a half of her mother's estate. She had just been told by the other next of kin, her brother, that their mother had left a will by which everything had been bequeathed to him. Even although she had been estranged from her mother for ten years, a determination to examine the will and the circumstances under which it had been made could not be said (having regard to the knowledge of the plaintiff) to be either vexatious or frivolous. We are of opinion that this finding and this ruling were right. The claim in Palfrey v. Portland, Saco & Portsmouth Ry. Co., 4 Allen 55, was a frivolous and vexatious one. * * *

*Decree affirmed.*²⁰⁸

CARUANA v. PRUDENTIAL SPICE CO., Inc.

(Supreme Court, Appellate Term, First Department, 1919. 178 N. Y. Supp. 401.)

Appeal from Municipal Court, Borough of Manhattan, Seventh District.

Action by Joseph Caruana against the Prudential Spice Company, Incorporated. From a judgment for plaintiff entered upon verdict of jury, defendant appeals. Reversed, and verdict directed for defendant.

BIJUR, J. Defendant had purchased from plaintiff's principal certain goods to be shipped from Spain at an agreed value of some $1,700, and the written contract of sale provided that cost, insurance, and freight were included in the price, the goods to be delivered in New York. When they arrived, plaintiff called on defendant, and told him that his principal in Spain had been put to some delay and expense by reason of war conditions which had compelled him to pay out some $440, and that plaintiff would not deliver the goods or documents of title to defendant, unless he would pay half of that amount. Thereupon defendant drew his check to plaintiff's order for $220, marking it with the words "Paid under protest." As soon as he obtained the documents, he stopped payment on the check, and plaintiff brought suit thereon.

It is quite plain that the check was without consideration, and a verdict in defendant's favor should have been directed as duly requested. While it is quite true that the abandonment of even a colorable claim advanced by one party is consideration for the reciprocal promise of the other, the claim must at least be colorable. White v. Hoyt, 73 N. Y. 505, 514; Springstead v. Nees, 125 App. Div. 230, 232, 109 N. Y. Supp. 148; Eysaman v. Nelson, 79 Misc. Rep. 304, 340, 140 N. Y. Supp. 183. In the instant case there was not even a claim advanced against defendant, colorable or otherwise. The best that respondent's counsel can say in justification of the demand was that the contract did not require plaintiff to pay for these expenses in Spain, which are alluded to as "demurrage." There may doubtless be many other expenses which plaintiff's principal may have had in Spain, either in connection with this contract or any other matter; but there is not the slightest suggestion anywhere why defendant should be bound to reimburse him therefor, nor why any one should have expected him to do so.

Judgment reversed, and verdict directed in favor of defendant, with $20 costs of this appeal and in the court below.

the question, is a surrender of something of value and is a sufficient consideration for a contract." Rugg, J., in Silver v. Graves, 210 Mass. 26, 30 (1911). See 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, note.

MOERS v. MOERS.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1920. 229 N. Y. 294, 128 N. E. 202.)

COLLINS, J. The plaintiff seeks a judgment directing the defendant to specifically perform a contract between the parties. The demurrer of the defendant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was overruled by the Special Term and sustained by the Appellate Division. The complaint was not, under the leave of the Appellate Division to amend, amended, and was dismissed by the final judgment, which was affirmed by the Appellate Division.

The complaint alleges, in effect, and the demurrer admits the facts: The contract in question, in writing and under seal, was dated December 7, 1918. It recited the existence of various differences and controversies between the parties; the pendency of an action by the defendant here against the plaintiff, who is defending it, to recover $51,470.24 with interest, and the desire of the parties to compromise and settle "all matters in dispute between them of every kind and nature whatsoever including the matters and things embraced in said action above referred to," and stipulated that the plaintiff should pay the defendant on December 9, 1918, $12,500, and he or his legal representative should pay her on January 1, 1919, and on the first day of each month thereafter during her life, $250; the defendant "upon the receipt of said $12,500" should immediately reassign to the plaintiff all policies of insurance upon his life and indorse a certain designated check payable to the parties jointly, and "contemporaneously with the receipt of said sum of $12,500," sign and deliver to him a letter retracting all derogatory statements made by her against plaintiff or his wife, should refrain from making similar future statements, and should return to him a designated last will and testament executed by him and all his books, papers, or documents "such as old notes, checks and letters, including all letters heretofore written by" him to her "and all other property." It further provided:

"In consideration of the payment by the party of the first part (the plaintiff) to the party of the second part (the defendant) of said $12,500, and his promise to pay her the sum of $3,000 per annum for the balance of her life, said party of the second part promises and agrees that she at no time or under any circumstances or conditions directly or indirectly will engage in any speculation of any kind or nature, without first obtaining the written consent" of the plaintiff, and in the event of her violation of such promise he shall be under no further liability or obligation to support or make further payment to her. "General releases shall be exchanged between the parties hereto; the release from the party of the second part to the party of the first part to be made and executed by her individually and as executrix of the estate of Charles Z. Moers, deceased, and in addition said party of the second part is to make, execute and deliver a general release in favor of the wife of the party of the first part, Theresa Moers."

The plaintiff duly tendered to the defendant the sum of $12,500 and the general release, as provided by the contract, executed by him, and full performance on his part of the contract; the defendant refused performance in all respects on her part and threatens and intends to and will, unless restrained by the court, proceed with the prosecution of the pending action brought by her against the plaintiff here; the plaintiff will suffer irreparable damage and has not an adequate remedy at law. The relief is demanded: Judgment of specific performance by the defendant, and injunction against the prosecution of the pending action in her behalf.

The defendant asserts and argues that the contract is an accord only, and therefore not binding upon her because she refused the satisfaction it provided. The Appellate Division sustained the assertion. The assertion is ill-founded and erroneous.

There is no doubt that a mere accord without satisfaction is unenforceable, and that an accord with tender of satisfaction unaccepted is of like quality. An executory agreement for accord of a pending action without satisfaction made under it does not bar the prosecution of the action, and tender of performance is insufficient for that purpose. A mere accord without a satisfaction is ineffective and does not supersede or discharge the original contract or claim. A new executory agreement, whether performed or not, may be accepted in satisfaction of a previous obligation or liability, and if it is so accepted the remedy for breach thereof is upon the new and not the old agreement. But, as a rule, it is the accepted performance of the agreement and not the mere promise or tendered performance which amounts to a satisfaction. An accord not executed does not discharge the original claim. Whether there is an accord and satisfaction ordinarily involves a pure question of intention, which is, as a rule, a question of fact. If the evidence directly or through reasonable inference creates no conflict concerning the intention, it is a question of law. Kromer v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 31 Am. Rep. 491. These rules, however, do not apply to the present case.

The contract in the instant case is not a mere accord, or an accord executory. It is a new and superior contract superseding and extinguishing the contract or contracts upon which the original action between the parties was based, and the action itself. It relates to matters of differences and controversies other than, as well as, those involved in the original action. It concerns all the claims and grievances of the plaintiff against the defendant and of the defendant against the plaintiff. Each party enters into new agreements and assumes new obligations. Mutual releases shall be executed extinguishing all disputes and controversies between them. Those new and reciprocal covenants and obligations were considerations legally sufficient to invest the contract with completeness and binding effect. It is immaterial that certain obligations on the part of the defendant were to be performed "upon the receipt of said $12,500," or "contemporaneously with the receipt of said sum of $12,500." Refusal by the defendant to receive the moneys accomplished nothing. It did not extinguish her agreements or absolve her from the obligations they created. It is enough that the agreements of the parties were new or created by the contract, were absolute and not dependent or conditional, were reciprocal, and affected legal rights of either or both of the parties—a case of mutual promises, one of which is the consideration for the other. A recent definition of a sufficient consideration in a bilateral contract is:

"Mutual promises in each of which the promisor undertakes some act or forbearance that will be, or apparently may be, detrimental to the promisor or beneficial to the promisee, and neither of which is rendered void by any rule of law other than that relating to consideration, are sufficient consideration for one another." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 103f.

A new executory contract between a claimant and the person charged, by which they reciprocally agree to do or not to do an act or acts not obligatory by contract or law, which will affect a legal right of either and which, expressly or through implication, includes the settlement of the original claim, is not a mere accord, but is the substitute for the original claim or contract, which is merged in it and is, in and of itself, binding upon the parties. Davis v. Spencer, 24 N. Y. 386; Bryant v. Gale, 5 Vt. 416; Billings v. Vanderbeck, 23 Barb. 546; Crowther v. Farrer, 69 Eng. C. L. 675; Vedder v. Vedder, 1 Denio 257; Morehouse v. Second National Bank of Oswego, 98 N. Y. 503; Allison v. Abendroth, 108 N. Y. 470, 15 N. E. 606; Williams v. London Commercial Exchange Company, 10 Exchequer, 569; Merry v. Allen, 39 Iowa 235.

The agreement set forth in the complaint was valid and binding upon both parties. It expressly contracted that each party should execute and deliver to the other a general release. It, as a matter of law, makes manifest the intention of the parties that the original action and all disputes and controversies between them were merged into it. There was sufficient legal consideration in it. The plaintiff had duly offered to perform on his part. The defendant threatens and intends to prosecute the original action and to withhold wholly performance on her part. The allegations of the complaint permit the plaintiff to invoke equitable jurisdiction. Very v. Levy, 13 How. 345, 14 L. Ed. 173; Burke v. Burke, 212 N. Y. 303, 307, 106 N. E. 62, 63. In the case last cited Judge, now Chief Judge, Hiscock stated the rule:

"The general rule of course is that equity will not entertain such an action as this to restrain an action at law unless special reasons demonstrate that full justice cannot be done in the latter action, and that an action in equity is necessary to secure to a party a more complete enjoyment of the rights to which he is entitled than could be obtained in the action at law. If the equitable action holds out no promise of relief which may not be secured in the other and more restricted proceeding there is no occasion for interference and it will be withheld."

In view of our conclusion we have not deemed it necessary to consider, in connection with the question of consideration, the effect of the fact that the contract was under seal.

The judgments should be reversed, with costs in all courts; the demurrer should be overruled, with leave to withdraw demurrer and answer the complaint within twenty days on payment of costs.

SEWARD & SCALES v. MITCHELL.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1860. 1 Coldwell, 87.)

CARUTHERS, J. On the 16th Oct., 1856, Mitchell sold to Seward & Scales, for the consideration of $8,596.50, a tract of land in the county of Gibson, described in a deed of that date, by metes and bounds, "containing 521 acres, being a part of a 5,000 acre tract granted to George Dougherty, and bounded as follows," &c. The title is warranted with the usual covenants, but nothing more said about the grants than what is above recited.

Some time after the deed was made, the parties, differing as to the quantity of land embraced in the tract, made an agreement that it should be surveyed by Gillespie, and if there were more than five hundred and twenty-one acres, the vendees should pay for the excess at the rate of $16.50 per acre, that being the price at which the sale was made, and if less, then the vendor should pay for the deficiency, at the same rate. It turned out that there was an excess of fifty-seven acres, and the tract embraced in the deed was five hundred and seventy-eight acres, instead of five hundred and twenty-one, as estimated in the sale. For this excess, the present suit was brought, and recovery had, for $1,079.

²⁰⁴ See Flegal v. Hoover, 156 Pa. St. 276 (1893).

"The distinction between an accord and satisfaction and a compromise and settlement has not been clearly drawn in the reported cases. In some there has been an interchangeable use of the terms. See City of San Juan v. St. John's Gas Co., 195 U. S. 510, 25 Sup. Ct. 108, 49 L. Ed. 299, 1 Ann. Cas. 796; Shubert v. Rosenberger, 204 Fed. 934, 123 C. C. A. 256, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062." Lees, C., in C. W. La Moure Co. v. Cuyuna-Mille Lacs Iron Co. (Minn.), 180 N. W. 540, 541 (1920).

It is objected here that the court below erred in refusing to charge, as requested, that the agreement sued upon was void for want of a writing, and because there was no consideration for the promise.

1. The contract, or promise sued upon, is not for the sale of land, so as to require a writing, under the Statute of Frauds.

The sale had already been reduced to writing. This was a subsequent collateral agreement in relation to the price, which was binding by parol, and to which the statute can have no application whatever. This is too plain for argument.

2. There is more plausibility in the second objection, that there was no sufficient consideration for the promise. But this is also untenable. The argument is, that the deed embraced the whole tract, and passed a perfect title to the extent of the boundaries, and consequently there was nothing passing as a consideration for the new promise, that the party did not own before by a perfect legal right.

It is true, if the sale was by the tract and not by the acre, as appears from the deed, and no stipulations as to quantity, that the title was good for the whole and covered the excess. But if the sale was not in gross, but by the acre, and the recitation in the deed would not be conclusive in a court of equity on that point if the fact could be shown to be otherwise, then there would be mutual remedies for an excess or deficiency in proper cases, as we held in Miller v. Bents, 4 Sneed, and a more recent case; but independent of that, and taking it to have been purely a sale in gross, and both parties desiring to act justly, and being of different opinions as to the quantity, mutually agreed to abide by an accurate survey to ascertain which was bound to pay, and recover from the other, and what amount, we see no good reason in law or morals why such an agreement should not be binding upon them. The case of Howe v. O'Malley, 1 Murphey's L. and Eq. R., 287, is precisely in point. The court there held that a promise to refund in case of deficiency is a good consideration for a promise to pay for any excess over what is called for in the deed,—that such mutual promises are sufficient considerations for each other.²⁰⁶

²⁰⁶ In Howe v. O'Malley, cited in the text, supra, the deed was given in 1792 describing a tract of land by metes and bounds purporting to contain 220 acres, "be the same more or less." It was not until 1806 that "it was mutually agreed to have the land surveyed, the defendant to pay $10.00 an acre for any excess and the plaintiff to refund at the same rate for any deficiency. The excess amounted to 87 acres, and plaintiff had judgment. The full opinion of the Supreme Court was:

"By the court—Here are mutual promises; one is made the consideration of the other and we are of opinion that the plaintiff's promise to refund in the event of a deficiency in the number of acres is a good consideration to support the defendant's promise to pay, should there be more acres than called for by his deed. Judgment for the plaintiff."

Even in the common law an occasional situation arises where a promise not under seal is enforced although there is no consideration. See, for example,

The case of Smith v. Ware, 13 Johns. Rep. 259, which is supposed to conflict with this, is entirely different; "there was no mutuality" because the promise sued upon was to pay for the deficiency, without any obligation on the other party to pay for an excess, if any there had been.

The principle of the North Carolina case commends itself to our approbation, because of its equity and justice.

Without further citation of authorities we are satisfied to hold that the promise in this case was binding upon the defendant, as his Honor charged, and therefore affirm the judgment.^{}

Assignment of Rich Hardware Co. (Ariz.), 196 Pac. 454, 456 (1921) where Baker, J., said:

"A stipulation concerning a pending cause in court is an obligation unlike ordinary contracts between parties not in court. Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 508, 23 Pac. 60, 227; Barry v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 53 N. Y. 536. Since no consideration is necessary to its validity (Howe v. Lawrence, 22 N. J. Law, 104) no mutuality is required, and it is to be construed like other contracts or written instruments inter partes. 20 Enc. Pl. & Fr. p. 657."

^{} In Supreme Assembly of the Royal Society of Good Fellows v. Campbell, 17 R. I. 402 (1891), the next of kin of a deceased all agreed on a disposition among them of his property before they knew which had an advantage. "In the uncertainty as to who had been named as beneficiary or beneficiaries, each was willing to surrender his chance of getting a larger share, or the whole, for the certainty of an equal share with the others." One of them finding that she was entitled to some insurance, claimed that there was no consideration for the agreement. But it was held, in an interpleader suit, that there was a sufficient consideration. Matteson, C. J., for the court said: "If there was no other consideration for the agreement than this mutual surrender by each of his or her chance to receive a larger share we think the agreement could be supported" (pp. 404-5). He pointed out that the case was analogous to a compromise, where later it turned out that one party had no right: "The agreement in the case at bar was not strictly a compromise, since at the time it was made no dispute had arisen between the parties and neither had made any claim to any greater share in the whole, or any part of the estate, than the others. There are, however, cases which do not involve any element of disputed right, and which, therefore, were no more compromises than the agreement in question, which rested upon the consideration of a mutual chance." (p. 405.)

Professor Langdell thought it was impossible to find a consideration for the promise of the man who loses where the parties conditioned their promises on the happening or not happening of some event which was present or past, but unknown to them. He said: "Thus, if a wager be made by mutual promises upon a race which has already taken place, but the result of which is unknown to the parties, it is the losing party alone who promises, and he really receives no consideration for his promise." Langdell's Summary of Contracts, § 89.

Still in marine insurance a contract to insure a vessel at sea, "whether lost or not", has always been held to be on good consideration. And it seems fair to say that a present or past event about which parties are uncertain should be regarded as to them as if future for all contract purposes. Even in the case of the wager suggested by Professor Langdell that was so. March v. Pigot, 3 Burr. 2802 (1771), mentioned by him, is the most striking instance. There a bet was made as to which of two fathers would live the longer and at the time of the bet, unknown to the parties, one father was dead. There was held to be sufficient consideration.

A case like Smith v. Knight, 88 Ia. 257 (1893), where the contract was that partners should settle on the basis of interest to the one who had contributed an excess of capital and where the court was anxious to apply Professor Langdell's view, may be supported on the ground that under the facts of that case only one party was even supposed to have a chance to gain by the agreement. The only uncertainty was as to the amount he would gain. It was like betting on a sure thing and no consideration should be found to exist in such a case.

CHAPTER IV.

ASSIGNMENTS OF CONTRACTS.

W. S. Holdsworth, The History of the Treatment of Choses in Action by the Common Law,¹ 33 Harvard Law Review 997, 1018-1022. Rights of action of a contractual kind must always be of a purely personal nature. Therefore in early law the prohibition against their assignment was absolute. It is true that in most cases they became transmissible on death at a comparatively early date.² It is true also that it was recognised that certain covenants might be so annexed to a particular estate in the land that successive holders of that estate could enforce them.³ But to the end the common law never in theory departed from its rule that rights of a contractual kind could not be assigned by an act of the parties to the contract.⁴ As early, however, as the beginning of the fourteenth century the merchants had begun to circumvent this prohibition. If the right was to an ascertained sum of money, that is if it was a debt, the creditor could appoint the assignee his attorney, to sue for the debt, and could stipulate that he should keep the amount realised; and in the fifteenth century this method of assigning a debt was recognised as valid by the common-law courts.⁵ Thus, as in Roman law,⁶ the assignee sued for the debt in the assignor's name and as his attorney.

But upon this device the influence of the idea that the assignment of any chose in action was void because it tended to encourage maintenance exercised a retarding influence. Cases in which this device was employed were often attacked on this ground.⁷ But, the fact that the person maintaining had some sort of common interest with the person maintained of a legal or moral kind, was recognised as a good defence to an action for maintenance. Therefore, if the assignment of a debt by way of the appointment of the assignee as the assignor's attorney was attacked on this ground, it was necessary to show that the assignee and the assignor had some sort of common interest. It was held that a sufficient common interest existed if it could be proved that the assignor owed money to the assignee, and that the assignment was made in satisfaction of the debt.⁸ On the other hand, a common interest could not be proved if it appeared that the assignee had merely purchased the debt from the assignor without any particular reason for so doing.⁹ It is true that in 1590, in the case of Penson v. Hickbed,¹⁰ it seems to have been held that any assignment of a debt, coupled with a power of attorney to sue for it, was valid, unless it was void for champerty. But this case does not seem to have been followed. Right down to the latter part of the seventeenth century it seems to have been held, both by the common-law courts and by the court of Chancery, that, unless the assignor owed money to the assignee and had made the assignment on this ground, the objection of maintenance was fatal. This principle was laid down in 1596¹¹ by the court of Common Pleas, and by Lord Keeper Bridgman (1667-72) in the court of Chancery.¹²

When this point had been reached it was inevitable that further developments should be made. At the beginning of the eighteenth century it was quite settled that equity would recognise the validity of the assignment both of debts and of other things recognised by the common law as choses in action.¹³ In other words it would, as the Judicature Act expresses it,¹⁴ recognise the validity of the assignment of "any debt or other legal chose in action."¹⁵ In equity, therefore, there was no need

¹⁰ Cro. Eliza. 170—to the objection that buying of bills of debts was maintenance, the judge said it was not, "for it is usual among merchants to make exchange of money for bills of debt, et c contra. And Gawdy said, it is not maintenance to assign a debt with a letter of attorney to sue for it, except it be assigned to be recovered, and the party to have part of it." In the report of the same case in 4 Leo. 99 the objection was taken that though an assignment in satisfaction of a debt due to the assignee was good, this assignment was bad because it did not appear that any such debt was due; for these bills of debt see an article by the present writer, 31 L. Quar. Rev. 377-381.

¹¹ South and Marsh's case, 3 Leo. 234 (1590)—though it can be assigned to the queen, "it cannot be assigned to a subject, if not for a debt due by the assignor to the assignee, for otherwise it is maintenance." Barrow v. Gray, Cro. Eliza. 551 (1597); Ames, 3 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, 584, and authorities there cited.

¹² "The Lord Keeper Bridgman will not protect the assignment of any chose in action, unless in satisfaction of some debt due to the assignee; but not when the debt or, chose in action is assigned to one to whom the assignee owes nothing precedent, so that the assignment is voluntary or for money then given." Freeman Ch. Cas. 145. It was probably decisions like these that caused Bridgman to get the reputation of sticking too closely to common-law rules to be a good judge of the court of Chancery. ¹⁵ "I think the words 'debt or other legal chose in action' mean 'debt or right which the common law looks on as not assignable by reason of its being a to show a special relationship between the assignor and the assignee in order to rebut the presumption of maintenance. During the same century the common-law courts, probably in consequence of the attitude of equity, soon adopted the same attitude with respect to the assignment of debts. The objection of maintenance was, it is true, a valid objection, both at law and in equity, if it could be proved;¹⁶ but the courts now took the view that it was absurd to suppose that an assignment per se involved a presumption of maintenance.¹⁷ Blackstone makes it quite clear that any such presumption was obsolete when he wrote.¹⁸ But this involved the consequence that it was no longer necessary to look at the relationship between the assignor and the assignee. It was no longer necessary, therefore, that the assignor should be the debtor of the assignee. It followed that a creditor could, by making the assignee his attorney, assign his debt to any one. The appointment of an attorney had come to be a formality—though to the end it was a necessary formality.¹⁹ In this way the common law managed to maintain in theory its doctrine that a chose in action was unassignable, while abandoning it in practice in the case of debts. The further inroads upon this theory made by equity and by legislation belong to a later period in the history of the law.

It is fairly clear that the common law was induced to connive at the introduction and extension of this evasion of its principle that a chose in action is not assignable by considerations of mercantile convenience or necessity. But this exception only applied to debts; and even equity did not go the length of permitting all contractual rights to be assigned in this manner. Some were too personal in their character to permit of any kind of assignment and others were too uncertain. But these limitations upon the power to assign can be better explained when the rights of action of a purely delictual kind have been dealt with.

chose in action, but which a Court of Equity deals with as being assignable." Torkington v. Magee, [1902] 2 K. B. 427, 430-431, per Channell, J.; but the phrase "legal chose in action" is not a very happy one to express "a thing regarded by the common law as a chose in action."

¹⁷ It would seem from the case of Deering v. Farrington, 3 Keb. 304 (1674), that Hale, C. J., was inclined to take this view at this early date. At the end of the eighteenth century Buller, J. could say that, "It is laid down in our old books, that for avoiding maintenance a chose in action cannot be assigned; or granted over to another. The good sense of that rule seems to me to be very questionable; and in early as well as modern times it has been so explained away, that it remains at most only an objection to the form of the action in any case." Master v. Miller, 4 T. R. 320, 340 (1791).

M. P. AND J. B. v. J. R.

(In Chancery and in the Exchequer Chamber, 1458. As reported by Choke,²⁰ of counsel, in J. R. v. M. P. and J. B., 37 Hen. VI, Folio 13, Placitum 3, translated in Ames' Cases on Equity Jurisdiction, I, 1.)

Formerly, on such a day, in the feast of the Holy Trinity, in the year last past [1458], the complainants, M. P. and J. B., citizens and aldermen of London, made a bill to the Chancellor of England against J. R. of London, containing the matter following: that the complainants had purchased of J. R. certain debts due to him, giving their obligation therefor; that these debts being only choses in action could not vest in the complainants so as to give them any action for the recovery of the debts, but the duty remained all the time in J. R., so that the complainants had no quid pro quo; that their obligation was, on this account, void and worthless, but that the common law gave them no relief against their obligation; wherefore they prayed for a writ against J. R. to appear under a certain penalty, before the King in Chancery, to answer to this matter. A subpoena issued. The parties appeared, and because the matter was doubtful in law, the Chancellor [Waynflete] adjourned them to the Exchequer Chamber. There the matter was rehearsed and well debated before him and the justices of both benches. And it was the opinion of all the justices that, as no duty was vested in the complainants by the bargain, the obligation ought in conscience to be surrendered to them or the defendant ought to release the complainants. The chancellor ordered him to give up the obligation to be cancelled in the Chancery, or to make an acquittance or release. The defendant refusing to do either, was committed for contempt to the Fleet prison until he should obey and still [1459] remains there.²¹

Professor W. T. Barbour examined various of the early petitions in Chancery, preserved in the English Public Record Office. The petitions are divided into 377 bundles containing an estimated total of 300,000 cases. W. T. Barbour, The History of Contract in Early English Equity, p. 67. At page 69, n. 3, he stated the bundles which he examined and his method of getting representative petitions. On pages 108-109, he set out petitions presented by assignees who sought to recover in their own names debts which had been assigned to them. To one he ascribed the date 1413, two are dated 1432 and two more have that probable date, and one is dated 1450. Professor Barbour pointed out with reference to the petitions examined that "the word 'cases' has been used in referring to this material, but such a description is scarcely appropriate. For the most part we have only the complainant's petition; the answers and other

Assumpsit. The plaintiffs declare, that one Robert Stanton, the late husband of the defendant, was indebted to John Neve and Timothy Alsopp in £100 for beer sold by them to him, and being so indebted, the said Robert Stanton died; after whose death the defendant took into her hands goods and chattels of the said Robert Stanton, of the value of £100 and administered those goods and chattels, as executor of the will of the said Robert, and that afterwards the defendant had paid £40 parcel of the said £100 to the said Neve and Alsopp. And whereas the pleadings do not often appear. * * * While this dearth of answers is unfortunate the petitions suffer from a defect much more lamentable. Very few of them are endorsed with judgment. * * * If a petition is unendorsed, we cannot determine whether or no relief was granted in that particular case. * * * Where there are numerous petitions based on the same or a similar state of facts, it is submitted that it may be reasonably inferred that relief sought was granted." (Id., page 70.) But that the last conclusion is by no means justified, so far as assignments are concerned, the principal case, decided in 1458, would seem to show.

The traditional point of view as to the history of assignments of choses in action is that stated by Spence (George Spence, Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, II, 352) that "it has always been held in the Court of Chancery, as far back as its records reach, that the assignment of a chose in action, founded on a valuable consideration, ought to be enforced." That point of view is also favored by the courts. See Fitzroy v. Cave, [1905] 2 K. B. 364, 372; Sullivan v. Visconti, 68 N. J. L. 543, 548-550 (1902). But the case of M. P. & J. B. v. J. R., the principal case, demonstrates its untruth and prepares the way for the doctrine of Professor Ames. His view was that the law courts recognized from the start the power of attorney of the assignee to sue at law in the name of the assignor where the chose was legal, but that, because those courts recognized payment to the assignor or a release by him as a valid discharge of the obligor despite the assignment and notice of it, and even allowed the assignee to dismiss the action brought in his name, courts of equity took jurisdiction to remedy the injustice which resulted. Then gradually the law courts adopted so much of the equity view that equity jurisdiction as to assignments of legal choses in action had seldom to be exercised. See James Barr Ames, Lectures on Legal History, 258-259. For a summary of Professor Ames' views, see George P. Costigan, Jr., Gifts Inter Vivos of Choses in Action, 27 Law Quar. Rev. 326, 327-331.

On whether assignments of choses in action are legal or equitable, see opposing articles, by Professors Walter Wheeler Cook and Samuel Williston, in 29 Harv. L. Rev. 816, 30 Harv. L. Rev. 97, 449 and 31 Harv. L. Rev. 822.

On what constitute choses in action, see Howard W. Elphinstone, What is a Chose in Action? 9 Law Quar. Rev. 311, and Charles Sweet, Choses in Action, 10 Law Quar. Rev. 303. See also, Sir Frederick Pollock, Assignment of a Chose in Action, 1 Law. Mag. & Rev. (N. S.) 553.

The case of J. R. v. M. P. et al., in which counsel reported the case of M. P. et al. v. J. R., supra, presented a problem as to the effect at law of a decree in chancery. For a discussion of that case and that question, see Walter Wheeler Cook, Powers of Courts of Equity, 15 Col. L. Rev. at pp. 246-252.

²² Parts of the case as reported are omitted.

said Neve and Alsopp afterwards had assigned to and appointed the plaintiffs to receive of the defendant £60 residue of the said £100, to the proper use of the plaintiffs, whereof the defendant had notice given to her; whereupon the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiffs at the special instance and request of the defendant, would accept the defendant to be their debtor for the said £60, undertook and promised the plaintiffs to pay them the said £60. And the plaintiffs aver that they had accepted the said defendant to be their debtor. * * * Yet the said defendant had not paid the several sums, to the damage of the plaintiffs. * * *

And now after verdict for the defendant, the plaintiffs moved the matter in law upon the defendant's special plea, which was agreed by all to be bad; but the defendant's counsel [Saunders] insisted, that the declaration was insufficient, because here is no sufficient consideration to found the promise. For the defendant, before the promise did not owe anything to the plaintiffs, but to Neve and Alsopp; and by their assignment they did not transfer any property or interest in the debt, being a chose in action, but only gave an authority to the plaintiffs to receive it, if the defendant would pay it. But if the defendant will not pay it, the plaintiffs cannot bring any action against her, but Neve and Alsopp must sue for it. It is true, indeed, that if the defendant had paid the £60 to the plaintiff, she would be discharged against the said Neve and Alsopp; but in this case the defendant refused to pay; therefore Neve and Alsopp ought to bring the action against her, and not the plaintiffs, who have not any interest in the debt. And this case is no more, than if I promise a stranger to whom I do not owe anything, that if he will accept me to be his debtor for £60 I will pay it to him, yet this is but a nudum pactum, because I was not indebted to him before. And my promise to pay, if the other will receive it, is nothing but a mere voluntary promise, which does not bind me at all. And in the present case, if the promise should be good, the defendant would be charged de bonis propriis, where she was chargeable to Neve and Alsopp only de bonis testatoris; and yet here is no consideration at all so to charge her; and of this opinion was the whole Court. And judgment * * * was given for the defendant, that plaintiffs should take nothing by their bill.²³

WILLES, J.²⁴ I am of the opinion that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff. The defendant appears to have joined his partner in assigning certain debts to the plaintiff, giving the plaintiff the ordinary power of attorney to sue in the name of the firm. The rule against assigning a chose in action stood in the way of an actual transfer of the debt, so as to enable the plaintiff to sue in his own name; and, therefore, it became necessary to give the power of attorney.²⁵ But the intention of the parties in giving that power was to give the assignee the conduct cannot by law be any assignment made by a common person of this debt' (R. v. Twine (3 Jac. I) Cro. Jac. 179), but it does not follow that such an assignment could not be made in equity, nor is it reasonable that the King's assignee should at the present day be in a worse position than any other assignee.

"The rule is well settled that the King's assignee can sue in his own name (Mich. 39 Hen. VI, f. 26; Brevertton's case (Hil. 28 Hen. VIII), 1 Dyer 30 b; R. v. Wendman (3 Jac. I) Cro. Jac. 82 (Exch. Ch.); Lambert v. Taylor (1825), 4 B. & C. 138). If he prefer it, he can sue in the King's name. York v. Allen (36 Ells.) Sav. 133 (Exch.)." Percy H. Winfield, Assignment of Choses in Action in Relation to Maintenance and Champerty, 35 Law. Quar. Rev. 143, 144-147. See U. S. v. Buford, 3 Peters 12, 30 (1830).

²⁵ "If a man owe me money on an obligation, or the like, I cannot grant this debt to another; but I may grant a letter of attorney to another man to sue for it and receive it, or I may grant the writing itself to another, and he may cancel it or give it to the obligor." Sheppard's Touchstone, 240.

and control of the litigation necessary for enforcing payment of the debts assigned. The defendant, therefore, who interfered to thwart or impede the remedy of the assignee under this deed, unquestionably broke the covenant implied from the words "with full power and authority in the name or names of Bromham and Lewis, or either of them, their or either of their executors, &c., to ask, demand, sue for, recover, &c. the said debts or any of them." The declaration, therefore, is a good declaration. It states that, in accordance with the provisions of the deed, the plaintiff commenced an action against Hullman in the names of Bromham and Lewis, and obtained an order under the statute 1 & 2 Victoria c. 110, s. to hold Hullman to bail, and that the now defendant stepped in, and ordered the sheriff to discharge him from custody, whereby the benefit of the assignment was lost. To this the defendant pleads that Hullman was arrested as in the declaration mentioned, and by the procurement of the plaintiff, and without the knowledge or consent of the defendant (which was unnecessary, inasmuch as the plaintiff was acting under a power of attorney), was wrongfully and unlawfully (which are mere words of vituperation, and amount to nothing, unless they show a cause of action) held to bail for a much larger (how much larger is not stated) amount than the sum of £250 mentioned in the schedule to the deed as due from him, and therefore the defendant discharged him. We may strike out the last averment, because the schedule is not referred to as a limitation. It simply stands, therefore, that the defendant discharged Hullman from custody because the plaintiff had arrested him for too much. Mr. Macnamara [defendant's counsel] has cited no authority, nor am I aware of any, to show that because wrong has been done in this respect the debtor is entitled to be discharged. A judge at chambers would probably order his discharge on giving bail for the lesser amount really due. The mere mistake of the plaintiff, it may be to a small and inappreciable amount, clearly would not entitle the party to an absolute discharge. Authorities are not wanting as to writs of execution; but it is hardly necessary to refer to them. Where the writ is indorsed for too large an amount, the court or a judge will not discharge the defendant or direct the sheriff to withdraw from possession, but will correct it as to the excess. Upon the whole, it appears to me that the defendant has been guilty of the breach of an implied covenant in the deed,²⁶ and the plea shows no excuse.

In Hinkle Iron Co. v. Cohn (N. Y.) 128 N. E. 113 (1920), where a contractor corporation had assigned to the plaintiff, by the hand of the defendant, its and as its president, the sum of $4,500 out and a part of a designated payment to become due the corporation under a contract between it and the city of New York, but later the defendant, with knowledge of the facts, had fraudulently drawn and signed the checks of the corporation, whereby all of the balance of said designated payment was drawn out and applied to the use and benefit of

CARTER & MOORE v. THE UNITED INSURANCE CO. OF N. Y.

(Court of Chancery of New York, 1815. 1 Johns. Ch. 463.)

The bill was filed by the plaintiffs, as assignees of a policy of insurance, underwritten by the defendants, for William Titus and George Gibbs, on which the plaintiffs claimed payment for a total loss. The insurance was on 500 barrels of flour from Newport to St. Jago de Cuba, on board the Spanish brig Patriota, which was captured by a Carthagena privateer. On the 21st of December, 1814, the policy was assigned by Titus and Gibbs to the plaintiffs, in trust, for themselves and other creditors of Titus & Gibbs. The bill charged that the defendant refused to pay the loss, alleging, among other things, that the plaintiffs had no title to the property insured, which, in fact, belonged to one J. a Spaniard, and not to Titus & Gibbs. The bill prayed that the defendants might answer the matter charged in the bill, and be compelled to pay the plaintiffs the amount insured as for a total loss.

To this bill the defendants demurred on the following grounds: that it appeared by the bill that the plaintiffs' demand, or cause of action, was properly cognizable in a court of law; as it is not alleged that said defendant and the said corporation, which later was adjudged a bankrupt, the court held the defendant liable for the amount assigned. Collin, J. said:

"The corporation received and deposited the assigned sum in a trust capacity, because the sum was equitably the property of the plaintiff, which the corporation, as the owner of the legal title, was authorized to receive and hold only for the purpose of delivery to the plaintiff. After payment the sum was in the possession of the corporation as a special deposit or bailment for the benefit of the plaintiff. The corporation could not lawfully appropriate it to another purpose. It had not the right to convert or misappropriate it. The conversion or misappropriation by it made it personally liable to the plaintiff for the amount converted. The violation by a trustee of the trust relation subjects the trustee to a personal liability therefor by way of compensation or indemnification, which the beneficiary may enforce. The defendant, with knowledge of all the facts, participated in and accomplished the conversion and misappropriation. He therefore is liable to the plaintiff for the amount converted. Bischoff v. Yorkville Bank, 218 N. Y. 106, 112 N. E. 759, L. R. A. 1916F, 1059."

It has been said by W. W. C. [Professor Walter Wheeler Cook] in 28 Yale L. J. 395-396, that "It seems clear that partial assignment fairly implies an agreement in fact by the assignor to refrain from collecting from the debtor the portion assigned. If so, obviously the common law may attach to this agreement a contractual duty. The cases so hold. Eaton v. Mellus (1856, Mass.), 7 Gray 567; Hubbard v. Prather (1808, Ky.), 1 Bibb 178; 5 C. J. 968, n. 56. As against the assignor, therefore, the partial assignee acquires at least this one right which is recognized by the common law court."

In addition to the implied covenants above, an assignment for value carries with it today an implied warranty that the assigned claim is a valid, genuine claim unless there is an express warranty or something else to negative an implied warranty. Galbreath v. Wallrich, 45 Colo. 537 (1909); Miners' Bank v. Burress, 164 Mo. App. 690, 147 S. W. 1110 (1912); Trustees v. Siers, 68 W. Va. 125 (1910). There is of course no implied warranty that the obligor of the chose will perform. Galbraith v. Wallrich, supra.

Titus & Gibbs refused to let the plaintiff make use of their names, in a suit at law; or that they are, in any way, hindered from prosecuting at law; or that they stood in need of any discovery to aid them in such action.

THE CHANCELLOR [Kent]. The demand is properly cognizable at law, and there is no good reason for coming into this court to recover on a contract of insurance. The plaintiffs are entitled to make use of the names of Gibbs & Titus, the original assured, in the suit at law; and the nominal plaintiffs would not be permitted to defeat or prejudice the right of action. It may be said here, as was said by the chancellor, in the analogous case of Dhegetoft v. The London Assurance Company, (Mosely, 83) that, at this rate, all policies of insurance would be tried in this Court. In that case the policy stood in the name of a nominal trustee; but that was not deemed sufficient to change the jurisdiction; and the demurrer to the bill was allowed, and the decree was afterwards affirmed in parliament. (3 Bro. P. C. 525.) The bill, in this case, states no special ground for equitable relief, nor is any discovery sought which requires an answer.

LEGH v. LEGH.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1799. 1 Bosanquet & Puller, 447.)

ON a former day Shepherd showed cause against a rule nisi obtained by Le Blanc, for setting aside a plea of release in an action on a bond, and ordering the release to be cancelled.

The case as disclosed by the affidavits in support of the rule appeared to be this. Frances Legh having given a bond to Sarah Legh to secure £75, Sarah assigned it to John Legh as a security for the payment of a lesser sum, of which Frances had notice. John having brought an action on the bond against Frances in the name of Sarah, Sarah gave a release to Frances by whom she had been satisfied her debt, and this release was pleaded.

EYRE, C. J. The conduct of this defendant has been against good faith, and the only question is whether the plaintiff must not seek relief in a court of equity. The defendant ought either to have paid the person ⁸⁷ See Walter v. Brooks, 125 Mass. 241 (1878); Hayward v. Andrews, 106 U. S. 672 (1882); Chicago Co. v. Nichols, 57 Ill. 464 (1870); Cater v. Burkes, 1 Brown's Ch. Cas. 434 (1785).

"An assignee of a chose in action, who has the right to proceed at law upon it in the name of the assignor, has the right to proceed upon it in equity in his own name, in cases proper to be proceeded with in courts of equity." Wheeler, J. in Hagar v. Buck, 44 Vt. 285, 290 (1872).

to whom the bond was assigned, or have waited till an action was commenced against him, and then have applied to the court. Most clearly it was in breach of good faith to pay the money to the assignor of the bond and take a release, and I rather think the court ought not to allow the defendant to avail himself of this plea, since a court of equity would order the defendant to pay the plaintiff the amount of his lien on the bond, and probably all the costs of the application.

BULLER, J. There are many cases in which the court has set aside a release given to prejudice the real plaintiff. All these cases depend on circumstances. If the release be fraudulent, the court will attend to the application.

The court recommended the parties to go before the prothonotary in order to ascertain what sum was really due to the plaintiff on the bond.

Shepherd on this day stated that the defendant objected to going before the prothonotary, upon which the court said that the rule must be made absolute. He then applied for leave to plead payment of the bond, and contended that as this was not an application under the statute to plead several pleas, the court had no discretion.

EYRE, C. J. The court has in many cases refused to allow a party to take his legal advantage where it has appeared to be against good faith. Thus we prevent a man from signing judgment who has a right by law to do so if it would be in breach of his own agreement. In order to defeat the real plaintiff, this defendant has colluded with the nominal plaintiff to obtain a release, and I think therefore the plea of release may be set aside consistently with the general rules of the court. And if so, the defendant cannot be permitted to plead payment of the bond, as that would amount to the same thing.

BULLER, J. The court proceeds on the ground that the defendant has in effect agreed not to plead payment against the nominal obligee.

Upon this the defendant consented to go before the prothonotary.

ROW v. DAWSON.

(Court of Chancery, 1749. 1 Vesey, Senior, 331.)

TONSON and Cowdery lent money to Gibson, who made a draft on Swinburn, the deputy of Horace Walpole, viz. "Out of the money due from Horace Walpole out of the Exchequer, and what will be due at Michaelmas pay to Tonson 400*l.*, and to Cowdery 200*l.* value received."

Gibson became bankrupt: and the question was, whether the defendants Tonson and the executors of Cowdery were first entitled by a specific lien upon this sum due to the estate of Gibson; or whether the plaintiffs, the assignees under the commission, are entitled to have the whole sum paid to them; it being insisted for them, that this draft was in the nature of a bill of exchange, and that the property was not divested out of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy in law or equity.

LORD CHANCELLOR [Hardwicke]. At first I a little doubted about my own jurisdiction: and whether the plaintiffs ought not to have gone into the Exchequer, as being a court of revenue; for this is not a personal credit given to, or demand upon the officer, but to be paid out of that money issued out of the Exchequer to the officer; and this is on warrant, to be paid out of the revenue of the crown for public services. But there is something in the present case delivering it from that; the officer admits, he has received a sum of money applicable to this demand, which brings it to the old case of a liberate, which a person has under the great seal for the payment of money; upon admission that the officer had money in his hands applicable to the payment, and proof thereof, that would give courts of law a jurisdiction, so that an action of debt might be maintained on the liberate.

This demand, and the instrument under which the defendants claim, is not a bill of exchange, but a draft; not to pay generally, but out of his particular fund, which creates no personal demand; therefore not a draft on personal credit to go in the common course of negotiation, which is necessary to bills of exchange, by draft on the general credit of the person drawing, the drawee, and the indorser, without reference to any particular fund. The first case of which kind, I remember to have been determined in B. R. not to be a bill of exchange, was a draft by an officer on the agent of his regiment to be paid out of his growing subsistence. Then what is it, for it must amount to something? It is an agreement for valuable consideration beforehand to lend money on the faith of being satisfied out of this fund; which makes it a very strong case. If this is not a bill of exchange, nor a proceeding on the personal credit of Swinburn or Gibson, it is a credit on this fund, and must amount to an assignment of so much of the debt, and though the law does not admit an assignment of a chose in action, this court does; and any words will do; no particular words being necessary thereto. In the case of a bond it may be assigned in equity for valuable consideration, and good although no special form used. Suppose an obligee receives the money on the bond, and there is wrote on the back of it "Whereas I have received the principal and interest from such a one, do you the obligor pay the money to him;" this is just that case; only it is not a debt arising from specialty: therefore like an assignment of rent to a third person. The case of Ryal v. Rowles [1 Ves. Sen. 348], now under the consideration of the court, occurred to me. There the assignment of debts, of which no possession, came in question; but those are debts depending on partnership, and mentioned there how far the assignment of a bond should be supported against the assignees under the commission: and it is clear, that they have been supported where the bond has been delivered over; but if not, some doubt has been, whether it should be supported on the foot of the clause in the statute, J. 1. But this is clear of that doubt, because this was a debt due to Gibson without any specialty. This draft, which amounts to an assignment, is deposited with the officer Swinburn, and therefore is attached immediately upon it: so that Swinburn could not have paid this money to Gibson, supposing he had not been bankrupt, without making himself liable to the defendants; because he would have paid it with full notice of this assignment, for valuable consideration.* * *

 In Ormond v. Insurance Co., 145 N. C. 140 (1907), the court said:

"No particular form of words is essential to effect an assignment. * * * An assignment is substantially a transfer, actual or constructive, with clear intent at the time to part with all interest in the thing transferred, and with a full knowledge of the rights so transferred."

20 "There can be no doubt as to the rule that when, for a valuable consideration from the payee, an order is drawn upon a third party and made payable out of a particular fund, then due or to become due from him to the drawer, the delivery of the order to the payee operates as an assignment pro tanto of the fund, and the drawee is bound, after notice of such assignment, to apply the fund, as it accrues, to the payment of the order, and to no other purpose, and the payee may, by action, compel such application. It is equally well established that if a draft be drawn generally upon the drawee, to be paid by him in the first instance, on the credit of the drawer and without regard to the source from which the money used for its payment is obtained, the designation by the drawer of a particular fund, out of which the drawee is to subsequently reimburse himself for such payment, or a particular account to which it is to be charged, will not convert the draft into an assignment of the fund, and the payee of the draft can have no action thereon against the drawee unless he duly accepts. In all cases, therefore, in which a particular fund, to accrue in futuro is designated in the draft, and the language is ambiguous, the turning-point is whether it was the intention of the parties that the payment should be made only out of the designated fund, when or as it should accrue, or whether the direction to the drawee to pay was intended to be absolute, and the fund was mentioned only as a source of reimbursement or an instruction as to bookkeeping.

"The order in this case was in the following words:

"Mohawk, August 31, 1876.

"Jerome Tuttle:

"Pay Brill & Russell $300, and charge the same to our account for labor and materials performed and furnished in the repairs and alterations of the house in which you reside in the village of Mohawk.

"J. P. Ackerman & Son."

"If at the time this order was drawn the drawers had to their credit on the designated account the sum of $300 or more, and this fact was understood by the parties, there would be no difficulty in holding that the intention was to transfer that credit or balance pro tanto to the plaintiffs, by substituting them in place of the drawers as the recipients thereof. It would be fair to presume in that case that it was intended that the payment should be made out of the balance of account in the hands of the drawee, and not on the general credit of the drawer and that the direction to charge the payment to that account was an appropriation of such balance to the extent necessary to meet

MILLER v. THAREL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1876. 75 N. C. 148.)

Civil action upon a bond [a sealed note].

In May, 1872, the defendant sold to one Houston a tract of land, for the price of $1,600, of which $300 was paid in cash and Houston gave his note for the balance. A few days thereafter the defendant, becoming dissatisfied, re-purchased the land from Houston for the sum of $1,800, and gave the note sued on to secure the purchase money. At this time defendant surrendered to Houston the note for $1,300 aforesaid and had the amount thereof credited upon the note for $1,800 and took from Houston a bond for title. Some two weeks afterwards, the defendant and Houston rescinded this contract, the defendant surrendering to Houston the bond for title and Houston surrendering to defendant, as he supposed, the note sued on. This transaction took place about dark. Houston went into his house, got a pocket book and took therefrom a paper and handed it to the defendant, saying, "now tear it up." The defendant, thinking it was his note, did tear it up. Before the maturity of the note sued on it was transferred by Houston to the plaintiff [for full value but without endorsement]. * * *

It is agreed * * * that the plaintiff took the note before maturity and without notice of any equity as between the defendant and Houston, or that Houston was withholding the note fraudulently from Tharel. * * * It is admitted that Houston is in bankruptcy.

His honor, being of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance due upon the note after deducting the credit of $1,300 gave judgment accordingly. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

the order. The complaint alleges, and when the plaintiff rested the allegation was sustained by proof, that when the order was drawn, August 31st, and when it was presented, September 1st, there was a sufficient amount due and admitted to be due from the drawee on the account mentioned in the order to pay it. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly denied." Rapallo, J. in Brill v. Tuttle, 81 N. Y. 454, 457-458 (1880).

"It is only where there is an actual appropriation of the fund that an equitable assignment arises. It does not arise from a promise to pay out of a certain fund when such shall be created. Story v. Hull, 143 M. 506; Cameron v. Boeger, 200 Ill. 84." Stone, J. in Hibernian Banking Ass'n v. Davis, 295 Ill. 537, 545 (1921).

Where a contract does not constitute an equitable assignment, being a promise to pay out of a fund, it may create an equitable lien on the fund. See Rinehart v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 261 Fed. 646, 649 (1917). But usually it does not. See 1 Williston on Contracts § 429 on, and Tharel destroyed that paper, the liability of Tharel on the note was as much discharged as if he had paid the money. The case is the same in effect as if he had received the note and put it in his pocket, from which it was afterwards stolen, and the same as if he had received and torn it in pieces and thrown them away and the pieces had been picked up and so artfully put together that the tearing could not be detected. It must be concluded that at that time he was under no legal or equitable liability by virtue of the note to any one.

It then only remains to consider whether such liability subsequently arose, by reason of the transfer of the note by Houston to the plaintiff under the circumstances stated in the case. The note was under seal and was payable to Houston or bearer. Notwithstanding this, it is to be regarded [under the state statute applicable,] so far as its negotiability is concerned, and its liability to be governed by the commercial law applicable to promissory notes, as if it were a promissory note not under a seal, and payable to a payee or order. * * *

It is conceded that Houston transferred the note to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration before its maturity, in the usual course of business, and without actual notice or anything from which notice could be implied, or any defense to it. If Houston had endorsed the note to the plaintiff at the time of such transfer, he would thereby have passed the legal title according to the law merchant, and the plaintiff's right would probably have been good against the maker by whose misfortune or negligence it had been permitted to remain in the hands of the payee after it had been paid. We say, probably, because it is not necessary to decide this question. The note sued on was not endorsed to the plaintiff, but was assigned to him by an oral contract. It is true that under this assignment, by virtue of our recent legislation (C. C. P. § 55) the assignee may sue in our courts in his own name as an equitable assignee, or cestui que trust could formerly have done in equity; but he does not acquire by such an assignment the peculiar rights which by the law merchant, founded on the policy of promoting the circulation of promissory notes, attach to an endorsee of each paper. All the authorities from Parsons on Bills and Notes, cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, to sustain the proposition that a holder of a promissory note, taken under the circumstances stated, can recover against the maker, notwithstanding any equitable or other defense, such as payment before maturity, he may have, apply only to holders who hold by an assignment recognized by the law merchant, viz. an endorsee. The distinction between a title by assignment and by endorsement is stated, but not as clearly as it might be, in 2 Pars. Notes & Bills, 52. It is also made in Thigby v. Horne, 1 Ired. Eq. 20; Lindsay v. Wilson, 2 Dev. & Bat. Eq. 85.

The case of Whistler v. Forster, 14 C. B. 248 (108 E. C. L. R.) which probably escaped the attention of Mr. Parsons, is in point and is decisive of the question. The defendant drew the check sued on before the 3rd of October, and handed it to Griffiths without any other consideration than a promise to furnish funds to take it up, which he failed to perform. On the 3rd of October Griffiths gave the check to the plaintiff for value, but did not then endorse it. Afterwards he did. At the time the plaintiff received the check he had no notice of the way in which Griffiths had obtained it, but at the time of the endorsement he had. The judgment was for the defendant. The observations of Willis, J., are so clear that I extract from them:

"The general rule of law is undoubted that no one can transfer a better title than he himself possesses. Nemo dat quod non habet. To this there are some exceptions; one of which arises out of the law merchant as to negotiable instruments. * * * This rule, however, is only intended to favor transfers in the ordinary and usual manner, whereby a title is acquired according to the law merchant, and not a transfer which is valid in equity according to the doctrine respecting the assignment of choses in action, now indeed recognized, and in many instances enforced by courts of law; and it is, therefore, clear that in order to acquire the benefit of this rule the holder of the bill must, if it be payable to order, obtain an endorsement, and that he is affected by notice of fraud received before he does so. Until he does so he is merely in the position of the assignee of an ordinary chose in action, and has no better right than his assignor." To the same effect is Haskill v. Mitchell, 53 Me. 468.

The right of the plaintiff to recover if it has any foundation at all, must stand not on his having the legal title, or any principle of mercantile law, but on his having some equity which makes it unconscionable in the defendant to refuse payment. It is said that such an equity arises out of the fact that the defendant by his negligence, permitted the note to exist and to remain in the hands of Houston after it had been discharged by payment, and thus enabled Houston to commit the fraud. The rule is not disputed, but probably it will be found confined in its application to cases in which the defendant is guilty of some complicity in the fraud, or where, by his negligence, he has enabled the person committing the fraud to pass a legal right to the plaintiff. In this last case the maxim would apply that where equities are equal the legal title would prevail. But where no legal title passed, the case would come under the maxim that where the equities are equal the prior equity prevails. The authorities to this effect are very numerous. In Turton v. Benson, 1 P. Wms. 496, the payee of an unnegotiable note assigned it to one of his creditors as a security, and it was held that the maker could avail himself of an equitable defense. The Master of the Rolls said: "Supposing a man should assign over a satisfied bond, the assignee could not set up this bond in equity, which being satisfied before, could receive no new force from the assignment." On appeal Lord Chancellor Parker considered all the arguments which could be used by the plaintiff in this case, considering him as a mere assignee, and confirmed the decree.

See 2 Vol., 2 part of Leading Cases in Eq.; Note to Royall v. Rowles, 218-36; Mordy v. Sutton, 2 Ired. Eq. 382; King v. Lindsay, 3 Ired. Eq. 77; 7 Ired. Eq. 79.

We think there was error in the judgment below.

PER CURIAM. Judgment reversed and judgment that defendant go without day and recover his costs in this court.³¹

³¹ "It is too well settled by authority, both in England and in this country, to permit of questioning, that the purchaser of a draft, or check, who obtains title without an endorsement by the payee, holds it subject to all equities and defenses existing between the original parties, even though he has paid full consideration, without notice of the existence of such equities and defenses. Harrop v. Fisher, 30 L. J. (C. L., N. S.) 283; Whistler v. Forster, 14 C. B. (N. S.) 246; Savage v. King, 17 Me. 301; Clark v. Callison, 7 Ill. 263; Haskell v. Mitchell, 53 Me. 468; Clark v. Whitaker, 50 N. H. 474; Calder v. Billington, 15 Me. 398; Lancaster Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 100 Mass. 18; Gilbert v. Sharp, 2 Lans. 412; Hedges v. Sealy, 9 Barb. 214-218; Franklin Bank v. Raymond, 3 Wend. 69; Raynor v. Hoagland, 7 J. & S. 11; Muller v. Pondir, 55 N. Y. 325; Freund v. Importers' & Traders' Bank, 76 N. Y. 352; Trust Co. v. Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 68; Osgood v. Artt, 17 Fed. 575.

"The reasoning on which this doctrine is founded may be briefly stated as follows: The general rule is that no one can transfer a better title than he possesses. An exception arises out of the rule of the law merchant, as to negotiable instruments. It is founded on the commercial policy of sustaining the credit of commercial paper. Being treated as currency in commercial transactions, such instruments are subject to the same rule as money. If transferred by endorsement, for value, in good faith and before maturity, they become available in the hands of the holder, notwithstanding the existence of equities and defenses, which would have rendered them unavailable in the hands of a prior holder.

"This rule is only applicable to negotiable instruments which are negotiated according to the law merchant.

"When, as in this case, such an instrument is transferred but without an endorsement, it is treated as a chose in action assigned to the purchaser. The assignee acquires all the title of the assignor, and may maintain an action thereon in his own name. And, like other choses in action, it is subject to all the equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker or acceptor against the previous holder." Parker, J. in Goshen National Bank v. Bingham, 118 N. Y. 349, 354-355 (1890).

"In truth, the assignee of a chose in action gets no title to it, properly speaking and can not be said to be a purchaser without notice. He gets only the right to use the assignor's name to enforce the claim, and therefore to recover what the assignor might; and the very nature of the subject warns him of the necessity of inquiring respecting the obligor's equity, and, therefore, amounts to notice of such equity. If, upon inquiry, the obligor misinforms him, or if the obligor acquiesce in the assignment, and delay for a long time to bring forward his equity, such conduct might vary the rule, and give the assignee rights, which the assignment itself would not." Ruffin, C. J. in King v. Lindsay, 38 N. C. 77, 80 (1843).

WALL v. COUNTY OF MONROE.

Action upon warrants of the county of Monroe, Arkansas, which were drawn by the clerk of the county upon its treasurer, in favor of one Frank Gallagher, and transferred by him to the plaintiff. The county sought to set off against the warrants a judgment for a larger amount obtained by it against Gallagher before his transfer to the plaintiff.

FIELD, J. ³² The warrants in suit are evidences of indebtedness by the county of Monroe, issued by that branch of its government to which is intrusted, by laws of the state, the examination and approval of claims against the county. They are orders upon the treasurer of the county to pay out of its funds for county purposes, not otherwise appropriated, the amounts specified. They establish, prime facie, the validity of the claims allowed and authorize their payment. But they have no other effect. Their issue determined nothing as to other demands of the payee against the county or of the county against him. Had there been other claims to be adjusted and settled between the parties, these warrants, if lawfully issued, would have been taken as approved items in the account—nothing more.

The warrants being in form negotiable, are transferable by delivery so far as to authorize the holder to demand payment of them and to maintain, in his own name, an action upon them. But they are not negotiable instruments in the sense of the law merchant, so that, when held by a bona fide purchaser, evidence of their invalidity or defenses available against the original payee would be excluded. The transferee takes them subject to all legal and equitable defenses which existed to them in the hands of such payee. There has been a great number of decisions in the courts of the several states upon instruments of this kind, and there is little diversity of opinion regarding their character. All the courts agree that the instruments are mere prima facie and not conclusive evidence of the validity of the allowed claims against the county by which they were issued. The county is not estopped from questioning the legality of the claims; and when this is conceded the instruments conclude nothing as to other demands between the parties.

may vest in the assignee. "In this state choses in action arising in contract are assignable in writing. The Civil Code of 1895, § 3077, declares, 'All choses in action, arising upon contract may be assigned so as to vest the title in the assignee, but he takes it, except negotiable securities, subject to the equities existing between the assignor and debtor at the time of the assignment, and until notice of the assignment is given to the person liable.' No special form of words is necessary to make an assignment. Any language, however informal, if it shows the intention of the owner of the chose in action to transfer it, will be sufficient to vest the property in the assignee." Lumpkin, J. in Southern Mutual Life Ins. Assoc. v. Durdin, 132 Ga. 495, 498 (1909).

³² The statement of facts and parts of the opinion are omitted.

The case of Crawford County v. Wilson, (7 Ark. 214) in the Supreme Court of Arkansas, is cited as showing that a different rule prevails in that state. The language of the opinion, that county warrants are endowed with the properties of negotiable instruments must be read in connection with the point involved, which was whether county warrants were transferable by mere delivery, so as to vest the legal interest in the holder. To this extent they may be called negotiable, but no court of Arkansas has held that they were negotiable in the sense of the law merchant, so as to shut out, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, inquiries as to their validity, or preclude defences which could be made to them in the hands of the original parties. The law is not different there from that which obtains in other states.

The cancellation of the warrants originally issued and the substitution of others in their place did not change their character. * * *

Judgment [for defendant] affirmed.

HENRY E. HOOKER v. EAGLE BANK OF ROCHESTER.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1864. 30 N. Y. 83, 86 Am. Dec. 351.)

This was an action by Henry E. Hooker, against the Eagle Bank of Rochester to recover a claim for services rendered by Kauffman and Bissell which had been assigned to the plaintiff by parol. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

MULLIN, J.³³ * * * The defendant moved for a nonsuit on several grounds all of which are disposed of by the legal propositions above advanced, except one, and that is, that the assignment from Kauffman & Bissell to the plaintiff, being without writing, was void. A chose in action might, at law, be assigned without writing, so as to enable the assignee to enforce the debt or demand assigned, in the name of the assignor, if there was a valuable consideration, and a delivery of the thing assigned. (Ford v. Stuart, 19 Johns. 342; Briggs v. Dorr, Id. 95; Prescott v. Hall, 17 Id. 284). Such an assignment, in equity, enabled the assignee to sue in his own name. A book-debt is a chose in action, and assignable (Dix v. Cobb, 4 Mass. 508); and may, like any other chose in action, be assigned by parol. (Jones v. Witter, 13 Mass. 304; Briggs v. Dorr, 19 Johns. 95 and cases cited; 2 Cases in Chancery, 7, 37; Dunn v. Snell, 15 Mass. 485). Under the Code, an assignment, valid as an equitable assignment, is equally valid at law. AUGUST FISHER v. CHRISTOPHER DEERING.

WALKER, J. It appears, from an examination of the authorities, that at the ancient common law a lease was not assignable so as to invest the assignee with the legal title to the rent. Such instruments were, in that respect, on a footing with other agreements and choses in action. But the 32 Hen. 8, chapter 34, section 1, declared that the assignee of the reversion should become invested with the rents. But notwithstanding this enactment, the courts held that the assignee of the reversion could not sue for and recover the rent unless the tenant should attorn, when the holder of the reversion might recover subsequently accruing rent in an action of debt. Marle v. Foke, 3 Salk. 118; Robins v. Cox, 1 Levintz, 22; Ards v. Walkins, 2 Croke's Elis, 673; Knowles Case, 1 Dyer, 5 b., 5 Barn. & Cress. 512, and the note.

In Williams v. Haywood, 1 Ellis & Ellis, 1040, after reviewing the old decisions on this question, it was, in substance, held that, under the 32 Hen. 8, an assignee of the rent, without the reversion could recover when there was an attornment, and that such an assignee could, under the 4 of Anne, recover without an attornment.

The courts seem to have proceeded upon the ground that there could be no privity of contract unless the tenant should attorn to the assignee of the reversion; that, whilst the assignment of the reversion created a privity of estate between the assignee and the tenant, privity of contract could only arise by an agreement between them. Some confusion seems to have got into the books from calling the purchaser of the reversion an assignee of the lease, by its passing by the conveyance as appurtenant to the estate. But where the tenant attorned to the assignee of the reversion the assignment became complete, and then there existed both privity of estate and of contract between the assignee and the tenant, and by reason of the privity of contract the assignee might sue in debt, and recover [rent] subsequently accruing, but not rent in arrear at the time he acquired the reversion.

To give the assignee of the reversion a more complete remedy the 4 & 5 Anne, Chapter 16, section 9, was adopted, dispensing with the necestract should be in writing and signed by such party. Thus in 20 Cyc. 219, upon this precise point, the text says:

"The interest of a purchaser under an executory contract of sale is so far realty that it cannot be assigned verbally."

"If such written contract of purchase could be transferred by delivery only, thus conferring upon it the characteristic of negotiable paper, the statute of frauds would be nullified, and the evils flowing from a nonobservance thereof would flourish without let or hindrance. The equitable estate of the purchaser under such a contract is itself real estate which, under the statute, must be transferred by written contract the same as is required in the conveyance of the legal title." Thomas, J. in Coldwell v. Davidson (Ky.), 219 S. W. 445, 446 (1920).

sity of an attornment which the courts had held to be necessary under the 32 Hen. 8, to create a privity of contract. But this latter act has never been in force in this state, and hence the decisions of the British courts, made under it, are not applicable. In many states of the Union this latter act has been adopted, and the decisions of their courts conform, of course, to its provisions. But we having adopted the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature and all statutes or acts of the British parliament made in aid of, and to supply defects of the common law, prior to the fourth year of James the First, except certain enumerated statutes, and which are of a general nature and not local to that kingdom, they are declared to be the rule of decision, and shall be considered of full force until repealed by legislative authority. Gross, Comp. 1869, 416. It then follows that the 32 Hen. 8, Chap. 34, section 1, is in force in this state, as it is applicable to our condition, and is unrepealed. And we must hold that the construction given to that act by the British courts was intended also to be adopted.

The facts in this case show such a privity of contract as brings it fully within the rule announced in the above cases. Appellee paid to the appellant several installments of rent falling due under the lease after it was assigned to him. By paying the rent, the lessee fully recognized the appellant as his landlord, and created the necessary privity of contract to maintain the action.

The case of Chapman v. McGrew, 20 Ill. 101, announces a contrary doctrine. In that case this question was presented and notwithstanding the lessee had fully recognized the assignee of the lease as his landlord, it was held that the lessor of the premises might maintain an action to recover the rent. In that case, the fact that the lessee had attorned to the assignee, was given no weight, and the fact that such privity was thereby created as authorized the assignee of the lease to sue for, and recover the rent, was overlooked. In that the decision was wrong. The right of action could not be in both the lessor and his assignee, and the privity thus created gave it to the latter.

The subsequent case of Dixon v. Buell, 21 Ill. 203, only holds that such an assignee, whether he holds the legal or equitable title to the lease, may have a claim for rent, growing out of the lease, probated and allowed against the estate of the lessee. That case has no bearing on the case at bar.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

*Judgment reversed.*³⁵

³⁵ The necessity of attornment in such cases was ended in Illinois by statute in 1874. See Barnes v. Northern Trust Co., 169 Ill. 112 (1897).

HURXTHAL v. BOOM CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1903. 53 W. Va. 87, 44 S. E. 520, 97 Am. St. Rep. 954.)

Action by Josie M. Hurxthal against the St. Lawrence Boom & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

By agreement of the 13th of June, 1894, the defendant company covenanted with Ben Hurxthal to maintain and repair dams to supply water to his flour and grist mill and to keep trash from impeding the flow of water through his mill race, the contract providing that "the obligation to pay the same shall, in addition to being a personal one, be a covenant running with the land and binding upon said Ronceverte Flour Mills. mill race, and water power, into whomsoever hands they may pass." It was expressly provided that the agreement should continue in force for five years from its date and at the option of Ben Hurxthal "his heirs, representatives or assigns," exercised within the five years, should continue ten years. Ben Hurxthal died and in the administration of his estate the grist mill property was sold to his administratrix, Josie M. Hurxthal, to pay his debts and she gave notice to extend the agreement, and later brought this action of covenant against the company for failing to keep up the dams and failing to keep debris out of the mill race. She recovered a verdict and judgment for $4,000, and the company sued out this writ of error.

BRANNON, J.³⁶ * * * A question going to the very root of the case, because involving the very right of the plaintiff to sue upon the agreement on which her suit is based, arises upon the plaintiff's first instruc-reversion and the assignee of the lease; and while the latter might maintain, and be liable to, an action upon such a covenant, it was different as to the former. To remedy this, the statute of 32 H. 8, cap. 34, was enacted, which gave, generally, to the assignee of the reversion the same right of action that the lessor had, upon the covenants in the lease. But this statute did not extend to mere personal and collateral covenants; it embraced those only which touched and concerned the thing demised." Gholson, J. in Masury v. Southworth, 9 Oh. St. 340, 346 (1859).

"Covenants which run with the land were always exceptions to the maxim of the common law that choses in action could not be assigned. They cannot be separated from the land and transferred; but with the land they could, as being annexed to the estate in possession, and bound the parties in respect to the privy of estate." Ruffin, C. J. in Markland, Adm'r v. Crump, 18 N. C. (1 Div. & B.) 94, 97 (1834).

In Norman v. Wells, 17 Wend. 136, 148 (1837), Cowen, J. refers to "the negotiable quality of covenants" running with the land under the rules in Spencer's Case, 5 Rep. 16 (1583).

On what covenants run with the land, see 47 Am. Dec. 569, note; 82 Am. St. Rep. 664, note.

tion, saying that if she, before June 13, 1899, gave the company written notice that she elected to extend the agreement of June 13, 1894, for five years after June 13, 1899, then the plaintiff had succeeded to the rights of Ben Hurxthal under that agreement. This involves the question whether the covenants in said agreement binding the company to maintain the dams as therein provided, and not to suffer or permit the accumulation of trash in the mill race, are covenants real running with the gristmill property and inuring to the benefit of the plaintiff as its owner derivatively from Ben Hurxthal, and thus entitling her to sue for an infraction of that agreement; or are mere personal covenants binding the company only as such, and not authorizing the plaintiff, as successor in ownership of the gristmill, to sue for the infraction of the agreement. "A covenant is said to run with the land when either the liability to perform it or the right to enforce it passes to the assignee of the land." 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 134. When the company made those covenants, it passed no estate in the mill property to Hurxthal. The company and he were strangers in estate. To create a covenant real, there must be a privity in estate between the parties; otherwise it is simply a personal obligation, neither binding nor benefiting the land in the hands of heirs, devisees, or assigns. Lydick v. Railroad, 17 W. Va. 427; Trans. Co. v. Pine Line Co., 22 W. Va. 631, 46 Am. Rep. 527; 2 Minor, Inst. 715. "It is not sufficient that the covenant is concerning land, but to make it run with the land there must be a privity of estate between the parties, and the covenant must have relation to an interest created or conveyed, in order that the covenant may pass to the grantee of the covenantee." 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 147. "A covenant does not run with land unless contained in a grant thereof, or of some estate therein." Fresno Canal Co. v. Rowell (Cal.) 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112. It is true that this covenant has one element of covenant real in the fact that it benefits the estate of the covenantee, the mill property; but it lacks another material element—privity in estate—as the company conveyed no interest in the mill, but merely made a personal obligation on the company touching the mill. So this covenant is not, in its inherent nature, a real covenant. But does its language make it such? The agreement makes the obligation of Hurxthal to pay for maintaining the dam one running with the land. It seems, under the law above stated, that this would not, perhaps, make it a covenant real; but it was clearly a lien in its terms as an equitable mortgage. There is no such provision as to the covenants made by the company, and we infer it was not so intended. But there is the clause in the agreement giving the right to the assignees of Hurxthal to continue the agreement for five years. What is the effect of that clause? It seems to be well settled in law that if a covenant is not, in nature and kind, a real covenant, the mere declaration of the parties that it shall run with the land will not make it a real covenant, though so stated in the document. 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 134; 2 Washb. R. Prop. §§ 1203, 1205; Gibson v. Holden, 56 Am. Rep. 146, 149.

Under this authority I do not see how a covenant not one of such nature as to run with land could, by declaration in the agreement, be made such, so as to place an obligation on the land in the hands of subsequent owners; but this covenant is one not placing a burden on the Hurxthal mill, but benefiting it, and the company agreed that benefit should go to the use of the assigns of Hurxthal. The point is not without difficulty, but it does seem to me that under these circumstances this consent of the company, while it would not place a burden on the company property, would give the mill property of Hurxthal the benefit of the covenant, so as to enable the plaintiff as alienee to sue upon it. I do not know that it will add anything to the strength of this position, in a legal point of view, to rely upon the fact that the company accepted from the plaintiff pay for one year's maintenance of the dam. If the covenant does not give her right, it would be doubtful whether an oral agreement would do so under the statute of fraud, as being a contract not performable in one year, though the statute is not pleaded. This is not material, however, because I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to sue for a breach of the covenant occurring during her ownership, by reason of the clause giving the benefit of the agreement to the assignee of Ben Hurxthal. There can be no question but that the plaintiff is a privy in estate with Ben Hurxthal, and an "assign" within the meaning of that word used in said agreement; for she purchased at the judicial sale, which by law cast upon her the entire estate of Ben Hurxthal, and she is as much an assignee of the property from Ben Hurxthal as if he had conveyed it to her. 8 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 146; Rawle on Cov. § 213; Tiedman, R. Prop. § 860; Mygatt v. Coe (N. Y.) 36 N. E. 870, 24 L. R. A. 850. So the plaintiff can recover if the defendant failed in its covenants after the plaintiff acquired the property March 16, 1899, the date of her purchase at the court sale. Upon these questions of fact, in view of a new trial, we decline to pass. Therefore plaintiff's first instruction is good and defendant's first and second bad, because denying right to sue. * * *

AMERICAN COLORTYPE COMPANY v. CONTINENTAL COLOR-TYPE COMPANY ET AL.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1903. 188 U. S. 104, 23 Sup. Ct. 265, 47 L. Ed. 402.)

HOLMES, J. This is a bill in equity brought in the circuit court for the northern district of Illinois by a New Jersey corporation against an Illinois corporation and private persons, citizens of Illinois. Upon demurrer the bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, on the ground, as is certified, that it was a bill to recover the contents of a chose in action in favor of an assignee, the assignors being citizens of Illinois.* The case comes here by appeal. The prayers of the bill are for injunctions to prevent the defendants Maas, Fierlein, Freese, and Schulz assisting the defendant company or the defendants Quetsch and Seibert in the three-color printing business, revealing secret processes, etc., until different specified dates. The main ground of the prayers is the contracts to be mentioned, and the question is whether the claim stated by the plaintiff is a claim as assignee.

The plaintiff is the assignee of the assets and good will of the National Colortype Company, the American Three-Color Company, Illinois corporations, and the Osborne Company, a New Jersey corporation, and was formed on March 1, 1902, for the purpose of consolidating the three. Among the more important contracts which purported to be transferred were two between the National Colortype Company and Maas and Fierlein respectively. By the former, Maas was employed as superintendent of the plat-making department, and agreed to remain in the company's employment and not to accept employment from others in the business of three-color printing for five years from December 1, 1901, and not to become interested in any way in that business in the United States, east of the Rocky Mountains, or divulge any secrets or processes relating to that business, for ten years from the day mentioned. By the other contract Fierlein was employed as salesman, and agreed to devote his whole time and attention to the interest and business of the company for two years from the same date. There was a similar contract with the defendant Freese, expiring May 1, 1903, but containing a promise by him never to divulge any of the secrets, methods, or practices of the company, and agreeing that his going to work for any others engaged in similar business should be considered a breach of the promise just set forth.

The bill alleges that Maas, knowing of the transfer, consented to it, announced his intention of holding the plaintiff to the contract with him, remained in its employ in the same capacity, accepted the stipulated salary, and was instructed in valuable secrets, and that the complainant, by the consent of all parties, became substituted as a party to the contract in place of the National Colortype Company. There are shorter but similar allegations concerning Fierlein and Freese. An independent contract with the defendant Schulz is alleged, which has expired, but it is alleged that by virtue of his employment he also has become possessed of trade secrets and processes belonging to plaintiff.

The bill goes on to allege that Maas and Fierlien, while in the plaintiff's

* By section 24(1) of the Federal Judicial Code it is provided that "No district court shall have cognizance of any suit (except upon foreign bills of exchange) to recover upon any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of any assignee * * * unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover upon said note or other chose in action if no assignment had been made."

employment and pay, conspiring with the defendants Quetsch and Seibert, got up the defendant corporation as a rival to the plaintiff, induced the defendants Freese and Schultz to enter its service, have taken over their own special skill and knowledge of the plaintiff's secrets to the hostile camp, and, in short, will ruin the plaintiff if they are permitted to go on.

We are of opinion that a case is stated within the jurisdiction of the court. It is true that the starting point for the relations between the plaintiff and its employees was what purported to be an assignment. It is true that the bill emphasizes this aspect of the case, and states the evidence more accurately than the result. But those circumstances do not change the legal conclusion from the facts set forth. The allegations show that, having the old contract before them, the parties came together under a new agreement, which was determined by reference to the terms of that contract, but which none the less was personal and immediate. Maas, Fierlein, and Freese, who were under contract with the National Colortype Company, agreed to work for the plaintiff instead. The plaintiff accepted their promises and gave a consideration for them by undertaking personally to pay. It does not matter that the bill calls this becoming substituted as the employer and as a party to the old contracts. The plaintiff could not become substituted to a strictly personal relation. All that it could do was to enter into a new one which was exactly like that which had existed before. Service is like marriage, which, in the old law, was a species of it. It may be repeated, but substitution is unknown. Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co. 127 U. S. 379, 387, 32 L. ed. 246, 248, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1308.

It may be that the form of the allegation was suggested by the hope to get some help from the written documents when the plaintiff comes to the proof, as against difficulties raised by the statute of frauds. We have nothing to do with that. It is quite manifest that the plaintiff, if it prevails, will not do so on the ground that, by virtue of the transfer to it, it can claim the beneficial interest in the original agreements, and thus is an assignee within the definition given in Plant Investment Co. v. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. 152 U. S. 71, 77, 38 L. ed. 358, 360, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 483; if it recovers it will recover on a promise made directly to it upon a consideration which it has furnished. This test is recognized in Thompson v. Perrine, 106 U. S. 589, 593, 27 L. ed. 298, 300, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, 568, although the doctrine there quoted from Mr. Justice Story, that the holder of a note payable to bearer recovers on a new promise made directly to himself, has been controverted elsewhere, and, indeed, long has smouldered as a dimly burning question of the law. Holtzen-dorff, Rechtslexicon, sub v. Inhaberpapiere, ad fin. (3d ed. 365, 371). Compare Abbott v. Hills, 158 Mass. 396, 397, 33 N. E. 592, Story, Conf. L. 8th ed. § 344.

What we have said suggests the answer to the objection that a novation is not set forth. The allegations seem to mean that the old company was discharged, but this is not a question of novation. We are dealing with a new bilateral contract made up of mutual undertakings to serve and to pay. The implication that the old contract is discharged is material only so far as it shows that the plaintiff's rights can be enforced without unjustly disregarding the rights of a third person.

It is unnecessary to consider whether an independent ground of jurisdiction is shown in the threatened revelation of trade secrets, or to discuss the different position of the defendant Schultz. Whether the obligation not to disclose secrets be independent of the express contract, or not, a case is made out. The question of independence will not arise unless a difficulty is encountered in the evidence because of the statute of frauds, but that is not a matter of pleading. We have not to consider how far the injunction should go in case the plaintiff succeeds, or anything except the objection that the plaintiff is suing as an assignee.

Decree reversed.

CITIZENS' LOAN ASS'N v. BOSTON & M. R. R.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1907. 196 Mass. 528, 82 N. E. 696, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1025, 124 Am. St. Rep. 584, 13 Ann. Cas. 365.)

Action by the Citizens' Loan Association against the Boston & Maine Railroad. There was a judgment for plaintiff on an agreed statement of facts, and defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Plaintiff and defendant are domestic corporations. On February 27, 1905, and for a long time prior thereto, Steven J. Wescott was in the employ of defendant as a conductor. On that day Wescott, for a valuable consideration, and as security for the payment of a note given by him to plaintiff, and for money loaned, assigned to plaintiff all claims which he might thereafter have against defendant for moneys becoming due between that date and January 1, 1908, for services.

Rugg, J. The single question presented by this appeal is whether an assignment of wages to be earned in an existing employment, given before bankruptcy, without fraud, and upon sufficient consideration, to secure a valid subsisting debt, and duly recorded, can be enforced, after the discharge in bankruptcy of the assignor, as to wages earned in the course of the original employment, by the creditor, who has not proved his debt in bankruptcy. A debt is not extinguished by a discharge in bankruptcy. The remedy upon the debt, and the legal, but not the moral, obligation to pay, is at an end. The obligation itself is not canceled. Champion v. Buckingham, 165 Mass. 76, 42 N. E. 498; Heather v. Webb, 2 C. P. D. 1. An assignment of future earnings, which may accrue under an existing employment, is a valid contract and creates rights, which may be enforced both at law and in equity, whichever may in a particular case be the appropriate forum. *Tripp v. These cases proceed upon the theory that the worker under contract for service, though indefinite as to time and compensation and terminable at will, has an actual and real interest in wages to be earned in the future by virtue of his contract. He may recover for an unjustifiable interference with such an employment, as for an injury to any other vested property right. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Mass. 485, 59 N. E. 125, 52 L. R. A. 115, 83 Am. St. Rep. 289; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 74 N. E. 603, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499. It is plain that one may sell wool to be grown upon his own sheep, or a crop to be produced upon his own land, but not that to be grown or produced upon the sheep or land of another.³⁷ No more can one assign wages where there is no contract for service. Jones v. Richardson, 10 Metc. 481; Low v. Pew, 108 Mass. 347, 11 Am. Rep. 357. But profitable employment is a reality. Wages to be earned by virtue of an existing employment are no more shadowy or insubstantial than the fleece of next spring or the crop of the following autumn. Money to accrue from such service is not a bare expectancy or mere possibility, but a substance capable of grasp and delivery. It constitutes a present, existing, right of property, which may be sold or assigned as any other property. Although not in the manual possession of the assignor, it is in his potential possession. The transfer of this potential possession creates the assignee a lienor upon the property right. The holder of such an assignment stands upon a firmer plane than the mortgagee of future acquired property, who has only the right by contract to act betimes in the future for his protection. Wasserman v. McDonnell, 190 Mass. 326, 76 N. E. 959. The assignee of wages to be earned under an existing contract gets a present right, perfect in itself, requiring no future action on his part.³⁸ Contracts for personal service are of such a character that their breach is in appropriate cases enjoined. Lumly v. Wagner, 1 De G., M. & G. 604; Duff v. Russell, 133 N. Y. 678, 31 N. E. 622; Whitwood Chemical Co. v. Hardman [1891] 2 Ch. 416. See Phila. Base Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 51 Atl. 973, 58 L. R. A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627. It may be taken for granted that the right to future wages to be earned under such a contract does not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy. Nor are we dealing here with a contract as to labor in terms or spirit contrary to public policy, as in Parsons v. Trask, 7 Gray, 473, 66 Am. Dec. 502. But on the contrary, assignments of wages are recognized as valid by statute. Rev. Laws, c. 189, §§ 32, 33, 34; Id. c. 102, §§ 51, 57 to 67, both inclusive; Id. c. 106, § 63. The present case is not affected by St. 1905, p. 224, c. 308, or St. 1906, p. 366, c. 390.

³⁷ There is, of course, no logic in any such distinction. Its sole justification is that it narrows the scope of the doctrine of the potential possession of personal property. Since an attempted sale which cannot function as one will be deemed to be a contract to sell, and since a contract may be made to sell personal property owned at the time by a third person who has not authorized the contract, it would seem to be only the fact that the potential possession doctrine is anomalous and therefore to be restricted that justified the judicially established doctrine about sales of wool not yet grown and crops not yet produced which is stated in the text. "The English Sale of Goods Act and the American Uniform Law both abolish by implication the doctrine of potential possession, leaving the question of contracts to sell future crops, and the future young of animals, on the same footing as contracts to sell other unspecified or future goods." Samuel Williston, The Progress of the Law, 1919-1920: Sales, 34 Harv. L. Rev. 741, 745.

Specific performance of contracts to labor like that in question will not be enforced. Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310-318, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414; Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275, 17 Sup. Ct. 326, 41 L. Ed. 715. It is only where labor has been voluntarily performed that the question now presented can arise. It is possible that an agreement to execute an assignment, falling short of the creation of a lien, is, when the wages have been actually earned, enforceable in equity, even after a subsequent bankruptcy or insolvency. We do not decide this, however. Edwards v. Peterson, 89 Me. 367, 14 Atl. 936, 6 Am. St. Rep. 207; Stott v. Franey, 20 Or. 410, 26 Pac. 271, 23 Am. St. Rep. 132. At lowest the assignment in question became "a specific equitable lien on the fund" (Triste v. Child, 21 Wall, 441, 22 L. Ed. 623), or was "an independent collateral agreement given by way of guaranty or other security" for the main debt, and there is no reason why such an agreement should not outlive the remedy upon the debt, to secure which it was given (Shaw v. Silloway, 145 Mass. 503, 507, 14 N. E. 783). In either event it was not dissolved by the bankruptcy.³⁹

³⁸ This is clear. But if there is an attempt to assign a claim expected under a contract not yet made, or wages to accrue under an employment not yet arranged, Massachusetts, in the absence of a statute, held the assignment invalid (Herbert v. Bronson, 125 Mass. 475 (1878); Raulins v. Levi, 232 Mass. 42 (1919)) and that seems the majority view (Shackelford v. Kiser Co., 131 Ala. 224 (1901)); but the minority view that such assignments are valid seems more in accord with the doctrine of equitable assignments. See Edwards v. Peterson, 80 Me. 367 (1888). The minority view has been adopted in Massachusetts by a statute which permits such assignments for a period of two years if the statutory form is used. Gilman v. Raymond (Mass.), 127 N. E. 794 (1920). In Monarch Discount Co. v. C. & O. R. Co., 285 Ill. 233, 239 (1918), the court says that the assignment of wages to be earned under an existing contract may be made "even though the employment is for an indefinite time." On the validity of an assignment of unearned wages, see 5 Ann. Cas. 64, note.

On the somewhat related problem of transfers by heirs of their expectancies, see Costigan's Cases on Wills, Descent and Administration, pp. 486-493.

³⁹ On the bankruptcy question, see 1 Williston on Contracts, § 414, pp. 772-773.

We have considered the contrary authorities of In re West (D. C.) 128 Fed. 205, In re Home Discount Co. (D. C.) 147 Fed. 538, and Leitch v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 95 Minn. 35, 103 N. W. 704, with the deference to which they are entitled. They proceed upon considerations as to the effect of an assignment of wages and the rights vesting thereunder in the assignee, as well as public policy pointed out in the latter case, which are inconsistent with what we conceive to be sound reasoning, and opposed to the numerous decisions of this court above cited concerning rights acquired under assignments of wages. In the absence of a decision to the same effect by the Supreme Court of the United States, we cannot accede to them as authoritative. Nor do we perceive anything inconsistent with the conclusion we have reached, in Clark v. Clark, 17 How. 315, 15 L. Ed. 77, East Lewisbury v. Marsh, 91 Pa. 96, Christian & Craft Grocery Co. v. Michael Lyons, 121 Ala. 84-87, 25 South. 571, 77 Am. St. Rep. 30, Williams v. Chambers, Q. B. 337, and Hanover Nat. Bank v. Moyses, 186 U. S. 192, 22 Sup. Ct. 857, 46 L. ed. 1113, which are cited as generally supporting authorities in Re Home Discount Co., ubi supra.

The assignment to the plaintiff is a lien which was preserved by section 67d of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 564, c. 541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3450]), and was not affected by the discharge in bankruptcy of the assignor. This conclusion is supported by Mallin v. Wenham, 209 Ill. 252, 70 N. E. 564, 65 L. R. A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 233.

The contrary rule would permit the public service to be undermined by the assignment to strangers of all the funds appropriated to salaries. * * * If such assignments are allowed, then the assignees, by notice to the government, would on ordinary principles be entitled to receive pay directly, and to take the place of their assignors in respect to the emoluments, leaving the duties as a barren charge to be borne by the assignors. It does not need much reflection or observation to understand that such a condition of things could not fail to produce results disastrous to the efficiency of the public service.' IN RE LETERMAN, BECHER & CO., INC.

(United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1919. 260 Fed. 543, 171 C. C. A. 327.)

In the matter of Leterman, Becher & Co., Incorporated, bankrupt. From an order awarding priority to the claim of Coleman & Co., the Tawas Company, Incorporated, appeals. Reversed.

Certiorari denied 250 U. S. 668, 40 Sup. Ct. 14.

ROGERS, J.⁴¹ * * * This controversy arises out of the failure of an assignee of choses in action to give notice to the debtors at the time of the assignment. The result is that a subsequent assignee who claims to have first given notice is seeking priority of payment out of the proceeds of assigned choses in action now in the hands of the trustee of the bankrupt assignor.

It appears that Coleman & Co. were engaged in business as commercial bankers and factors, and that on October 15, 1915, they entered into an agreement with the bankrupt, which it is alleged has ever since continued in force, whereby Coleman & Co. were to acquire certain accounts receivable of the said bankrupt by advancing thereon 80 per cent of the net face value subject to a commission charge of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, plus 6 per cent interest on sums advanced until paid. At the time of the hearing there was owing to Coleman & Co. the sum of \$9,314.48, for which they had held accounts receivable having a face value of \$11,720.74. * * *

charged by any other officer. If a sheriff can legally assign the fees which may become due him for services to be performed for the public in any given month, he may make a valid assignment of all of the fees that shall become due him for services during the whole of his term. If he could assign to one he could assign to many, and every purchaser would be entitled to the rights of assignees of claim against individuals; and in the case of conflicting interests or of disputes between the officer and his alleged transferee, the government would have to decide, at its peril, between them, or be subjected, as in the case at bar, to litigation. By a division of the unaudited claims of a public officer among many persons a powerful influence in their support may be brought to bear upon the auditing officers, which would not exist if the demands were held by the officer who rendered the service. The statutes provide for the payment of public servants after the rendition of their services, and make no distinction in this respect between officers compensated by a salary or by fees. An officer, having assigned his interest in a compensation to become due him for future public services, would have less interest in the punctual and efficient performance of his duties, and, in the case of improvident assignments, might be without the ability to discharge them. * * * In England and in some of the states, the assignability of unearned fees has been considered, and so far as our attention has been called to the adjudications, no distinction has been made between unearned fees and unearned salaries. * * *

"Upon principle and authority, we think that an assignment by a sheriff of fees for services to be rendered to the public is contrary to public policy and is void."

See 4 Ann. Cas. 423, note; 10 Ann. Cas. 636, note.

⁴¹ Part of the opinion is omitted.

In November and December, 1917, the Tawas Company advanced to the bankrupt $2,750 in three installments, for which they received the promissory notes of the bankrupt. At the time the Tawas Company made these advances the bankrupt assigned to it various accounts receivable, all of which accounts had been previously assigned to Coleman & Co. But at the time of the assignment of these accounts the Tawas Company had no information or knowledge of the previous assignment of the accounts to Coleman & Co., and it at that time was given an affidavit by the bankrupt, for the purpose of inducing the loans, in which it was recited that the bankrupt was then in a solvent condition and was the sole owner of the accounts, and that the same had not been assigned or transferred.

No notice of the assignment of the accounts was given to the debtors of the bankrupt at the time of the respective assignments by either Coleman & Co. or the Tawas Company. But a few days before the bankruptcy and on January 11, 1918, Coleman & Co. sent letters of notification to all the debtors, informing them that the accounts had been assigned to Coleman & Co. and were payable only to them. The Tawas Company on the same day also sent notices of the assignment and that payment should be made to them. * * *

The accounts assigned apparently were not delivered by the bankrupt either to Coleman & Co. or to the Tawas Company. The intention evidently was that the bankrupt should collect the assigned accounts as agent for the assignee, and as collected from time to time pay over to the assignee the amounts collected, either at the time of collection or when demanded. As between assignor and assignee and the creditors of the assignor, the validity of the assignment is not affected by the fact that the accounts to be collected were allowed to remain in the assignor's possession. It has been held that the Personal Property Law of New York (Consol. Laws, c. 41), declaring sales or mortgages of goods and chattels not followed by an actual and continued change of possession presumptively fraudulent and void as against creditors, does not relate to choses in action. Booth v. Kehoe, 71 N. Y. 341; Young v. Upson (C. C.) 115 Fed. 192. And the Supreme Court of the United States has held it not unlawful to allow the accounts to remain in the possession of the assignor for collection. In making the collection he acts in a fiduciary capacity, and the money, when collected, becomes the specific property of the assignee or pledgee. Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. 360, 368, 22 L. Ed. 568.

In Methven v. Staten Island, 66 Fed. 113, 13 C. C. A. 362, this court had before it the question whether an assignee who first gives notice to the debtor has the prior right though the assignment to him is later in date than that to the other assignee. The court held that as between two assignees the one who first gives notice has the better right. In so deciding this court declared that the question is one of general jurisprudence and that the decisions of the highest court of the state are not controlling. We adhere to that ruling in this case. The clause found in the agreement between Coleman & Co. and the bankrupt, that "this agreement shall be construed according to the law of the state of New York," if binding as between assignor and assignee, is not binding as against a subsequent assignee, who was not a party to it. It is not decisive in this court of the question now presented that the courts of the state of New York have laid down the rule that, as between different assignees of a chose in action by express assignment from the same person, the one prior in point of time will be protected, although he has given no notice of such assignment to either the subsequent assignee or the debtor. Fortunato v. Patten, 147 N. Y. 277, 283, 41 N. E. 572. In this respect the rule in New York differs from the rule in the federal courts, and from that which prevails in England and in the courts in many of the states.

The leading case on this subject is the well-known case of Dearle v. Hall, 3 Rus. 1, which held that a third assignee who had given notice was entitled to priority over a first and second assignee who did not give notice. That case and the cases which have followed it have gone upon the theory that personal property passes by delivery of possession, and that if one who acquires the right to take possession does not take it he is responsible for the consequence. A chose in action does not admit of tangible actual possession, but the assignee who gives notice to the legal holder of the fund does that which is tantamount to obtaining possession by placing the holder of the fund under an obligation to treat it as his property; and if he omits to give that notice he is guilty of the same neglect as he who leaves a personal chattel to which he has acquired a title in the actual possession and under the absolute control of another person. See Leading Cases in Equity, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1581, 1582.⁴⁸

"In our opinion the rule is sound, which gives priority in rank to equitable assignments in the order of their dates, without regard to notice to the debtor. Brander v. Young, 12 Tex. 335; Harris Co. v. Campbell, 68 Tex. 27, 3 S. W. 243, 2 Am. St. Rep. 467; Bank v. Convery, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 181, 27 S. W. 829; Harris Co. v. Donaldson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 9, 48 S. W. 791; Henke v. Keller, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 110 S. W. 784.

"The debtor is fully protected because he is not affected by the assignment until notified, and the subsequent assignee, in dealing with a chose in action, is chargeable with knowledge that he can get no better right than that of his assignor.

"It increases uncertainty in the law's administration to substitute the date of notice to the debtor as the test of priority for the date of assignment; and we can see how grave harm would follow for us to now depart from our thoroughly established simple test of priority in right from priority in time of the assignment." Greenwood, J., in Hess & Skinner Engineering Co. v. Turney, (Tex.) 216 S. W. 621, 623 (1919). See also Putnam v. Story, 132 Mass. 205 (1882).

Notice is a fact, the existence of which is to be established by evidence in the same manner as the existence of any other fact is established; and actual notice embraces all degrees and grades of evidence, from the most direct and positive proof to the slightest circumstances from which a jury would be warranted in inferring notice. Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 438, 12 Sup. Ct. 239, 35 L. Ed. 1063.

Notice being necessary that notice must be actual in the absence of a statute providing means for constructive notice. In Burek v. Taylor, 152 U. S. 634, 654, 14 Sup. Ct. 696, 703 (38 L. Ed. 578), the court, in referring to the necessity of notice, said:

"If notice was essential to charge them, actual notice should have been given, at least in the absence of a statute providing some means for constructive notice."

The notice must be actual. Must it also be personal? In Beakes v. Da Cunha, 126 N. Y. 293, 297, 27 N. E. 251, the action was upon a guaranty, and the contract made it necessary to give notice on the 20th day of each month, if payment for the previous month had not been made. The court in construing this agreement said:

"Where any statute or the terms of any contract require notice to be given, and there is nothing in the context of the statute or the contract, or in the circumstances of the case, to show that any other notice was Even in England, where the rule of Dearle v. Hall applies to assignments of equitable interests in personalty, if the holder of an equitable interest in personalty declares himself trustee of it for one person and then assigns the equitable interest to another who takes the assignment innocently and for value and notifies the original trustee before the cestui of the sub trust does, the assignee does not prevail. Hill v. Peters, [1918] 2 Ch. 273. In other words, so far as equitable interests in personalty are concerned—the rule of Dearle v. Hall does not apply to equitable interests in realty in England (Lee v. Howlett, 2 K. & J. 531 (1856); Taylor v. London, etc., Co., [1901] 2 Ch. 231—the rule of Dearle v. Hall applies only between assignees as such and not between cestuis and assignees.

The rule of Dearle v. Hall is now, perhaps, the majority rule in the United States. See Edward Q. Keasbey, Notice of Assignments in Equity, 19 Yale L. J. 258; 71 Am. St. Rep. 31, note; 66 L. R. A. 760, note; 17 Ann. Cas. 442, note. See also Ames' Cases on Trusts, 2 ed., 323-328; Scott's Cases on Trusts, 619-623; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 435.

Even in a state where the prior assignee will prevail over the second, though the latter gave notice first, the one prior in time may lose his priority by estoppel, and anyway if the one giving notice first paid value and collects first without notice of the prior assignment, the prior assignee cannot recover from him. Rabinowitz v. People's Nat. Bank (Mass.); 126 N. E. 289 (1920). And the same would be so, it seems, if he did not pay value and the first assignee also paid no value. So also if he effects a novation with the obligor or gets a judgment against the latter, etc. The problem is just suggested here, but is covered in detail in the course on Trusts.

For difficult problems as to the effect of notice to trustees who die or resign and are replaced by others who have no notice, see Maitland's Equity, pp. 145-146.

intended, a personal notice must always be given. But the context or the circumstances of the case may be such as to show that a personal notice was not intended, and in such a case a notice by mail, which is the ordinary mode of giving notices in business transactions, is authorized."

In Rogers v. Burr, 105 Ga. 432, 446, 31 S. E. 438, 70 Am. St. Rep. 50, which was an action on contract the court held, actual notice being required, that the requirement was not met by simply mailing the notice to the defendants, where the defendants denied that they received the notice; it not being shown that the written notice was in fact received. And in Huntley v. Whittier, 105 Mass. 391, 7 Am. Rep. 536, the court held that in the absence of a statute authorizing the service of a notice by mail, a notice so served is ineffective unless it is received. But the courts hold that, where the notice has been properly mailed, its receipt will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Bickerdike v. Allen, 157 Ill. 95, 41 N. E. 740, 29 L. R. A. 782; Casco National Bank v. Shaw, 79 Me. 376, 10 Atl. 67, 1 Am. St. Rep. 319; Huntley v. Whittier, supra.

In the instant case the evidence shows that notices were mailed both by the Coleman Company and by the Tawas Company. There is no evidence that the notices so mailed were not received. On the contrary, there is affirmative evidence that the notices mailed by the Coleman Company were received; and there is evidence that the notices mailed by the Tawas Company were not returned. So that the conclusion is that the two claimants each gave proper notice to the debtors of the assignment.

The court below stated that in his opinion the referee had committed error in that he had assumed that the priority of "giving notice" depended upon the order of time in which the notices of conflicting parties probably actually reached the person to be notified. The opinion of the court was that the party, whose duty it was to give the notices gave them, and completed them when it put the proper paper in the United States mail. We are unable to agree with that view of this case. The courts hold that, where acceptance by mail of an offer is expressly or impliedly authorized and the answer is duly posted, the acceptance is communicated, and the contract is completed from the moment the letter is mailed. Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 26 Sup. Ct. 688, 50 L. ed. 1057, 6 Ann. Cas. 392. But they also hold that a letter revoking an offer is not effective until it is actually communicated to the referee. It is operative from the time it is received, and not from the time it is put into the mail. Patrick v. Bowman, 149 U. S. 411, 13 Sup. Ct. 811, 866, 37 L. ed. 790. Whether a communication transmitted by mail is operative from the time it is mailed or from the time it is received clearly depends upon the nature of the transaction. And we think it plain that a notice of an assignment deposited in the mail by an assignee does not become effective as against the holder of the fund assigned or the debtor until it is actually communicated to him. If that were not so, and the debtor or the trustee paid the assignor between the time of the mailing of the notice and the time of its receipt, he would be bound to pay twice, which, of course, cannot be the law.

The question, then, is whether the notices Coleman & Co. sent, and which went forward as registered mail, reached the debtors before or after those sent by the Tawas Company, and which were deposited in the post office on the same day and were forwarded as unregistered mail. The evidence, if it is to be believed, shows that the Tawas Company deposited its notices at 6 p. m. All that appears as respects the hour of mailing of the notices of Coleman & Co., is that they must have been mailed some time prior to 8 p. m. The referee, who saw and heard the witness who testified that the notices sent by the Tawas Company were put into the post office at 6 p. m., believed him. The District Judge, who did not see or hear the witness, did not believe him, thinking him too exact and positive as to a matter which happened six months prior to the time of his giving the testimony. It is not incredible, as it seems to us, that the witness should have remembered the hour as well as the day on which he mailed notices of importance; and not having seen and heard the witness we are not disposed to accept his testimony as to the day and reject it as to the hour. The witness for Coleman & Co. remembered the day when he mailed the Coleman notices, but could not fix the hour. It is not, however, important to know the hour when the Coleman registered notices were mailed, for it definitely appears that all mail trains do not carry registered mail, and that there are more mail trains carrying mail not registered than there are trains carrying registered mail, and the authorities of the post office testified that the registered mail was not sent to the Pennsylvania Railroad Terminal to be sent forward by train until 1:10 a. m. of the next day. There was, therefore, not only a delay at the New York post office in dispatching the Coleman notices, but there was also delay at the offices to which the notices were sent, in the delivery of them to the parties for whom they were intended, after they reached their destination. In the ordinary course of business a registered letter is not delivered as promptly as an unregistered one. The inference is irresistible that the Tawas Company's notices received by the debtors before those sent by Coleman & Co.

The order of the District Court is reversed.

THOS. D. CAMPBELL & CO. v. HOLEHAN ET AL.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California, 1920. 192 Pac. 121.)

Action by Thos. D. Campbell & Co. against V. E. Holehan and the Charles A. Turner Company, which filed cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff and cross-complainant, and defendant Holehan appeals. Affirmed.

WASTE, P. J.⁴³ Plaintiff brought this action to recover $5,000, alleged to be due (less a small credit) as commissions, from defendant Holehan, to Charles A. Turner Company, respondent, a 5/12 interest in which had been assigned to the plaintiff. Because of the declination of Charles A. Turner Company to join as plaintiff, it was made a defendant. * * *

The final contention of appellant is that neither the complaint nor the cross-complaint contains a statement of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. His theory is that when the Turner Company assigned an undivided 5/12 interest in the contract to the Campbell Company, it split the demand, imposing an obligation upon appellant without his consent. While an assignment of part only of an entire demand is void, at law, unless done with the consent of the debtor, it is valid in equity. Under the practice at common law, a recovery upon such partial assignment could not be had without averring and proving that it was made with the consent of the defendant. Such an averment was immaterial in equity, and hence, under the Code of this state, the complaint is not demurrable for lack of facts, if it fails to contain such an allegation.

Neither the complaint nor the cross-complaint, in the instant case, was demurrable for want of parties, for the plaintiff made its assignor a party defendant. * * *

*The judgment is affirmed.

⁴³ Parts of the opinion are omitted.

⁴⁴ "While it is the general rule at law that a debtor will be protected against being harassed by a dividing up of the claim against him, this consideration has no application to equity, which can adjust the rights of all interested in a single suit; and it is the settled doctrine, not only of the federal courts but of the state courts generally, that such partial assignments are enforceable in equity, without regard to the question of acceptance by the debtor, and although made only by way of security. The sole control of the claim thus assigned, as affects its settlement, is not regarded as left with the debtor." Knappen, J., in Escanaba Traction Co. v. Burns, 257 Fed. 898, 904 (1919.)

Accordingly, in most jurisdictions the debtor after notice of a partial assignment cannot pay the assignor any of the assigned amount. But in a few jurisdictions he may do so and, if he does not pay, the assignor may sue him and get a judgment for the full amount. In Thiel v. John Week Lumber Co., 137 Wis. 272, 276 (1908), Winslow, C. J., said of partial assignments:

"The debt could not be split up by the creditor against the debtor's consent, even by formal assignments, because the debtor had the right to pay its debt in solido, and to refuse to be subjected to claims or suits by various claimants. In the present case the debtor did so refuse, and could at any time have discharged its debt to the plaintiff by paying him the whole sum due, without regard to the rejected orders or liability to their holders. Skobis v. Ferge, 102 Wis. 122-132, 78 N. W. 426. Hence it seems clear that, the defendant having refused to consent to partial assignments of the debt, the creditor could unquestionably maintain his action to recover the entire debt. Otherwise a situation would be presented where nobody could recover it."

Indeed, in Missouri it seems that the partial assignee has no standing in ELLEN G. COOK v. CHARLES M. LUM, ADMINISTRATOR.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1893. 55 N. J. L. 373, 26 Atl. 303.)

BEASLEY, C. J. This case stands before the court on a special verdict, and the problem to be solved involves the legal efficacy of a gift of money.

The circumstances were these: The deceased, Ellen G. Green, who is here represented by her administrator, who is the defendant on this record, deposited with one Kase the sum of $2,316, who thereupon gave to the said Ellen a paper containing in column eight several sums in figures, which were footed up and amounted to the sum just specified. The paper was dated "July 26th, 1890," and there was no other writing upon it.

After finding the foregoing facts, the special verdict proceeds as follows: "And the jurors aforesaid further say that except said paper, said John H. Kase never gave to said Ellen Green any evidence of indebtedness from himself to her for said deposit. * * * That said Ellen Green did actually deliver said paper into the hands of said Ellen G. Cook shortly before her, said Ellen Green's, death. That said Ellen Green delivered said paper into the hands of said Ellen G. Cook, with the intention of thereby giving to said Ellen G. Cook, for herself, the equity in the absence of consent of the debtor to the partial assignment. Burnett v. Crandall, 63 Mo. 410 (1876). The holding seemingly was dictated by the court's fear that it was the only way to prevent creditors from splitting debts up too much by partial assignments. See also Bosworth v. Jacksonville Nat. Bank, 64 Fed. 615 (1894). That cities in Pennsylvania need not recognize partial assignments, see Vetter v. Meadville, 236 Pa. 563 (1912).

In Missouri the partial assignee's only hope is to get the debtor to assent to the partial assignment and split the original debt into two or more debts. Taylor v. Dollins (Mo. App.), 222 S. W. 1040 (1920). See also Friedman v. Griffith (Mo. App.), 196 S. W. 75 (1917), where the debtor's failure to object on notice was given the same effect.

But the sounder doctrine is to protect the partial assignee in equity even against an unwilling debtor. In Todd v. Meding, 56 N. J. Eq. 83, 92 (1897), Pitney, V. C., said:

"It is too late to dispute the proposition that a part of a debt may be effectually assigned in equity. The qualifying rule that such an assignment cannot be enforced by action at law without the acceptance or assent of the debtor does not vary the result. The qualifying rule avails the debtor only to the extent that if he wishes to dispute the existence of the debt he is entitled to make his defense in a single suit, and cannot be subjected to several suits at law. But it does not justify him in ignoring the partial assignment, after he has notice of it, and in paying the whole sum to the original creditor. To so hold would be to nullify the doctrine which sanctions partial assignments. The rule is well settled that the payment of the whole debt to the original creditor, after notice of an assignment of part of it, will not avail the debtor when sued in equity by the assignee. If the debtor is in any doubt as to the right of the person claiming to be assignee, as against the assignor, he has an easy remedy. He can inquire of the original creditor and alleged assignor, and if he denies the assignment the debtor may file a bill of interpleader."

money in the hands of said John H. Kase." It was further found that Kase was not informed of the gift until several weeks after the death of the donor.

The general legal principle regulating the subject of gifts of choses in action has long been established. It is to the effect that with respect to things both tangible and intangible, mere words of donation will not suffice. With regard to the former class—that is, things corporeal—there must be, in addition to the expression of a donative purpose, an actual tradition of the corpus of the gift whenever, considering the nature of the property and the circumstances of the actors, such a formality is reasonably practicable. In some instances, when the situation is incompatible with the performance of such ceremony, resort may be had to what has been called a symbolical delivery of the subject.

Touching things in action, as there can be no actual delivery of them, the legal requirement is, that the donor's voucher of right or title must be surrendered to the donee. Such surrender is deemed equivalent to an actual handing over of things corporeal.

To this extent the law of the subject is neither doubtful nor obscure. The difficulty supervenes as soon as the attempt is made to apply these rules to the ever-variant conditions of the cases that are being presented for judicial examination. Even when the thing given has been a personal chattel, whether certain acts show a purpose to give consummated by a delivery of it, has often been, and doubtless will be, a vexed question. The uncertainty in construing the circumstances is even greater when we have rights of action to deal with. There are a multitude of decisions which demonstrate the embarrassment inherent in this class of cases; but as these decisions, while all acknowledging the rules just indicated, are in truth nothing more than interpretations, respectively, of the facts of the particular case, and as such facts are unlike the juncture now present, it would serve no useful purpose to review or cite them in detail. There is no observed precedent, so far as circumstances are concerned, for the matter now before us. Many of these decisions may be found in the Encyclopædia of English and American Law, tit. "Gifts," and any person who will examine this long train of cases will at once perceive that the principal difficulty has been to decide whether the evidence in hand in the given case showed a delivery of the subject of the gift in a legal point of view.

But this was a maze not without its clue, for the cardinal principle as to what constituted a delivery that would legalize a gift was on all sides admitted and was generally applied. The test was this, that the transfer was such that, in conjunction with the donative intention, it completely stripped the donor of his dominion of the thing given, whether that thing was a tangible chattel or a chose in action. The rule does not require that the title of the donee should be formally perfect, although in the earliest decisions this appears to have been indispensable, but now the law is otherwise settled. Thus, the delivery, with donative intention, of non-negotiable notes or bonds affords an apt illustration of the rule in both of its aspects. Such gifts are admittedly valid, although the title of the donee is not ceremoniously perfect, as it wants the finishing touch of a written assignment; but the transaction is validated on the ground that it is possessed of the all-important quality of depriving the donor of all control over the property. After the delivery of such bond or note, the donor can exercise not a single act of ownership with respect to it; he cannot sue upon it nor collect it, nor regain its possession. And it is this absolute abnegation of power that, in a legal point of view, makes the transaction enforceable.

This is the crucial test, and if it be applied to the case in hand this donation is not to be sustained. The reason is that the donor parted with nothing that was essential to his own dominion over the moneys in question. After she had transferred the slip of paper in question her dominion over her deposits remained plainly intact. The paper was in no sense a voucher of the receipt of the moneys; they could have been collected without its production; nor was it necessary to a suit for their recovery. It is impossible to believe that the parties intended this slip of paper, which contained nothing but a line of figures and an addition of them, as a testimonial showing the transaction to which it immediately appertained. It does not appear how the donor became possessed of this paper, but construed intrinsically it has the appearance of having been used for the temporary purpose of showing the aggregate of the several sums on deposit, and it carries on its face no indication whatever that it was drawn or given as a voucher of the indebtedness of the person making it. The delivery of so insignificant a paper as this cannot, in our opinion, operate to legalize the transaction in question.

⁴⁵ But see Claytor v. Pierson, 55 W. Va. 167 (1904), where a good gift causa mortis was held to exist where the paper handed over read "Sewell, W. Va., August 26th, 1899. $1100. Eleven hundred dollars. Received of William Claytor for safe keeping. L. C. Claytor."

In the principal case of Cook v. Lum the requirement as to gifts that there must be delivery was not met by handing over anything which the court thought sufficiently representative of the chose to serve as a symbol of it for delivery purposes. Where the chose has written embodiment, the great weight of authority upholds a gift by delivery of the writing.

In Commonwealth v. Crompton, 137 Pa. St. 138, 147-148 (1890) where the question was as to the validity of an attempted gift of a bond and various railroad stocks through the delivery of a box containing the bond and certificates, McCollum, J., said:

"It is now settled that a valid gift of non-negotiable securities may be made by delivery of them to the donee without assignment or indorsement in writing. This principle has been applied to notes, bonds, stock and deposit certificates, and life insurance policies. * * * In Walsh's App., 122 Pa. 177, we refused to extend it to a depositor's bank-book, but acknowledged 'that, in the case of notes and other instruments payable to order, a delivery accompanied by words importing a present absolute gift would invest the donee with the ownership of the fund.' The bankbook was regarded as on the same footing as a book of original entries, and the mere delivery of it to the donee as insufficient to pass any title to the accounts appearing upon it. But 'a certificate of deposit is a subsisting chose in action, and represents the fund it describes, as in case of notes, bonds, and other securities, so that delivery of it as a gift constitutes an equitable assignment of the money for which it calls.' Baskett v. Hassel, 107 U. S. 602. * * *

LEE v. MAGRATH.

"The shares of stock are choses in action, and the certificates evidence of the title to them. Slaymaker v. Bank, 10 Pa. 373. Why may not a delivery of the certificates, coupled with words of absolute and present gift, invest the donee with an equitable title to the stock, which the donor or a volunteer cannot successfully assail? A stockholder may clothe another with the complete equitable title to his stock without compliance with the forms printed by the corporation: United States v. Vaughan, 3 Binn. 394; Commonwealth v. Watmough, 6 Wh. 117; Building Assn. v. Sendmeyer, 50 Pa. 67; Finney's App., 59 Pa. 398; Water-Pipe Co. v. Kitchenman, 108 Pa. 630."

See also Herbert v. Simson, 220 Mass. 480 (1915) holding that there was a good gift of shares of stock by delivery of the unindorsed certificate of stock to the donee, although there was printed on the certificate the statement that the shares were "transferable only on the books of the company." The court, by De Courcy, J., said that the donee did not, of course, acquire "the legal title to the shares—the ownership in the sense that no further act was required to perfect her right," but that she did acquire, "as between herself and the donor the equitable title to the shares, and some legal as well as equitable rights. The gift was complete and not inchoate; and a court of equity has jurisdiction to compel a formal assignment by the executor of the donor and a transfer on the books of the corporation." With reference to the provision printed on the certificate that the shares were "transferable only on the books of the company" it was said that it "affects the shareholder's relation to the corporation only, and not her relation to a third party who has become equitably possessed of the stock. See cases cited in Talbot v. Talbot [32 R. I. 72], Ann. Cas. 1912 C, 1235, note."

An occasional dissent is found. For instance, New Jersey's attitude toward gifts of certificates of stock is that:

"A delivery of a certificate of stock without actual transfer or a written assignment or power to transfer, although accompanied with words of gift, does not constitute a valid gift inter vivos. Matthews v. Hoagland, 48 N. J. Eq. 455." Backes, V. C., in Heyes v. Sullivan, 88 N. J. Eq. 165, 167 (1917).

And in England as to assignments not operating under section 25 of the Judicature Act there is a question. See George P. Costigan, Jr., Gifts Inter Vivos of Choses in Action, 27 Law Quar. Rev. 336.

With reference to intangible choses not evidenced in writing, as in the case of a chose like that in the principal case of Cook v. Lum, it has been suggested that only delivery of a deed of gift could serve to effectuate an irrevocable gift of the chose. 1 Williston on Contracts, § 440. But there would seem to be no reason today for regarding a sealed assignment as any more representative of the chose for delivery purposes than is an unsealed assignment, and if the delivery requirement is met and the donative intent is operative, there is no need to have consideration, since gifts require none, and no need to have that which makes consideration in bargains unnecessary, namely, a seal.

The general American view is that "a good and effectual equitable assignment of a chose in action may be made by parol" and that "courts of law take notice of and give effect to such assignments." Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick (Mass.) 261 (1827), where a negotiable promissory note was delivered by way of gift without endorsement and the gift upheld. The only questions in the American cases, outside of the few jurisdictions which follow England, is what must be delivered to evidence the gift and whether a gift of a parol chose in action is necessarily revocable at the option of the donor prior to collection by the assignee, novation entered into by him with the debtor, etc. See Oliver S. Rundell, Gifts of Choses in Action, 27 Yale L. J. 643. Despite the assertion that an assignment "sounds in contract and requires for its validity the same requisites as any contract" (1 Williston on Contracts § 440, p. 841), it would seem at this stage of legal history fairer to treat an assignment as a grant of an equitable interest in the chose with a legal power of attorney and as sounding in conveyance therefore, rather than in contract. Consideration is immaterial if something sufficiently representative of the intangible chose is delivered, and an unsealed written assignment is sufficiently representative or symbolic to answer that purpose. That apparently was Kent's opinion. See 3 Kent Com.* 439, where it is stated that, "If the thing given be a chose in action, the law requires an assignment, or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be actually executed." An unsealed assignment, aided by the statutes which dispense with the necessity of a seal for a deed, seems to be growing in favor as a means of effectuating an irrevocable gift of a chose in action. See Burkett v. Doty, 176 Cal. 89 (1917); Lipson v. Evans, 133 Md. 370 (1918); McGaric v. Cossum, 76 N. Y. Supp. 305 (1902). Compare In re Cohn, 176 N. Y. Supp. 225 (1919). Cases like Cook v. Lum, the principal case, are not necessarily contra, because it seems fair to say that in them nothing that is really representative of the chose is delivered. It should be added that even if an unsealed assignment will represent the chose for gift delivery purposes in general, some courts will still require a better method of transfer to be resorted to if it is possible to have one. See Allen-West Com. Co. v. Grumble, 129 Fed. 287 (1904). But most courts will doubtless come to agree with Shaw, J., in Adams v. Merced Stone Co., 176 Cal. 415, 418 (1917) that "In the case of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument, the only means of obtaining control that is recognized by the authorities is an assignment in writing [whether sealed or unsealed], or some equivalent thereof."

grath, for 100*l.*, payable in two years; it did not contain the words or order, and was therefore not a negotiable instrument so as to entitle the indorsee to sue at law. The payee indorsed it thus: "I indorse the within promissory note for £100 to my sister Margaret Lee." She handed over to her the note at the same time, and the case states that the indorsement was made in consideration of natural love and affection, and was made with the intention of vesting in Mrs. Lee the beneficial ownership of the money represented by the said note.

Mary Anne Magrath, the payee, died, and by her will bequeathed all the moneys she was entitled to to the defendants, who obtained probate of her will; they are sued as makers of the note; and the case states that after the death of Mary Anne Magrath, and before action brought, the defendants had express notice in writing of the assignment: and the question for the court is, Whether the indorsement and delivery, under the circumstances above said, after express notice in writing, vested in the plaintiff the right to maintain this action?

The case turns upon the 28th section of the Judicature Act, Sub-section 6, which is in these terms:—"Any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor of any debt or other legal chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, shall be and be deemed to have been effectual to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice." 47

Prima facie, therefore, this case would seem to fall within the words of this section. There has been an absolute assignment of the debt, and notice has been given to the debtor, and no question arises from any other notice having been given; but it has been very strongly argued for 47 § 28, sub-sec. 6 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1877 for Ireland (40 and 41 Vict. C. 57) is word for word the same as § 25, sub-sec. 6 of the English Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. C. 66), namely:

"Any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of any debt, or other legal chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, trustee, or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to receive or claim such debt or chose in action, shall be and be deemed to have been effectual in law (subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this act had not passed) to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal and other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same without the concurrence of the assignor: Provided always, that if the debtor, trustee, or other person liable in respect of such debt or chose in action shall have had notice that such assignment is disputed by the assignor or any one claiming under him, or of any other opposing or conflicting claims to such debt or chose in action, he shall be entitled, if he think fit, to call upon the several persons making claim thereto to interplead concerning the same, or he may, if he think fit, pay the same into the High Court of Justice, under and in conformity with the provisions of the acts for the relief of trustees."

the defendant that this is a voluntary and incomplete gift, and such as before this Act a Court of Equity would not give any assistance to make effectual; and we have been referred to all the authorities in support of that view, with which we are familiar.

These authorities deal with two classes of cases, which, to avoid confusion, must be kept distinct: First, those where the subject matter is capable of being legally transferred or assigned; and secondly, those in which the subject matter cannot be made the subject of legal transfer, but can only be assigned in equity, the legal interest remaining in the assignor. The rule to be drawn from all the authorities is, that in the first class, if the transfer is imperfect and incomplete, and if the assignor has not transferred the legal interest, a Court of Equity will not interfere to aid that imperfect transaction, and, at the instance of a volunteer, compel its completion, unless the assignor has constituted himself a trustee of the legal interest for the donee; and the cases further go on to say that if the gift was intended to be effectuated by a legal transfer which is imperfect and defective the court will not from that circumstance alone hold the intended transfer to amount to a declaration of trust, unless there be something more to indicate that intention on the part of the assignor.

In the second class of cases, those in which the subject matter is incapable of legal transfer, it is not the law that the want of a legal transfer invalidates the transaction, for that would be to lay down that no chose in action could be made the subject of a voluntary gift, but that the assignor must have done everything in his power to complete the transfer, and left nothing material undone. This case falls within the second class, and I therefore asked the counsel who argued very ably for the defendants, what more could Mary Anne Magrath have done in this case, or what remained undone? The instrument was incapable of legal transfer, not being a negotiable instrument. She signs a writing expressing her intention to give it to the plaintiff, and the learned judge states such was her intention, and she delivered over the security. In answer to my question it was said that she might have executed a deed containing a power of attorney; but the cases show that any instrument in writing will pass a chose in action as effectually as an instrument under seal; indeed it might pass by words if the evidence was clear; but this Act very wisely requires the assignment to be in writing. I am unable to see the virtue or necessity of a power of attorney, since, as the case states she intended to give all the beneficial interest in the money to the assignee, she would have been entitled to use her name in suing for it, upon giving an indemnity; and it would be indeed strange to hold that a chose in action could not be assigned voluntarily, save by deed containing a power of attorney.

* * * In the words of Lord Justice Turner [in Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J. 264] the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property. If this note were negotiable, a mere letter giving it over, unaccompanied by indorsement and delivery, would not be sufficient; but this note was only capable of being equitably assigned; that has been done in writing, and the instrument delivered over to the donee. * * * 48

48 The Court of Appeal in Ireland reversed the judgment (Lee v. Magrath, L. R. 10 (Ireland) 313 (1882)), but on the ground that the appointment of one of the makers of the note as executor of the payee extinguished the debt prior to the service of notice of assignment and prevented a legal assignment under the Judicature Act and that plaintiffs, debarred from suing as assignees, did not prove a declaration of trust entitling them to sue as cestui que trust. This case furnishes another instance of the practical importance to the assignee of the giving of prompt notice of an assignment.

Harding v. Harding, 17 Q. B. D. 442 (1886), is a holding that a voluntary assignment by way of gift is within sec. 25 (6) of the Judicature Act. There the assignment was written at the foot of an account sent by executors to the donor as residuary legatees, and, the account with the written assignment being sent to the donee, the gift of the balance of money shown due by the account was held complete.

In In re Westerton, [1919] 2 Ch. 104, in upholding the testator's assignment by way of gift to Mrs. Gray of a bank deposit receipt for £500 marked "not transferable" as an absolute assignment under section 25 of the Judicature Act, despite the fact that notice of the assignment was not given to the bank until after the assignor's death, Sargent, J. said:

"Another point which I ought to mention is that no notice of the assignment was given to the bank at the time; but it was not disputed by Mr. Paterson [of counsel for the residuary legatees] that the mere omission to give notice was of no consequence so long as notice was given before action brought. That omission in no way affected the efficacy of the assignment as between the donor and the donee, though, if the bank, having had no notice of the assignment, had paid the money to the testator, that payment would have been a good payment as against the donee; and in fact the interest on the deposit note was from time to time, as I gather, credited to the credit of the testator's current account. That was a good credit as against Mrs. Gray, and Mr. Gover [of counsel for Mrs. Gray] does not claim any interest that was so credited." * * *

"Then it was urged by Mr. Paterson that the object of s. 25 sub-s. 6, was only to alter procedure and not to make any difference in the extent or nature of those things that were liable to be equitably assigned. I agree with that argument, though not with the conclusion which he based on it. It does seem to me that the aim of the sub-section was to reform procedure and to make it unnecessary for an assignee who had an out and out assignment to go through the double process that was formerly necessary in the case of an unwilling assignor—that is to say, an assignor who was afterwards unwilling to lend his name—of first proceeding in equity to compel the use of the name of the assignor and then proceeding to sue at law in the name of the assignor. To that extent, as I have said, the position of the assignee as a question of procedure was improved; he could come at once at law, and come not in the name of the assignor but in his own name as assignee. But if that is so and by means of that simplification of procedure the assignee has been relieved from taking preliminary proceedings in equity, there seems to me to be nothing very startling in the further conclusion, that the assignee has also been relieved from the terms which equity imposed as a condition of assisting him in obtaining the legal right, if at law the question of consideration was regarded

EBEL v. PIEHL.

CARPENTER, J.⁴⁰ Defendant is plaintiff's brother. In 1895 their father, who lived in Hanover, Canada, transferred the defendant property consisting of a house, two lots, notes, and cash, of the aggregate value of $1,500. According to plaintiff's testimony, defendant, on his return, said he would pay her $400 at their father's death. Subsequently the three—the father, the plaintiff, and defendant—had a conversation about the matter at plaintiff's residence. At this time defendant asked his father: "What do you want me to give Kate [the plaintiff] when you are dead?" The father replied: "I told you you were to give her $400 at my death. That was understood. * * * I want you to give her writings." The defendant thereupon said: "I didn't think you told me, but I should have done it anyway. * * * That will be all right, father. I will see to that"—and, turning to plaintiff, said in English (the former conversation having been in German): "I don't see what you want to bother father about that money for. I am good for it; I am worth the money; and I told you I would pay it." After the father's death, defendant discharged a mortgage of $196 which he held against plaintiff's property, and refused to pay the balance. Plaintiff brought this suit, on the common counts in assumpsit, to recover the balance claimed to be her due. Defendant testified that neither he nor his father ever agreed that plaintiff should be paid as she claims. The case was submitted to the jury, who found for the plaintiff. Defendant contends as wholly immaterial; and I think that it must have been so regarded for this reason, that at law the action was brought in the name of the assignor, so that there was no question at all of any transaction between the assignor and the assignee under which the question of consideration could arise. If that be so and if since the Judicature Act 1873, the assignee can come directly in his own name and sue as effectually as he could have done in the name of the assignor, it appears to me that there is no reason for continuing against the assignee those terms which were imposed by equity as a condition of granting relief. The position of the assignee has in that respect been improved once and for all by the sub-section of the Judicature Act in question, which has conferred on him a legal right to sue, and in my judgment I ought not to consider that legal right as being in any way dependent upon the question whether the assignment was made for valuable consideration or not, provided it complied with the express conditions of that sub-section. In my judgment, therefore, Mrs. Gray is entitled to the sum of £500 in question with interest from the date of the death of the testator."

What is ruled in In re Westerton, supra, as to assignments under the Judicature Act seemingly may possibly be adopted as the law as to assignments which do not come under the Act, in tacit disregard of the decisions of Edwards v. Jones, 1 My. & Cr. 226 (1836) and Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. & J. 264 (1862) and in the reaffirmation and extension of Fortescue v. Barnett, 3 My. & K. 36 (1834). See *George P. that, on the case made by the plaintiff, a verdict should have been directed in his favor, and that the court erred in charging the jury as hereinafter stated.

We think plaintiff made a case for the consideration of the jury. If it is true that, when the defendant made the promise testified to by plaintiff, he had already received the property under an agreement which imposed no other obligation upon him than to "furnish his father with money for his own personal use as long as he lived," there was no consideration for defendant's promise, and it could not, for that reason, be enforced. But if the testimony of plaintiff is credited, defendant received the property upon a promise that on his father's death $400 should be paid to plaintiff. This created a chose in action—a chose in action which, it is true, belonged to the father. Though intended for plaintiff's benefit, it could not be enforced by her. Pipp v. Reynolds, 20 Mich. 88. The father might, however, transfer it to her; and, if so transferred, she could, as his assignee, enforce it. In our judgment, a fair construction of the conversation which occurred between the parties to this suit and the father after the property was received by defendant warrants, if it does not compel, the conclusion that the father did transfer to plaintiff this cause of action. This is not the case of a gift in futuro, and therefore is not subject to the law governing such gifts. Between the defendant and his father, it was an existing cause of action. Between the father and the plaintiff it was a gift—a gift of a promise to pay money in the future—of an existing cause of action; but the gift itself was a gift in presenti. When the defendant, who had promised to pay the money (a promise evidenced by no writing), at the request of the father, to whom the promise was made, agreed with the sister, for whose benefit the money was to be paid, that it should be paid to her, there was all the delivery possible under the circumstances, and a delivery sufficient to answer the requirements of law. See article on "Novation," by Prof. J. B. Ames, 6 Harv. Law Rev., at page 189; McFadden v. Jenkyns, 1 Phillips, 153; Meert v. Moessard, 1 Moore & Payne, 8. It is true that the learned circuit judge, in charging the jury, treated the gift as a gift in futuro, and said that it was revocable by the father. This, we think, was error; but it was prejudicial to the plaintiff, and not to the defendant.

We think, however, the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "Was the property turned over to Dan with the express understanding between Dan and his father that at the old man's death Dan should pay the plaintiff $400? * * * If you find that there was such an understanding as is claimed by the plaintiff, and old Mr. Piehl, until his death, continued of that mind—that is, the desire to provide and give $400 to Catherine at his death—your verdict will be for $204 * * * and interest." According to this charge, plaintiff is entitled to a verdict even if her father did not assign to her the cause of action against defendant. This, as we have already shown, was error. The error in this part of the charge is not corrected elsewhere. We cannot assume that this error was not prejudicial, for, if defendant's testimony was believed, the assignment did not take place as plaintiff claimed. * * *

For the error pointed out, the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and a new trial granted.⁵⁰

BRICE v. BANNISTER.

Action on an order for £100 given plaintiff by one Gough and drawn on defendant.

The plaintiff is a solicitor at Bridgwater, and the defendant is a shipowner residing at Barrow-in-Furness. The defendant had entered into a contract with John Gough, dated May 17th, 1876, by which Gough agreed to build for the defendant a vessel on certain terms. The material part of the contract is as follows: "The vessel to be completed by December 30th, 1876, for the sum of £1375. Payments to be made as follows:

When keel and stern post up and floors across	£250
When in frame	250
When planked	400

and the remainder when completed and handed over with Lloyd's. Board of Trade, and builder's certificates."

The contract was in the course of being performed by John Gough between the date of the contract, May 17th, 1876, and the completion of the vessel, February 11th, 1877. The first instalment under the contract became due on June 22d, 1876, the second instalment became due on October 11th, 1876, and the third instalment became due on November 23d, 1876, and the remainder was due on the completion of the vessel, February 11th, 1877.

⁵⁰ To the same effect, see Dinslage v. Stratman (Neb.), 180 N. W. 81 (1920). With these cases should be considered those where the destruction of a note with intent to discharge the maker does discharge him. See, for instance, Darland v. Taylor, 52 Ia. 503 (1876), where the court treated the destruction as a gift of the chose with symbolical delivery. In other words, the court treated the happening as an assignment by way of gift with constructive delivery, though the court spoke of gifts and not of assignments. Day, J., said: "The authorities hold that the delivery [to establish a gift] may be actual or symbolical. * * * The destruction of the notes, together with the repeated declarations of the deceased that she did not intend the defendant to pay the debt constitute a sufficient delivery under the authorities cited." The reasoning is, of course, artificial. The doctrine probably came over from sealed obligations, which being obligations in themselves were ended by intentional destruction, as originally they were by unintentional, and can be defended only as a desirable departure from principle. See also Denunzio's Receiver v. Scholtz, 117 Ky. 182 (1903).

Gough was unable to finish the vessel without assistance from the defendant, and therefore during the progress of the building the latter advanced to him sums of money, which were necessary to enable him to pay the wages of his workmen employed in building the vessel and to pay for the materials used in constructing her. The total amount of these advances upon October 27th, 1876, was £1015. That sum was in excess of the amount then due pursuant to the contract.

On the 27th of October, 1876, Gough, being indebted to the plaintiff to an amount exceeding £2000, gave the plaintiff an order addressed to the defendant in the following terms:

"I do hereby order, authorize, and request you to pay to Mr. William Brice, Solicitor, Bridgwater, the sum of 100*l.* out of moneys due or to become due from you to me, and his receipt for same shall be a good discharge.

On the same day, the 27th of October, 1876, the plaintiff gave the defendant written notice of the order in the following terms:

"I hereby give you notice that by a memorandum in writing dated October 27th, 1876, John Gough, of this place, authorized and requested you to pay me the sum of £100 out of money due or to become due from you to him, and my receipt for the same shall be a good discharge."

The defendant acknowledged the receipt of the notice, but declined to be bound by it as an authority to pay £100 to the plaintiff.

Subsequently to the receipt of the notice, the defendant paid to Gough on account of the building of the vessel, pursuant to the contract, sums far exceeding £100; and unless the defendant had made such payments to Gough, he would not have been able to complete the vessel.

On these facts it was contended by the defendant's counsel that the judgment ought to be entered for the defendant, on the following grounds:

1. That at the time of giving the order there was nothing due to Gough, and therefore there was nothing which could be assigned by him to the plaintiff by virtue of the Judicature Act, 1873, § 25, sub-sec. 6.⁵¹
2. That there was no binding acceptance of the order by the defendant.
3. That had not the defendant made advances to Gough or to his creditors, other than the plaintiff, Gough would never have been in a position to become a creditor of the defendant. Lord Coleridge, C. J., directed that judgment be entered.

COTTON, L. J.⁵² The letter of October 27th is a good equitable assignment by Gough to the plaintiff of money to the extent of £100, which ⁵¹ For that provision, see note 47, ante, this chapter.

⁵² The statement of facts is slightly abbreviated and the opinion of Lord Coleridge, C. J., in the court below is omitted. Lord Coleridge decided that § 25 of the Judicature Act applied.

"The decision of Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Brice v. Bannister, 3 Q. B. D. 569, might become due under his contract with the defendant. To this extent he thereby anticipated the moneys payable from the defendant to him, and Gough became incompetent to deal with these moneys to plaintiff Brice's prejudice, and the defendant, after notice of the letter, could not come to any agreement with Gough dealing with or anticipating these moneys to the prejudice of the plaintiff. At the time when notice of the letter of October 27th was given to the defendant, the balance of the contract price which remained unpaid exceeded £100, and the ship has been completed under the contract. The question is whether in substance what has been done by Bannister and Gough was not a dealing with the moneys payable under the contract; I think it was. The contention of the defendant was that though, after notice of the assignment to the plaintiff he had paid moneys exceeding £100 to Gough, he did so not in payment of the price or under the contract, but that the advances were necessary in order to secure the completion of the ship. But this is not a case where the builder having failed in his contract the person for whom he was building put an end to the contract and completed the work. In such a case, the builder, if he in fact completed the work, would be employed as agent or servant doing the work for the owner of the vessel. Here the builder completed the work as contractor building under a contract with the defendant, and this is the distinction between this case and Tooth v. Hallett, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 242, where the work was completed after the bankruptcy of the builder by his trustee out of his own moneys, and the person for whom the work was done had power to take possession and employ any one to complete the building, and in effect he did so, and the court allowed the expenditure against the equitable assignee. It is probable that Gough would not, unless he had obtained the advances made by the defendant either from him or from some other person, have been able to complete the vessel; but a charge for the money lent after October 27th, by any other person for the purpose of paying wages or buying material necessary for the completion of the ship, and in that sense necessary to enable the money to become due to Gough, could not be preferred to the plaintiff's claim. Moneys paid for the same purpose to Gough by the

that the case fell within the 25th section, appears to me to be open to question. The assignment purported to be by way of charge only. It was a direction to pay the 100 l. out of money due or to become due. No doubt, it purported to be a charge of an unredeemable sum of 100 l.; but still it was a charge. The section speaks of an absolute assignment of any debt or other chose in action. It does not say, 'or any part of a debt or chose in action.' It appears to me as at present advised to be questionable whether an assignment of part of an entire debt is within the enactment. If it be, it would seem to leave it in the power of the original creditor to split up the single legal cause of action for the debt into as many separate legal causes of action as he might think fit. However, it is not necessary to decide the point in the present case, and I leave it open for future consideration." Chitty, L. J., in Durham Bros. v. Robertson, [1898] 1 Q. B. 765, 774.

defendant cannot, in my opinion, stand in a better position. It was urged that the assignee of a chose in action takes subject to all equities. But these must be equities existing or arising out of circumstances existing before notice is given of the assignment; the advances made by the defendant were in no way sanctioned by the contract, and in no sense an equity between Gough and the defendant existing or arising from circumstances existing at the date of the notice to the defendant of the assignment to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was assignee for value of the moneys payable under the contract, without any deduction for cost of materials or other costs of construction. The defendant, for his own purposes, determined not to complete the ship himself, but to let Gough do so under the contract. To enable him to do so he, after notice of the assignment to the plaintiff, paid money to Gough so as to exhaust the contract price. By so doing, he could not, in my opinion, defeat or prejudice the plaintiff's right, and the judgment appealed from must in my opinion be affirmed.

BRETT, L. J. I am sorry to say that, with great hesitation, I differ from the judgment which has been read. I consider the principle involved in this case to be of the highest importance. The defendant and Gough were parties to a contract for building a ship, the price of which was to be paid by installments at different stages of the building, and the ship was to become the property of the purchaser according to the different times of the payments. Before the ship was finished the builder, through want of funds, became unable to proceed with the work. I do not mean to say that there is any finding that the defendant as purchaser was compelled to take possession of the ship if he did not advance money; but practically if he did not advance money the ship must have been thrown upon his hands, and he must have completed the building of the ship, a most onerous charge upon him. It is an ordinary mode of meeting a difficulty of this kind, an ordinary mode of transacting business, either that the purchaser shall take the ship into his own hands, or that he and the builder shall agree to modify the contract, so that he, instead of paying the purchase-money after a stage of work is completed, should advance the money beforehand; or, as it may be put in another way, the purchaser, when the builder is in difficulties, before the time of payment fixed by the contract has arrived, advances money upon the terms that he is to repay himself out of the money which he would have to pay when a particular stage is completed. It is true that the builder, in consideration of money previously advanced by the plaintiff, made an equitable assignment to him of the money which would become due to him at a following stage, and he afterward did procure an advance before the appointed time from the defendant, in order to enable him to complete the ship. It is true that the defendant had notice of this so-called equitable assignment; but it was a matter between the builder of the ship and a third person, over which the defendant, the purchaser of the ship, had no control; and the question is whether we are to allow an equitable doctrine to hamper and impede an ordinary business transaction. I cannot bring myself to agree that, either by virtue of the Judicature Act or otherwise, business transactions are to be hampered by any doctrine which will prevent a man from doing what he otherwise might do, merely because something has happened between other parties. I would therefore confine this remedy to a case where a debt has actually accrued due from one person to another, or at least I certainly would confine it simply to the case where nothing remains to be done by the person who is the assignor. In that case nothing remains to be done by him but to receive money from the person who is to pay him, and that money he makes over to the equitable assignee. But I cannot bring my mind to think that this doctrine should be extended, so as to prevent the parties to an unfulfilled contract from either cancelling or modifying, or dealing with regard to it in the ordinary course of business. I quite agree that they ought not to be allowed to act malâ fide for the purpose of defeating an equitable assignee; but if what they do is done bona fide and in the ordinary course of business, I cannot think their dealings ought to be impeded or imperilled by this doctrine, and it seems to me the purchaser of a ship and the builder might have cancelled the contract even after this assignment. Why may they not modify it? If they cannot modify it, it seems to me to denote a state of slavery in business that ought not to be suffered; but I apprehend the parties to the contract can modify it. If they can modify it, why may they not act so that no money shall be due from the defendant in this case to the plaintiff? It seems to me there never was any money due to the assignor of the plaintiff. Before that money became due, it was absorbed either by an advance made bona fide by the present defendant to the builder, or by a modification of the contract. The builder never could have sued this defendant for money due to him as for a debt; and therefore it seems to me no equitable assignment ought to be allowed to charge the defendant and make him practically pay twice over.

In what cases has this equitable doctrine been applied? Suppose a man writes upon paper, "I promise to pay A. B. the sum of £100 on demand:" the document, not being payable to bearer or to order, is not a promissory note, assignable or negotiable by statute or the law merchant. Has any Court of Equity ever held, that if a person received such a paper it could be sued upon after being handed over to a third person? But this equitable doctrine would make a promissory note not payable to bearer an order transferable to a third party, without any writing upon it, and I apprehend that is directly contrary to all practice, custom, and law, and shows that this doctrine is not to be allowed to control or hamper ordinary business transactions.

I am, therefore, of opinion in this case the doctrine ought not to be allowed to hamper and impede the ordinary transactions which occurred between the defendant and the builder. The defendant had a right, with the consent of the builder, to modify this contract, and he modified it so far and to such a degree that no money was ever due from the defendant to the builder, and therefore the equitable assignment by the builder to the plaintiff had no legal or binding effect whatever. Therefore I am of opinion that the defendant in this case is entitled to succeed.

BRAMWELL, L. J. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that this judgment should be affirmed. I say reluctantly, because I feel the great force of my brother Brett's observations; it does seem to me a strange thing and hard on a man, that he should enter into a contract with another and then find that because that other has entered into some contract with a third, he, the first man, is unable to do that which it is reasonable and just he should do for his own good. But the law seems to be so, and any one who enters into a contract with A. must do so with the understanding that B. may be the person with whom he will have to reckon. Whether this can be avoided, I know not; maybe, if in the contract with A. it was expressly stipulated that an assignment to B. should give no rights to him, such a stipulation would be binding. I hope it would be. But as there is no such clause in the contract here, the plaintiff has undoubtedly certain rights—to what? If it were only to money payable according to the terms of the contract, the plaintiff would fail, for no money ever became due according to the terms of the contract. It was paid in advance before the work was finished; so that an amendment of the statement of claim is necessary; and in strictness the plaintiff's case is this: "You, the defendant, had no right to pay in advance; you were bound to wait till the work was finished; you would then owe Gough money, and would then be bound to pay me." This seems to be the law, and certainly if Gough and the defendant had agreed to anticipate the time of payment to defeat the plaintiff, such a scheme ought not to succeed. On the other hand, if Gough had broken his engagement, or threatened to break his engagement to finish the vessel, or to finish it in a reasonable time, and the defendant to remedy and avert such breach, reasonably and bona fide, not to defeat the plaintiff but to protect himself, advanced money to Gough before it was due, so that it never became due according to the contract, I should have hesitated long before holding that the defendant was liable in this action. But in reading the correspondence I cannot see that this was the case. That the defendant acted bona fide I doubt not, but I think his advancing of the money as he did was quite voluntary and in no sense compulsory. I concur, therefore, in affirming the judgment.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁵³

⁵³In American Bridge Co. of New York et al. v. City of Boston, 202 Mass. 374 (1909), it was held that an assignee of architect's certificates for money due for work done by the assignor under building contracts with a city took them subject to the city's right to recoup for damages from a possible breach

THE BRITISH WAGGON CO. AND THE PARKGATE WAGGON
CO. v. LEA & CO.

(High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, 1880. 5 Q. B. D. 149.)

COCKBURN, C. J. This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover rent for the hire of certain railway waggons, alleged to be pay-by the assignor of his contracts, which right existed at the making of the contracts, and of which the assignee had notice, though no default of the assignor had occurred when notice of the assignment was given to the city. The default did occur through the abandonment of the contract by the assignor a few days after the assignment. Hammond, J., for the court, said:

"It is contended by the plaintiffs that these sums were due and payable at the time the defendant received notice thereof, that the plaintiffs' rights were fixed at the time of notice and could not be changed by the act of the assignor or of the defendant after notice, and consequently that the damages caused to the defendant by the default of the assignor in leaving his contract unperformed, although without any fault or collusion on the part of the defendant, cannot be recouped in this action. It is contended that the only remedy open to the defendant is by way of an action against the assignor.

"Even if it be conceded in favor of the plaintiffs that the sums were due and payable at the time of the notice, and that the rights of the plaintiffs were fixed at that time, still the conclusion which the plaintiffs seek to draw by no means necessarily follows.

"We are dealing, not with the right of set-off, but with that of recoupment—an entirely different right. The one is a creation of statute; the other exists at common law and not by statute. The one is applicable even where there are different contracts; the other arises only out of the same contract as that under which the claim of the plaintiffs arises. Confusion sometimes has been caused by a neglect to note the distinction between these two rights. The principles applicable to a case of set-off are in many respects different from those applicable to a case of recoupment, and some care is required not to be misled by apparent analogies.

"The assignment of a chose in action conveys, as between the assignor and assignee, merely the right which the assignor then possesses to that thing; but as between the assignee and the debtor it does not become operative until the time of notice to the latter, and does not change the rights of the debtor against the assignor as they exist at the time of the notice.

"It becomes necessary to consider the exact relation between the defendant and Coburn, the assignor, at the time of the notice. * * * At that time there does not seem to have been any default on the part of Coburn. At the time of the notice what were the rights between him and the defendant, so far as respects this contract? He was entitled to receive these sums, but he was also under an obligation to complete his contract. This right of the defendant to claim damages for the nonperformance of the contract existed at the making of the contract and at the time of assignment and of notice, and the assignees knew it, and they also knew that it would become available to the defendant the moment the assignor should commit a breach. Under these circumstances it must be held that the assignees took subject to that right. * * * The defendant is simply trying to enforce a right existing under the contract at the time of the notice, a right of which the assignees had knowledge, and since they have delayed suit for these sums, until after default, the defendant may recoup against them as it could have recouped against the assignor. It cannot without its own fault or consent be deprived of rights under the contract.

able by the defendants to the plaintiffs, or one of them, under the following circumstances:

By an agreement in writing of February 10th, 1874, the Parkgate Waggon Company let to the defendants, who are coal merchants, fifty railway waggons for a term of seven years, at a yearly rent of £600 a year, payable by equal quarterly payments. By a second agreement of June 13th, 1874, the company in like manner let to the defendants fifty other waggons, at a yearly rent of £625, payable quarterly like the former.

Each of these agreements contained the following clause: "The owners, their executors, or administrators, will at all times during the said term, except as herein provided, keep the said waggons in good and substantial repair and working order, and, on receiving notice from the tenant of any want of repairs, and the number or numbers of the waggons requiring to be repaired, and the place or places where it or they then is or are, will, with all reasonable despatch, cause the same to be repaired and put into good working order."

On October 24th, 1874, the Parkgate Company passed a resolution, under the 129th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for the voluntary winding up of the company. Liquidators were appointed, and by an order of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, it was ordered that the winding up of the company should be continued under the supervision of the Court.

By an indenture of April 1st, 1878, the Parkgate Company assigned and transferred, and the liquidators confirmed to the British Company and their assigns, among other things, all sums of money, whether payable by way of rent, hire, interest, penalty, or damage, then due, or thereafter to become due, to the Parkgate Company, by virtue of the two contracts, and all the interest of the Parkgate Company and the said liquidators therein; the British Company, on the other hand covenanting with the Parkgate Company "to observe and perform such of the stipulations, conditions, provisions, and agreements contained in the said contracts as, according to the terms thereof were stipulated to be observed and performed by the Parkgate Company." On the execution of this assignment the British Company took over from the Parkgate Company the repairing stations, which had previously been used by the Parkgate Company for the repair of the waggons let to the defendants, and also the staff of workmen employed by the latter company in executing such repairs. It was expressly found that the British Company have ever since been ready and willing to execute, and have, with all due diligence, executed all necessary repairs to the said waggons. This, however, they have done under a special agreement

Any other conclusion would make the contract different from that into which the defendant entered. The case is very similar to Rockwell v. Daniels, 4 Wis. 432, in the reasoning of which we fully concur."

come to between the parties since the present dispute has arisen, without prejudice to their respective rights.

In this state of things the defendants asserted their right to treat the contract as at an end, on the ground that the Parkgate Company had incapacitated themselves from performing the contract, first, by going into voluntary liquidation; secondly, by assigning the contracts, and giving up the repairing stations to the British Company, between whom and the defendants there was no privity of contract, and whose services, in substitution for those to be performed by the Parkgate Company under the contract, they the defendants were not bound to accept. The Parkgate Company not acquiescing in this view, it was agreed that the facts should be stated in a special case for the opinion of this court, the use of the waggons by the defendants being in the meanwhile continued at a rate agreed on between the parties, without prejudice to either, with reference to their respective rights.

The first ground taken by the defendants is in our opinion altogether untenable in the present state of things, whatever it may be when the affairs of the company shall have been wound up, and the company itself shall have been dissolved under the 111th section of the Act. Pending the winding-up, the company is by the effect of §§ 95 and 131 kept alive, the liquidator having power to carry on the business, "so far as may be necessary for the beneficial winding-up of the company," which the continued letting of these waggons, and the receipt of the rent payable in respect of them, would, we presume, be.

What would be the position of the parties on the dissolution of the company it is unnecessary for the present purpose to consider.

The main contention on the part of the defendants, however, was that, as the Parkgate Company had, by assigning the contracts, and by making over their repairing stations to the British Company, incapacitated themselves to fulfil their obligation to keep the waggons in repair, that company had no right, as between themselves and the defendants, to substitute a third party to do the work they had engaged to perform, nor were the defendants bound to accept the party so substituted as the one to whom they were to look for performance of the contract; the contract was therefore at an end.

The authority principally relied on in support of this contention was the case of Robson v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ad. 303, approved of by this court in Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310. In Robson v. Drummond a carriage having been hired by the defendant of one Sharp, a coachmaker, for five years, at a yearly rent, payable in advance each year, the carriage to be kept in repair and painted once a year by the maker—Robson being then a partner in the business, but unknown to the defendant—on Sharp retiring from the business after three years had expired, and making over all interest in the business and property in the goods to Robson, it was held, that the defendant could not be sued on the contract—by Lord Tenterden on the ground that "the defendant might have been induced to enter into the contract by reason of the personal confidence which he reposed in Sharp, and therefore have agreed to pay money in advance, for which reason the defendant had a right to object to its being performed by any other person;" and by Littledale and Parke, JJ., on the additional ground that the defendant had a right to the personal services of Sharp, and to the benefit of his judgment and taste, to the end of the contract.

In like manner, where goods are ordered of a particular manufacturer, another, who has succeeded to his business, cannot execute the order, so as to bind the customer, who has not been made aware of the transfer of the business, to accept the goods. The latter is entitled to refuse to deal with any other than the manufacturer whose goods he intended to buy. For this Boulton v. Jones, 2 H. & N. 564, is a sufficient authority. The case of Robson v. Drummond comes nearer to the present case, but is, we think, distinguishable from it. We entirely concur in the principle on which the decision in Robson v. Drummond rests, namely, that where a person contracts with another to do work or perform service, and it can be inferred that the person employed has been selected with reference to his individual skill, competency, or other personal qualification, the inability or unwillingness of the party so employed to execute the work or perform the service is a sufficient answer to any demand by a stranger to the original contract of the performance of it by the other party, and entitles the latter to treat the contract as at an end, notwithstanding that the person tendered to take the place of the contracting party may be equally well qualified to do the service. Personal performance is in such a case of the essence of the contract, which, consequently, cannot in its absence be enforced against an unwilling party. But this principle appears to us inapplicable in the present instance, inasmuch as we cannot suppose that in stipulating for the repair of these waggons by the company—a rough description of work which ordinary workmen conversant with the business would be perfectly able to execute—the defendants attached any importance to whether the repairs were done by the company, or by any one with whom the company might enter into a subsidiary contract to do the work. All that the hirers, the defendants, cared for in this stipulation was that the waggons should be kept in repair; it was indifferent to them by whom the repairs should be done. Thus if, without going into liquidation, or assigning these contracts, the company had entered into a contract with any competent party to do the repairs, and so had procured them to be done, we cannot think that this would have been a departure from the terms of the contract to keep the waggons in repair. While fully acquiescing in the general principle just referred to, we must take care not to push it beyond reasonable limits. And we cannot but think that, in applying the principle, the Court of Queen's Bench in Robson v. Drummond went to the utmost length to which it can be carried, as it is difficult to see how in repairing a carriage when necessary, or painting it once a year, preference would be given to one coachmaker over another. Much work is contracted for, which it is known can only be executed by means of sub-contracts; much is contracted for as to which it is indifferent to the party for whom it is to be done, whether it is done by the immediate party to the contract, or by some one on his behalf. In all these cases the maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se applies.

In the view we take of the case, therefore, the repair of the waggons, undertaken and done by the British Company under their contract with the Parkgate Company, is a sufficient performance by the latter of their engagement to repair under their contract with the defendants. Consequently, so long as the Parkgate Company continues to exist, and, through the British Company, continues to fulfil its obligation to keep the waggons in repair, the defendants cannot, in our opinion, be heard to say that the former company is not entitled to the performance of the contract by them, on the ground that the company have incapacitated themselves from performing their obligations under it, or that, by transferring the performance thereof to others, they have absolved the defendants from further performance on their part.⁵⁴

That a debt accruing due under a contract can, since the passing of the Judicature Acts, be assigned at law as well as equity, cannot since the decision in Brice v. Bannister, 3 Q. B. D. 569, be disputed.

We are therefore of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.⁵⁵

⁵⁴ In the trial court's opinion in Cole v. C. H. Handasyde & Co., [1910] S. C. 68, 70-71, note, Lord Ordinary Mackenzie referred to the case of British Waggon Co. v. Lea, L. R., 5 Q. B. D. 149, as one "in which the original contracting party was tendered to fulfil the contract" as distinguished from the case before him where the assignee was offering to perform.

In Kansas City Soap Co. v. Illinois Cudahy Packing Co., 265 Fed. 108 (1920), it was held that the plaintiff corporation, which after making a contract with the defendant for the purchase of merchandise on credit, pursuant to a plan of reorganization, conveyed all of its property to a new corporation, subject to all its debts, undertakings, liabilities, and obligations, which were assumed by the new company, was not deprived of the right to enforce performance of the contract or to recover damages for its breach, especially where it tendered to defendant the contract price.

In Asphaltic Limestone Concrete Co., Ltd. v. Glasgow, [1907] S. C. 463, 475, Lord McLaren said of the contention that the execution of a contract to pave certain streets and maintain the surface in good condition for a term of years could not be delegated by assignment, that he agreed with the Lord Ordinary "that there is no delectus personae in such a contract, the execution of which consists chiefly in manual labor."

⁵⁵ In the case of an assignment of rights under a contract with a delegation of duties, the assignor, if there is no novation, remains liable on the contract. Crane v. Kildorf, 91 Ill. 567 (1879); Pulaski Stave Co. v. Miller's Creek Lumber Co., 138 Ky. 372 (1910); Pioneer Loan & Land Co. v. Cowden, 128 Minn. 307 (1915). The assignee, if he has not expressly or impliedly assumed the contract obligation, is not liable to the other party to the contract. Gross v. Estate of

STEWART COLE (Knowles Spencer & Son's Assignee), PURSUER
(Reclaiming) v. C. H. HANDASYDE & COMPANY, DEFENDERS, (Respondents).

(Court of Session, First Division. [1910] S. C. 68.)

On 17th June 1907 Knowles Spencer & Son, oil and seed merchants and commission agents, London, entered into a contract with C. H. Handasyde & Company, Dean Oil Works, Dalkeith, to supply them with two hundred and fifty to three hundred (250/300) tons of black grease from cotton oil mucilage of usual good merchantable quality, at a price specified, etc. "The goods to be sampled by an independent sampler prior to shipment. Analysis to be made by Mr. Watson Gray of Liverpool, whose decision shall be final." In accepting the contract note Messrs. Handasyde wrote: "Please note, however, that all grease is to be soft and seedy as sample in our possession."

Mr. Knowles Spencer, the senior partner of Knowles Spencer & Son, had at one time been a manufacturer of black grease, and had an expert knowledge of the qualities of the article, but at the date when he first commenced to have dealings with Messrs. Handasyde, in 1905, he had ceased to be a manufacturer. Knowles Spencer & Son dealt only as merchants, purchasing from the makers the grease which they contracted to deliver. These facts were all known to Messrs. Handasyde.

On 25th January 1908 the partners of Knowles Spencer & Son granted a deed of assignment for behoof of creditors in favor of the pursuer, Stewart Cole, chartered accountant, London, who admittedly had no knowledge of the nature of black grease. The deed of assignment, as was ultimately conceded, conveyed to Cole, inter alia, the whole rights and liabilities under the contract in question, so far as the same were capable of being assigned.

On 18th February 1908 Cole wrote Messrs. Handasyde tendering delivery of 10 tons under the contract, but Messrs. Handasyde replied on the following day declining to take delivery and repudiating the contract. Subsequently Cole made a further tender of 25 tons, which was refused and he accordingly raised the present action, concluding, inter alia, for 2500*l.* as damages for breach of the contract in question, and averring that he had incurred serious liabilities to the manufacturers, and had been compelled to resell a considerable quantity of black grease at a heavy loss, besides incurring charges for storage and analysis.

Thornson, 286 Ill. 185 (1919); Beazley v. Embree, 29 Cal. App. 15, 183 Pac. 298 (1919). There is a growing feeling, however, that an implied assumption by the assignee of the duties of the contract which the other party as beneficiary may recover upon should normally be found. See A. M. K. [Professor A. M. Kidd] in 8 Calif. L. Rev. 119; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 412. See also, Grover C. Grismore, Is the Assignee of a Contract Liable for the Non-Performance of Delegated Duties? 18 Mich. L. Rev. 284.

On 20th July 1909, the Lord Ordinary [Lord Mackenzie] pronounced an interlocutor finding that the pursuer had no title to sue and dismissing the action so far as relating to the contract in question. The pursuer reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT [The Lord Dunedin].⁵⁶ The pursuer in this case is one Stewart Cole, who is the assignee in England of Knowles Spencer & Son. It does not matter for the moment whether he is assignee in bankruptcy or assignee under a voluntary assignment, because there is no question that he is suing here as the assignee of Knowles Spencer. He is suing upon a contract which he says was assigned to him, and the contract was entered into between Knowles Spencer and the defenders, Handasyde & Company, who are distillers of an article known as black grease. Knowles Spencer was a person who used to enter into contracts with Handasyde for the supply of the black grease. He was not a manufacturer of black grease and that was perfectly well known to Handasyde; he therefore was in one sense of the word a broker, although as a matter of fact the contracts entered into were not upon the face of them broking contracts—that is to say, they were contracts in which Knowles Spencer assumed the place of principal and became bound to deliver the goods which he therein contracted to deliver,—but nevertheless it was quite well known that the black grease was an article which Knowles Spencer would have to procure elsewhere. I will look at the contract in a moment; but the defence which is made to the action at the instance of Cole, who proposes to tender black grease and to get paid for it, is that Handasyde is no longer bound by contract because the contract itself is unassignable. The Lord Ordinary has held that it is unassignable and that is the only question brought up by the reclaiming note before your Lordships.

I have not been able to follow the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary, but for myself it seems to be a very clear case. Nobody doubts that the law as to whether a contract is assignable or not depends upon whether, as the expression goes, there is the element of delectus personae in it or not. Now, I think by way of illustration there are three stages to be taken. The highest and easiest example of a contract in which there is delectus personae is where the contract is one for a personal service of a peculiar nature. Nobody supposes that in a contract with A or B to paint a picture or write a book it is possible for A or B to say, "I will get somebody else to paint you the picture or write you the book, and that must satisfy you, and you must pay me the price." Next you have another class where the delectus personae is not so clear. I mean the case of manufactured articles. It may quite well be that an article is of such a character and quality and the reputation of the manufacturer such that, when you contract for a thing from so-and-so, you really imply that the article is to be made by so-and-so. For instance, a contract for a gun from Purdie would not be well implemented by giving you a gun bought in the ordinary market in Birmingham. There are of course cases where it is not very easy to determine on which side the matter falls, but these are cases where the difficulty lies in the application of the law to the particular circumstances. But when we come away from manufacturers, and that is the case here, and when you come to a contract with a person who does not himself manufacture and does not profess to—a contract for goods of a certain description (it really does not matter whether at this present moment these goods have been made or not)—then it seems to me that you may go on and contract in one form or another. You may either say,—“I contract with you that you shall supply me with goods as to which you shall do something, or as to which you shall satisfy yourself in such and such a way,” and then you really incorporate into your contract for the goods a contract also for the personal services of the person with whom you contract. Or, on the other hand you may contract for an article, and then stipulate that the article is to be of a certain standard which is specified in the contract, and say no more. It seems to me that in the latter case the whole element of delectus personae is gone.

Now, I turn to the contract in question. It was made upon the 17th of June 1907, and is in this form,—“We confirm having sold to you this day,” the quantity of goods, the designation of them, the quality “usual good merchantable.” Then follows a stipulation as to the amount of fatty matter that is to be in the grease, and then it is provided that the goods are to be sampled by an independent sampler, and that analysis is to be made by Dr. Watson Gray. There is nothing left after that for the party supplying the goods to do except to supply the goods. If they come up to these terms, then it is good delivery; if they do not, then it is bad. It was said that that contract was added to so far by another stipulation which was contained in the letter accepting that proposal, which said,—“Please note, however, that all grease is to be soft and seedy as sample in our possession.” There may be a question as to whether that was an adjected term which was agreed to or whether it was merely a recommendation as to which the other party said he would do his best. I will assume for the purpose of this argument that it is a firm term of the contract, but in my view that makes no difference, because if it is a firm term of the contract and if the grease when proffered is not soft and seedy, then it is not good delivery. If it is soft and seedy it is good delivery, and there again there is nothing left for Knowles Spencer & Son to do as affecting the contract. It is said that they were very good judges, and they would be sure to select grease that would be soft and seedy. Probably they would do so for their own protection, for if they did not select it they would know that it would be rejected; but what they did would not alter the contract. If, as a matter of fact, the grease when delivered was not, in the view of the buyer, soft and seedy, he would be entitled to raise that question whatever Spencer & Son said.

Accordingly I am unable to see how in this there is any question of delectus personae, at all. It seems to me that the contract is assignable, and as that is the only question raised at this stage, I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment on that matter must be recalled.

LORD KINNEAR. I agree. The principle which we call delectus personae as I understand it applies when a person is employed to do work or to perform services requiring some degree of skill or experience. And it is therefore to be inferred that he is selected for the employment in consequence of his own personal qualifications. Such a contract is not assignable by him to a third person who may or may not be competent for the work. But this is not a contract of that nature at all. It is a contract for the purchase of a certain commodity, and although we are told that the seller was specially skilled to judge of the qualities of the commodity in question, the contract refers nothing to his skill or experience, but, on the contrary, provides for inspection and lays down a totally different standard according to which the goods are to be delivered and accepted. I quite agree with your Lordship that it makes no difference whether we assume that the proviso in the letter of 18th June expresses an additional term of the contract or whether it does not. If it does, then the standard to which the letter refers, like that provided by the original contract, excludes the idea of reliance on the special skill of the sellers in the selection of goods, since it provides for the correspondence of the goods supplied with a sample in the possession of the buyers. I agree that there is no room for the principle of delectus personae, and therefore the objection the pursuer's title cannot be sustained.

The Court recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against and, * * * remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

TOLHURST, APPELLANT, v. THE ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (1900), LIMITED, RESPONDENTS.

TOLHURST, APPELLANT, v. THE ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (1900), LIMITED AND THE IMPERIAL PORTLAND CEMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, RESPONDENTS.

(House of Lords. [1903] A. C. 414.)

In January, 1898, the appellant made a contract with the Imperial Company, the effect of which is stated in the opinion.

In 1900 the Imperial Company assigned the contract and sold its undertaking, land, works, and business to the Associated Company, gave the appellant notice thereof, went into voluntary liquidation, and ceased to carry on business. After correspondence, the appellant brought an action against the Associated Company claiming a declaration that the appellant was not bound to carry out the contract of January, 1898, with that Company in substitution for the Imperial Company. Then the Associated Company and the Imperial Company jointly brought an action against Tolhurst claiming a declaration that the contract of January, 1898, was valid, subsisting, and binding upon him, and that the Imperial Company was entitled to be supplied by him with chalk in accordance with the contract. Mathew J., who tried both actions, gave judgment in both for Tolhurst. [1901] 2 K. B. 811. The Court of Appeal (Collins, M. R., Sir. F. Jenne and Cozens-Hardy L. J.) reversed these decisions and gave judgment for the Associated Company in the action brought by Tolhurst. In the action in which Tolhurst was defendant the Court of Appeal entered judgment for the plaintiffs for a declaration that the contract of January, 1898, was a subsisting, valid, and binding agreement between the Imperial Company and the defendant. [1902] 2 K. B. 660. Against both these decisions Tolhurst brought the present appeals.

EARL OF HALSBURY, L. C.⁵⁷ My Lords, in this case I confess that during a very considerable period of the argument I was of opinion that the judgment originally given by Mathew J. as he then was, was right, and that this contract was not assignable. The circumstances which have induced me to change the view I originally entertained are the length of duration of the contemplated contract, the persons engaged in it, and the nature of the contract itself. I quite agree that the fact of the word "assigns" not being in the contract is immaterial if it is ascertained that the intention of the contract is that it should be assigned. Under these circumstances I acquiesce in the judgment which is intended to be moved by my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten,⁵⁸ but it is with very great hesitation.

LORD LINDLEY: My Lords, in January, 1898, Mr. Tolhurst, who was the owner of some chalk land in Northfleet, sold part of that land to the Imperial Portland Cement Company, and by an agreement dated January 5, 1898, he agreed that they should have for fifty years from his adjoining chalk quarries all such chalk as they should require for their cement works on the land they had bought. They were to pay 1s.3d. a ton for all they wanted, and they bound themselves to take at least 750 tons a week. The company were not to come on to Tolhurst's land and get the chalk themselves. He was to get it and deliver it to them, and they were to pay him monthly for what was so delivered. Mr. Tolhurst was at liberty to sell chalk to other persons, and provision was made for the possible event of all his chalk being worked out before the expiration of the fifty years.

⁵⁸See note 59, next.

The nature of the agreement and the time it was to last negated the idea that it was confined to the parties to it. The word "assigns" does not occur in the agreement. But this does not show that the benefit of the contract is not assignable. An agreement for a lease, and even an option to require a lease or a renewal of a lease, is assignable in equity even though there is no mention of executors, administrators or assigns: See Buckland v. Papillon, (1866) L. R. 1 Eq. 477; 2 Ch. 67.

My Lords, if the above agreement had been with an ordinary individual, his interest would, on his death, have passed to his executors or administrators; or if he had become bankrupt, his trustees could have claimed it and have sold it for the benefit of his creditors. It follows that on the same supposition he could have assigned such interest in his lifetime. The Imperial Company could, in my opinion, have done the same thing; they could have assigned their interest themselves, before winding up proceedings commenced, and their liquidators could have assigned it as part of their assets afterwards.

But it is necessary to look a little further, and see what limit is set to the right conferred by the agreement. The Imperial Company were not entitled to an unlimited supply of chalk, but only to so much as they might want for making cement on their own piece of land. I do not think their right to have chalk from Tolhurst's quarries could be assigned apart from their own land and cement works. The Imperial Company could not by alienation or otherwise increase the burdens which Mr. Tolhurst undertook to bear. But this is the only limit which I can find in the present case. * * *

There is no question here of any personal confidence or personal skill. There is no reason whatever for supposing that any personal element entered into the mind of either of the parties to the agreement, and I cannot find anything in it to prevent the Imperial Company from assigning the benefit of it to any other company or to any individual. By so assigning it the Imperial Company would not get rid of their obligation to Mr. Tolhurst; but the contract is one the benefit of which is assignable in equity quite independently of the Judicature Acts. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, clause 6, has not made contracts assignable which were not assignable in equity before, but it has enabled assigns of assignable contracts to sue upon them in their own names without joining the assignor.

I cannot agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the Associated Company could not sue Mr. Tolhurst on this contract without joining the Imperial Company as co-plaintiffs. The supposed necessity of making them parties or of postponing their dissolution to enable the Associated Company to sue as their assignees has, I think, obscured the true position of the parties. I see no such necessity. But the joinder of the Imperial Company, although unnecessary, has not increased the costs and need not be further noticed.

If Mr. Tolhurst has any provable claim against the Imperial Company, and if he is not too late, he can prove against it, and the liquidators can, if necessary, obtain the means of paying him from the Associated Company under their indemnity.

In conclusion, I will only add that the British Waggon Co. v. Lea, 5 Q. B. D. 149, was, in my opinion, rightly decided, and is an authority very much in point for the Associated Company. The contract there was held assignable although the word "assigns" did not occur.

The appeal fails, and the order of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed with costs; but the formal order of the Court of Appeal will, I think, be improved, if amended as suggested by Lord Macnaghten.⁵⁰

KEMP AND OTHERS v. BAERSELMAN.

^{*} (Court of Appeal. [1906] 2 K. B. 604, 2 B. R. C. 436.)

Appeal by defendant against a judgment of Channell, J., and cross appeal by plaintiffs.

The plaintiff, George H. Kemp, was previously to the assignment hereinafter mentioned a cake manufacturer, carrying on business at two places in London (Annette Road, Holloway, and Martineau Road) and having a depot at Cardiff. The defendant was a provision merchant. By agreement dated March 24, 1904, made between G. H. Kemp and the defendant it was agreed as follows:

1. "Baerselman agrees to supply and Kemp agrees to accept all the fresh shell eggs Star Wreaths or equal to Star Wreaths that he shall require for manufacturing purposes for one year from April 1, 1904, to April 1, 1905," at certain specified prices.

3. "The said Baerselman agrees to deliver all shell eggs . . . to either of Kemp's London factories free of charge and all goods for Kemp's Cardiff depot free on rail or boat."

⁵⁰ Lord Macnaghten's opinion ended:

"The result is that Tolhurst's action fails, because, as regards the chalk which has been supplied to the Associated Company, the company is entitled to have it at the stipulated price of 1s. 3d. per ton. The second action succeeds, but I think the Imperial Company was not a necessary or proper party. If the requirements of ss. 142 and 143 of the Companies' Act, 1862, have been complied with, the company is 'deemed to be dissolved,' and, therefore, I should suggest that in lieu of the declaration in the order pronounced by the Court of Appeal, there should be inserted a declaration to the effect that the Associated Company is entitled to the benefit of the contract of January 5, 1898, they paying, as provided by the contract, for all chalk supplied to them in accordance with the contract. With this variation I think the orders under appeal should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly."

4. "Every 14 days a statement of account is to be rendered and after being checked and found correct Baerselman to draw for the amount at two months from date of delivery."

5. "During the continuance of this agreement or so long as the said Baerselman shall continue to supply sound fresh eggs satisfactorily to the said Kemp the said Kemp undertakes not to purchase eggs from any other merchant."

In July, 1904, G. H. Kemp purchased the business of a company called the National Bakery Company, carrying on business at Brewery Road, London, N., and at the same time transferred the said business together with his business at Annette Road and at Cardiff, to a new company called George Kemp, Limited, the business at Martineau Road being abandoned. By the terms of the amalgamation of the said businesses the shareholders in the National Bakery Company received as the purchase-money of their business £29,000 of debentures in George Kemp, Limited, and the whole of the ordinary share capital of George Kemp, Limited, consisting of 20,000 shares of £1 each, was, with the exception of seven shares, taken by G. H. Kemp, who acted as the manager of the amalgamated businesses.

On September 7 notice of the amalgamation was given to the defendant, who on September 17 wrote to G. H. Kemp, "As the whole of your business and everything belonging to you is now merged in the limited company by your own admission, George H. Kemp as a trader is dead, and consequently the agreement is at an end;" and he accordingly refused to supply any more eggs under the agreement. Thereupon G. H. Kemp and George Kemp, Limited, joined as co-plaintiffs in bringing this action for breach of the agreement, and claiming damages for non-delivery of eggs at Brewery Road as well as at Annette Road and at Kemp's Cardiff depot.

The question of liability, which was ordered to be tried first, was tried before Channell J. without a jury. The judge held on the construction of the agreement that G. H. Kemp was entitled to a supply of eggs for the purposes of the business that he was carrying on at certain defined places, and that the benefit of that agreement was assignable, and passed by the transfer of the business to the plaintiff company, though the liability to pay for them remained with the plaintiff G. H. Kemp. He held accordingly that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages for the refusal to deliver eggs at Annette Road and at the Cardiff depot, but not in respect of the refusal to deliver at Brewery Road. Both parties appealed.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C. J.⁶⁰ With regard to the subject of the plaintiffs' cross appeal I think that Channell J. was clearly right and that even if the benefit of the contract was assignable, so far as it related to the supply of eggs to the businesses carried on by G. H. Kemp, still the plaintiff's could not in any event claim to have a supply for the Brewery Road business, for Kemp never carried on business there, and consequently never had any requirements for that business. But, with regard to the defendant's appeal, I regret to have to differ from Channell J., and the reasons why I differ from him are these: He seemed to be of opinion that, because this was a contract for the supply of an ordinary marketable commodity like eggs, the benefit of the contract could be assigned, and that it made no difference to the defendant who the persons were to whom the eggs were to be supplied by him. He did not anywhere in his judgment deal with clause 5—the clause whereby the purchaser bound himself not to buy eggs from any other persons—and did not sufficiently consider the personal element which that clause introduced. I can find nothing in the judgments in Tolhurst's Case, [1903] A. C. 414, in the House of Lords which can be interpreted as laying down the general principle for which Mr. Hamilton [of counsel for the plaintiffs] contended, namely, that the benefit of any contract of this kind can be assigned. What the House of Lords did say in that case was that in that particular case the contract for the supply of chalk for fifty years was to be treated as a contract for the supply to a given cement-making place, and not a personal contract. But there is nothing that I can see in the present contract which enables me to say that it is a contract to supply eggs to a particular place. The first clause provides that Baerselman shall supply, and Kemp shall accept, all the fresh eggs that he, Kemp, shall require for manufacturing purposes for one year. Then, by clause 5, Kemp undertakes not to purchase eggs from any other merchant. That, as I have said, imposes a personal obligation upon the purchaser which may be very material to the contract. It is not seriously contended that Kemp, Limited, or any other assignee would be bound by that obligation unless there was something amounting to a novation; and here there was no evidence of a novation. I think this contract was not one the benefit of which can be assigned simply by a sale of the business, and that when the facts which were proved had become known to Baerselman he was entitled to refuse to continue the supply. I am not altogether satisfied that there is not also an argument in support of the defendant's contention to be based on the terms of payment, though I do not attach so much importance to it, because it may be that, when the authorities come to be examined, it will be found that the courts have treated the question of payment as one which does not prevent the benefit of a contract from being assignable. I only mention it so that in the event of the case going further it may not be thought that it has been overlooked. I base my decision on the ground that clauses 1 and 5 show that the contract was a personal one, the measure of the defendant's obligations as to supply being the extent of Kemp's personal requirements, and the undertaking by Kemp not to buy eggs of other merchants being an undertaking which was purely personal to himself. The defendant's appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

FARWELL, L. J. In my opinion this agreement contains two considerations moving to the defendant, one being the payment of the price, and the other being Kemp's undertaking not to purchase eggs from any other merchant. It is obvious that the value of the latter consideration must in a large measure depend upon the person who gives the undertaking and the business carried on by him, and to that extent the personal element enters into the question. And as regards payment, it is conceded that novation cannot be compulsory so as to make the person supplying the goods accept against his will the liability of another person to pay for them in substitution for the liability of the original purchaser; so that in that respect also the contract is personal. And, thirdly, the contract contains a personal element in that the quantity to be supplied is measured by the requirements of Kemp himself. When he assigned his three businesses to the new company one of them was given up and a much larger business taken in its place. That fact brings into prominence the importance of the provision in clause 1 that the defendant shall supply to Kemp as many fresh eggs as "he shall require for manufacturing purposes." The requirements of Kemp for manufacturing purposes are one thing, and the requirements of anyone to whom Kemp may assign his business are another. In Tolhurst's Case, [1902] 2 K. B. 660, at p. 672, in the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls laid stress on the fact that "The measure of an original contractor's requirements may be very different in a given case from those of a substituted person," and said that when that is the case "the contract would be personal and could only be fulfilled by the contractee himself." That appears to me to apply with great force to clause 1 in the present case. And I do not find here anything to indicate that the supply was to be measured by the requirements of the business at a particular specified place, as was found to be the case in Tolhurst's Case. I cannot read clause 3 as in any way limiting the generality of clause 1. The object of clause 3 was simply to specify the extent to which the cost of carriage of the goods was to be borne by the vendor. In my opinion the benefit of this contract was not assignable, and the appeal of the defendant must consequently be allowed.

*Judgment for the defendant on appeal and cross appeal.*⁶¹

⁶¹ On the assignability of a contract to supply such quantity of goods as purchaser may require in his business, see 2 B. R. C. 444, note.

In Haugen v. Sundseth, 106 Minn. 129 (1908), a contract under which a seller of a business agreed not to engage in a similar business in the same city for five years from the date of the contract was held assignable by the purchaser to buyers of the business from him. On the assignability of such contracts, see 16 Ann. Cas. 261, note.

ARKANSAS VALLEY SMELTING COMPANY v. BELDEN MINING COMPANY.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1888. 127 U. S. 379, 8 Sup. Ct. 1308, 32 L. Ed. 246.)

This was an action brought by a smelting company, incorporated by the laws of Missouri, against a mining company, incorporated by the laws of Maine, and both doing business in Colorado by virtue of a compliance with its laws, to recover damages for the breach of a contract to deliver ore, made by the defendant with Billing & Eilers, and assigned to the plaintiff. The material allegations of the complaint were as follows:

On July 12th, 1881, a contract in writing was made between the defendant of the first part and Billing & Eilers of the second part, by which it was agreed that the defendant should sell and deliver to Billing & Eilers at their smelting works in Leadville ten thousand tons of carbonate lead ore from its mines at Red Cliff, at the rate of at least fifty tons a day, beginning upon the completion of a railroad from Leadville to Red Cliff, and continuing until the whole should have been delivered, and that "all ore so delivered shall at once upon the delivery thereof become the property of the second party;" and it was further agreed as follows:

"The value of said ore and the price to be paid therefor shall be fixed in lots of about one hundred tons each; that is to say, as soon as such a lot of ore shall have been delivered to said second party, it shall be sampled at the works of said second party, and the sample assayed by either or both of the parties hereto, and the value of such lots of ore shall be fixed by such assay; in case the parties hereto cannot agree as to such assay, they shall agree upon some third disinterested and competent party, whose assay shall be final. The price to be paid by said second party for such lot of ore shall be fixed on the basis hereinafter agreed upon by the closing New York quotations for silver and common lead, on the day of the delivery of sample bottle, and so on until all of said ore shall have been delivered.

"Said second party shall pay said first party at said Leadville for each such lot of ore at once, upon the determination of its assay value, at the following prices," specifying, by reference to the New York quotations, the price to be paid per pound for the lead contained in the ore, and the price to be paid for the silver contained in each ton of ore, varying according to the proportions of silica and of iron in the ore.

The complaint further alleged that the railroad was completed on November 30th, 1881, and thereupon the defendant, under and in compliance with the contract, began to deliver ore to Billing & Eilers at their smelting works, and delivered 167 tons between that date and January 1st, 1882, when "the said firm of Billing & Eilers was dissolved, and the said contract and the business of said firm, and the smelting works at which said ores were to be delivered, were sold, assigned, and transferred to G. Billing, whereof the defendant had due notice;" that after such transfer and assignment the defendant continued to deliver ore under the contract, and between January 1st and April 21st, 1882, delivered to Billing at said smelting works 894 tons; that on May 1st, 1882, the contract, together with the smelting works, was sold and conveyed by Billing to the plaintiff, whereof the defendant had due notice; that the defendant then ceased to deliver ore under the contract, and afterward refused to perform the contract, and gave notice to the plaintiff that it considered the contract cancelled and annulled; that all the ore so delivered under the contract was paid for according to its terms; that "the plaintiff and its said assignors were at all times during their respective ownerships ready, able, and willing to pay on the like terms for each lot as delivered, when and as the defendant should deliver the same, according to the terms of said contract, and the time of payment was fixed on the day of delivery of the 'sample bottle,' by which expression was, by the custom of the trade, intended the completion of the assay or test by which the value of the ore was definitely fixed;" and that "the said Billing & Eilers, and the said G. Billing, their successor and assignee, at all times since the delivery of said contract, and during the respective periods when it was held by them respectively, were able, ready, and willing to and did comply with and perform all the terms of the same, so far as they were by said contract required; and the said plaintiff has been at all times able, ready, and willing to perform and comply with the terms thereof, and has from time to time, since the said contract was assigned to it, so notified the defendant."

The defendant demurred to the complaint for various reasons, one of which was that the contract therein set forth could not be assigned, but was personal in its nature, and could not, by the pretended assignment thereof to the plaintiff, vest the plaintiff with any power to sue the defendant for the alleged breach of contract.

The Circuit Court sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment for the defendant; and the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

GRAY, J. If the assignment to the plaintiff of the contract sued on was valid, the plaintiff is the real party in interest, and as such entitled, under the practice in Colorado, to maintain this action in its own name. Rev. Stat., § 914; Colorado Code of Civil Procedure, § 3; Albany & Rensselaer Co. v. Lundberg, 121 U. S. 451. The vital question in the case, therefore, is whether the contract between the defendant and Billing & Eilers was assignable by the latter, under the circumstances stated in the complaint.

At the present day, no doubt, an agreement to pay money, or to deliver goods, may be assigned by the person to whom the money is to be paid or the goods are to be delivered, if there is nothing in the terms of the contract, whether by requiring something to be afterward done by him, or by some other stipulation, which manifests the intention of the parties that it shall not be assignable.

But every one has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. In the familiar phrase of Lord Denman, "You have the right to the benefit you anticipate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract." Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310, 317; Winchester v. Howard, 97 Mass. 303, 305; Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28; King v. Batterson, 13 R. I. 117, 120; Lansden v. McCarthy, 45 Missouri, 106. The rule upon this subject, as applicable to the case at bar, is well expressed in a recent English treatise. "Rights arising out of contract cannot be transferred if they are coupled with liabilities, or if they involve a relation of personal confidence such that the party whose agreement conferred those rights must have intended them to be exercised only by him in whom he actually confided." Pollock on Contracts (4th Ed.), 425.

The contract here sued on was one by which the defendant agreed to deliver ten thousand tons of lead ore from its mines to Billing & Eilers at their smelting works. The ore was to be delivered at the rate of fifty tons a day, and it was expressly agreed that it should become the property of Billing & Eilers as soon as delivered. The price was not fixed by the contract, or payable upon the delivery of the ore. But, as often as a hundred tons of ore had been delivered, the ore was to be assayed by the parties or one of them, and, if they could not agree, by an umpire; and it was only after all this had been done, and according to the result of the assay, and the proportions of lead, silver, silica, and iron, thereby proved to be in the ore, that the price was to be ascertained and paid. During the time that must elapse between the delivery of the ore and the ascertainment and payment of the price, the defendant had no security for its payment, except in the character and solvency of Billing & Eilers. The defendant, therefore, could not be compelled to accept the liability of any other person or corporation as a substitute for the liability of those with whom it had contracted.

The fact that upon the dissolution of the firm of Billing & Eilers, and the transfer by Eilers to Billing of this contract, together with the smelting works and business of the partnership, the defendant continued to deliver ore to Billing according to the contract, did not oblige the defendant to deliver ore to a stranger, to whom Billing had undertaken, without the defendant's consent, to assign the contract. The change in a partnership by the coming in or the withdrawal of a partner might perhaps be held to be within the contemplation of the parties originally contracting; but, however that may be, an assent to such a change in the one party cannot estop the other to deny the validity of a subsequent assignment of the whole contract to a stranger. The technical rule of law, recognized in Murray v. Harway, 56 N. Y. 337, cited for the plaintiff, by which a lessee's express covenant not to assign has been held to be wholly determined by one assignment with the lessor's consent, has no application to this case.

The cause of action set forth in the complaint is not for any failure to deliver ore to Billing before his assignment to the plaintiff (which might perhaps be an assignable chose in action), but it is for a refusal to deliver ore to the plaintiff since this assignment. Performance and readiness to perform by the plaintiff and its assignors, during the periods for which they respectively held the contract, is all that is alleged; there is no allegation that Billing is ready to pay for any ore delivered to the plaintiff. In short, the plaintiff undertakes to step into the shoes of Billing, and to substitute its liability for his. The defendant had a perfect right to decline to assent to this, and to refuse to recognize a party, with whom it had never contracted, as entitled to demand further deliveries of ore.⁶³

The cases cited in the careful brief of the plaintiff's counsel, as tending to support this action, are distinguishable from the case at bar, and the principal ones may be classified as follows:

First. Cases of agreements to sell and deliver goods for a fixed price, payable in cash on delivery, in which the owner would receive the price at the time of parting with his property, nothing further would remain to be done by the purchaser, and the rights of the seller could not be affected by the question whether the price was paid by the person with whom he originally contracted or by an assignee. Sears v. Conover, 3 Keyes, 113, and 4 Abbott (N. Y. App.), 179; Tyler v. Barrows, 6 Robertson (N. Y.), 104.

Second. Cases upon the question how far executors succeed to rights and liabilities under a contract of their testator. Hambly v.

⁶³ "Attention must again be called to Arkansas Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co., 127 U. S. 379. Here the contract was assigned twice—first by Billing and Eilers, upon their dissolution, to Billing, and subsequently by Billing to the plaintiff. It may not be unreasonable to infer from the fact of dissolution of the partnership that the intention of the original buyers, Billing & Eilers, was to renounce liability for further performance. As to the first assignment, therefore, the defendant might well have claimed to be absolved by such renunciation. * * * As a matter of fact, however, the defendant chose to accept the liability of Billing, the assignee under the first assignment, and refused to perform only upon the assignment by Billing to the plaintiff. Moreover, there was no circumstance attending this second assignment which indicated an intent on the part of the assignor to renounce. It is submitted, therefore, that such an intent should not have been inferred, and that the assignment should not, upon that ground, have been condemned." Frederic C. Woodward, Assignability of Contract, 18 Harv. L. Rev., 23, 34-35.

Trott, Cowper, 371, 375; Wentworth v. Cock, 10 Ad. & El. 42, and 2 Per. & Dav. 251; Williams on Executors (7th Ed.), 1723-25. Assignment by operation of law, as in the case of an executor, is quite different from assignment by act of the party; and the one might be held to have been in the contemplation of the parties to this contract although the other was not. A lease, for instance, even if containing an express covenant against assignment by the lessee, passes to his executor. And it is by no means clear that an executor would be bound to perform, or would be entitled to the benefit of, such a contract as that now in question. Dickinson v. Calahan, 19 Penn. St. 227.

Third. Cases of assignments by contractors for public works, in which the contracts, and the statutes under which they were made, were held to permit all persons to bid for the contracts, and to execute them through third persons. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 California, Lockhardt, 73 Penn. St. 211; Devlin v. New York, 63 N. Y. 8.

Fourth. Other cases of contracts assigned by the party who was to do certain work, not by the party who was to pay for it, and in which the question was whether the work was of such a nature that it was intended to be performed by the original contractor only. Robson v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ad. 303; British Wagon Co. v. Lea, 5 Q. B. D. 149; Parsons v. Woodward, 2 Zabriskie, 196.

Without considering whether all the cases cited were well decided, it is sufficient to say that none of them can control the decision of the present case.

*Judgment affirmed.*⁶³

⁶³ On the assignability of an executory contract as affected by the element of personal trust and confidence, see 1 Ann. Cas. 853, note; 15 Ann. Cas. 370, note. If the relation between the parties to the contract involves a relationship of special trust and confidence above the extension of credit for money payments, the contract as in the principal case, may well be deemed unassignable without the consent of the other party to the contract. And an assent to one assignment should not be deemed to waive objection to subsequent assignments. But where the extension of credit for money payments is all that stands in the way of assignment, then assignment should be permitted if made in such a way as not to make the other party's recognition of the assignee, relieve the assignor of the financial responsibility for the contract's performance by the assignee. This is true despite the fact that where the assignee expressly assumes liability under the contract, the assignor by the assignment may become only secondarily liable. See Hudson River, etc., Co. v. Cement Co., 41 Misc. (N. Y.) 254, 260 (1903), where Kellogg, J., said that while the other party as a result of an assignment, whereby the assignee assumed and agreed to pay the liability to the other party would have the responsibility of two parties instead of one, the assignor would be "liable simply as a surety, which liability might be lessened or destroyed by slight circumstances." See also Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574 (1890).

In Eastern Advertising Co. v. McGaw, 89 Md. 72 (1899), a contract by the advertising company to carry the advertising cards of the defendant in the street railway cars in Baltimore was held unassignable by the company because the contract contemplated the skill, judgment and taste of the company in BOSTON ICE COMPANY v. POTTER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1877. 123 Mass. 28, 25 Am. Rep. 9.)

CONTRACT on an account annexed, for ice sold and delivered between April 1st, 1874, and April 1st, 1875. Answer, a general denial.

At the trial in the Superior Court, before Wilkinson, J., without a jury, the plaintiff offered evidence to show the delivery of the ice and its acceptance and use by the defendant from April 1st, 1874, to April 1st, 1875, and that the price claimed in the declaration was the market price. It appeared that the ice was delivered and used at the defendant's residence in Boston, and the amount left daily was regulated by the orders received there from the defendant's servants; that the defendant, in 1873, was supplied with ice by the plaintiff, but, on account of some dissatisfaction with the manner of supply, terminated his contract with it; that the defendant then made a contract with the Citizen's Ice Company to furnish him with ice; that some time before April, 1874, the Citizens' Ice Company sold its business to the plaintiff, with the privilege of supplying ice to its customers. There was some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff gave notice of this change of business to the defendant, and informed him of its intended supply of ice to him; but this was contradicted on the part of the defendant.

The judge found that the defendant received no notice from the plaintiff until after all the ice had been delivered by it, and that there was no contract of sale between the parties to this action except what was to be implied from the delivery of the ice by the plaintiff to the defendant and its use by him; and ruled that the defendant had a right to assume that the ice in question was delivered by the Citizens' Ice Company, and that the plaintiff could not maintain this action. The plaintiff alleged exceptions.

ENDICOTT, J. To entitle the plaintiff to recover, it must show some contract with the defendant. There was no express contract, and upon the facts stated no contract is to be implied. The defendant designing the cards, selecting the type in which they were to be printed, and in the arrangement of the cards in the cars. The court said, that "The contract was one where the delectus personæ was most material" (p. 88).

In Rease v. Kittle, 56 W. Va. 269 (1904), it was held that a paid-for option on coal lands, not running to the optionee and assigns, was not assignable. The court said that it was no different from an ordinary offer except that it was not revocable, because based upon a valuable consideration, and that "the authorities say that an offer made to a particular person can be turned into a contract by him alone" (Poffenbarger, P., at p. 279). If the option runs to one "and his assigns," he may assign it, but it may not be reassignable by the assignee. Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Co. v. Elder, 170 Fed. 215 (1909). These are minority cases and have been criticised because they subordinated the contract phase of the option to its offer phase. See 1 Williston on Contracts, § 415.

had taken ice from the plaintiff in 1873, but, on account of some dissatisfaction with the manner of supply, he terminated his contract, and made a contract for his supply with the Citizens' Ice Company. The plaintiff afterward delivered ice to the defendant for one year without notifying the defendant, as the presiding judge has found, that it had bought out the business of the Citizens' Ice Company, until after the delivery and consumption of the ice.

The presiding judge has decided that the defendant had a right to assume that the ice in question was delivered by the Citizens' Ice Company, and has thereby necessarily found that the defendant's contract with that company covered the time of the delivery of the ice.

There was no privity of contract established between the plaintiff and defendant, and without such privity the possession and use of the property will not support an implied assumpsit. Hills v. Snell, 104 Mass. 173, 177. And no presumption of assent can be implied from the reception and use of the ice, because the defendant had no knowledge that it was furnished by the plaintiff, but supposed that he received it under the contract made with the Citizens' Ice Company. Of this change he was entitled to be informed.

A party has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. It may be of importance to him who performs the contract, as when he contracts with another to paint a picture, or write a book, or furnish articles of a particular kind, or when he relies upon the character or qualities of an individual, or has, as in this case, reasons why he does not wish to deal with a particular party. In all these cases, as he may contract with whom he pleases, the sufficiency of his reasons for so doing cannot be inquired into.⁶⁴ If the defendant, before receiving the ice, or during its delivery, had received notice of the change, and that the Citizens' Ice Company could no longer perform its contract with him, it would then have been his undoubted right to have rescinded the contract and to decline to have it executed by the plaintiff. But this he was unable to do, because the plaintiff failed to inform him of that which he had a right to know. Orcutt v. Nelson, 1 Gray, 536, 542; Winchester v. Howard, 97 Mass. 303; Hardman v. Booth, 1 H. & C. 803; Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310; Robson v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ad. 303. If he had received notice and continued to take the ice as delivered, a contract would be implied. Mudge v. Oliver, 1 Allen, 74; Orcutt v. Nelson, ubi supra; Mitchell p. Lapage, Holt N. P. 253.

There are two English cases very similar to the case at bar. In Schmaling v. Thomlinson, 6 Taunt. 147, a firm was employed by the defendants to transport goods to a foreign market, and transferred the entire employment to the plaintiff, who performed it without the privity of the defendants, and it was held that he could not recover compensation for his services from the defendants.

The case of Boulton v. Jones, 2 H. & N. 564, was cited by both parties at the argument. There the defendant, who had been in the habit of dealing with one Brocklehurst, sent a written order to him for goods. The plaintiff, who had on the same day bought out the business of Brocklehurst, executed the order without giving the defendant notice that the goods were supplied by him and not by Brocklehurst. And it was held that the plaintiff could not maintain an action for the price of the goods against the defendant. It is said in that case that the defendant had a right of set-off against Brocklehurst, with whom he had a running account, and that is alluded to in the opinion of Baron Bramwell, though the other judges do not mention it.

The fact that a defendant in a particular case has a claim in set-off against the original contracting party shows clearly the injustice of forcing another person upon him to execute the contract without his consent, against whom his set-off would not be available. But the actual existence of the claim in set-off cannot be a test to determine that there is no implied assumpsit or privity between the parties. Nor can the non-existence of a set-off raise an implied assumpsit. If there is such a set-off, it is sufficient to state that, as a reason why the defendant should prevail; but it by no means follows that because it does not exist the plaintiff can maintain his action. The right to maintain an action can never depend upon whether the defendant has or has not a defence to it.

The implied assumpsit arises upon the dealings between the parties to the action, and cannot arise upon the dealings between the defendant and the original contractor, to which the plaintiff was not a party. At the same time, the fact that the right of set-off against the original contractor could not, under any circumstances, be availed of in an action brought upon the contract by the person to whom it was transferred and who executed it, shows that there is no privity between the parties in regard to the subject-matter of this action.

It is, therefore, immaterial that the defendant had no claim in set-off against the Citizens' Ice Company.

We are not called upon to determine what other remedy the plaintiff has, or what would be the rights of the parties if the ice were now in existence.

PORTUGUESE-AMERICAN BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO, APPT., v. PAUL I. WELLES ET AL.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1916. 242 U. S. 7, 37 Sup. Ct. 3, 61 L. Ed. 116, Ann. Cas. 1918 D, 643.)

HOLMES, J. This is a suit brought by the appellee Welles to establish a lien upon a debt of $6,830.85, due under a construction contract from the city of San Francisco, represented by the appellee Boyle, to the bankrupt, Metropolis Construction Company. The district court approved the report of the referee against the claim and in favor of the appellant, but this decree was reversed by the circuit court of appeals. 128 C. C. A. 161, 211 Fed. 561; 131 C. C. A. 389, 215 Fed. 81. The subject-matter is the fourth progress payment, which, on December 5, 1910, had been authorized by the board of public works of the city. On that day the Construction Company applied to the appellant bank for a loan of $30,000, secured by an order on the auditor of the city, authorizing the bank to draw from the city for the above and other amounts not in controversy here. The bank declined until the order should be accepted by the auditor, whereupon, on the next day, the order was presented to the auditor's office and stamped as received on

So a state assignee of bonds of another state may enforce them, although the assignor was remediless and simply assigned by way of gift to a state because the latter would have a remedy to make the obligor state perform. South Dakota v. North Carolina, 192 U. S. 286 (1903).

In La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 281, 284 (1890), where the question was whether a contract whereby one party was to sell and the other to buy all the grapes of a certain grade which the seller might raise in a certain vineyard during a certain period, could be assigned by the seller, Hayne, C., said of Boston Ice Co. v. Potter: "And it would seem from one of the cases cited by the appellant that if an intention not to deal with a particular person appears from circumstances outside of the contract, it cannot be assigned to such person." The contract before the court in La Rue v. Groezinger was held assignable by the seller.

The law governing undisclosed principals has a problem similar to the foregoing. In Rice & Bullen Melting Co. v. International Bank, 86 Ill. App. 136 (1899) and in Kelley Asphalt Block Co. v. Barber Asphalt & Paving Co., 120 N. Y. Supp. 163 (1909), the analogy of the doctrine of Boston Ice Co. v. Potter was rejected in the undisclosed principal situation. But see Winchester v. Howard, 97 Mass. 303 (1867).

In Said v. Butt, [1920] 3 K. B. 497, the plaintiff, knowing a theater would not sell him a seat because of personal resentment at unfounded charges which he had made, got a friend to buy him a ticket without disclosing for whom it was bought. On being refused admission by the managing director's orders, plaintiff sued him for maliciously procuring the proprietors to break their contract with the plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff had no such contract.

McCardie, J., said: "I hold that by the mere device of utilizing the name and services of Mr. Pollock [the friend] the plaintiff could not constitute himself a contractor with the Palace Theater against their knowledge and contrary to their express refusal. He is disabled from asserting that he was the undisclosed principal of Mr. Pollock" (p. 503).

December 6. The order was intended and taken as an assignment, and, after it had been stamped, was accepted by the bank as security and the money was advanced. The next day $5,000 more was advanced on the same security, notes being given for each sum. The appellee Welles was a subcontractor, and on December 12 and 16 served notice on the city to withhold payment, as permitted by § 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California. It is admitted by Welles that if the assignment was valid, his rights are subordinate to it (Newport Wharf & Lumber Co. v. Drew, 125 Cal. 585, 58 Pac. 187); and the only question argued on his behalf is whether the terms of the contract between the bankrupt and the city made the assignment void.

The contract provided that the contractor should keep the work under his personal control, and should not assign or sublet the whole or any part thereof without the consent of the board of public works. It further declared that no subcontract should relieve the contractor of any of his obligations, and that he should not, "either legally or equitably, assign any of the moneys payable under the contract or his claim thereto unless with the like consent." The city has made no objection to the assignment to the bank, and the money now awaits the decision of this court as between the claimant of the lien and the prior assignee.

There is a logical difficulty in putting another man into the relation of the covenantee to the covenantor, because the facts that give rise to the obligation are true only of the covenantee,—a difficulty that has been met by the fiction of identity of person and in other ways not material here. Of course, a covenantor is not to be held beyond his undertaking, and he may make that as narrow as he likes. Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co., 127 U. S. 379, 32 L. Ed. 246, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1308. But when he has incurred a debt, which is property in the hands of the creditor, it is a different thing to say that, as between the creditor and a third person, the debtor can restrain his alienation of that, although he could not forbid the sale or pledge of other chattels. When a man sells a horse, what he does, from the point of view of the law, is to transfer a right, and a right being regarded by the law as a thing, even though a res incorporalis, it is not illogical to apply the same rule to a debt that would be applied to a horse. It is not illogical to say that the debt is as liable to sale as it is to the acquisition of a lien. To be sure, the lien is allowed by a statute subject to which the contract was made, but the contract was made subject also to the common law, and if the common law applies the principle recognized by the statute of California that a debt is to be regarded as a thing and therefore subjects it to the ordinary rules in determining the relative rights of an assignee and the claimant of a lien, it does nothing of which the debtor can complain. See further, Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 954, 711. The debtor does not complain, but stands indifferent, willing that the common law should take its course.

The circuit court of appeals relied largely upon Burck v. Taylor, 152

U. S. 634, 38 L. Ed. 578, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696, some expressions in which, at least, seem to warrant the conclusion reached. But that case, as understood by the majority of the court, was quite different from this. A contract for the building of the Capitol of Texas was made not assignable without the consent of the governor and certain others. The contractor assigned an undivided three-fourths interest to Taylor, Babcock, & Company, with the required assent, and then three-sixteenths without assent to three others severally, one of whom conveyed one thirty-second to the plaintiff. The contractor made another conveyance of all his rights under the contract to Taylor, Babcock, & Company, and Taylor, Babcock, & Company made what purported to be a transfer of the entire contract to Abner Taylor, the defendant. Both of these transfers were assented to. In the latter, Taylor purported to bind himself to the state to perform the original contract, and, in the assent to the same, the governor and other authorities stated that they recognized Taylor as the contractor, bound as the original contractor was bound. The court held that there was a novation (p. 650), and that Taylor acted without notice of the plaintiff's claim (p. 653). Upon those facts it would be hard to make out any right of the plaintiff to proceeds of the new contract that Taylor had performed.

The assignability of a debt incurred under a contract like the present sometimes is sustained on the ground that the provision against assignment is inserted only for the benefit of the city. Whether that form of expression is accurate or merely is an indirect recognition of the principle that we have stated hardly is material here. It is enough to say that we are of opinion that, upon the facts stated, the assignment was not absolutely void, that therefore the bank got a title prior to that of Welles, and consequently that the decree must be reversed. See Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567, 29 L. Ed. 940, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 870; Burnett v. Jersey City, 31 N. J. Eq. 341; Fortunato v. Patten, 147 N. Y. 277, 41 N. E. 572.

*Decree reversed.*⁶⁶

Mr. Justice McKenna dissents for the reasons stated by the circuit court of appeals.

There are cases which give the stipulation such full effect that any assignment forbidden by the stipulation is absolutely void except that it may give the assignee a cause of action against the assignor. *Bonds-Foster Lumber Co. v. JOHNSON ET AL. v. VICKERS.

Action by Rasmus Johnson and others against Alvin Vickers. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded. The action was brought to recover a sum alleged to be due on a sub-other party's reasonable needs shows to be advisable. In the conflict between the public policy in favor of permitting the parties to make that contract which they see fit and this other rule of public policy, it should be remembered that:

"The creation of an obligation is no part of the law of property; but the transfer of such obligation when created is as much part of the law of property as the transfer of a house or of a table." Gray's Rule Against Perpetuities, 3 ed., § 329, n. 3.

In Inter-Southern Line Life Ins. Co. v. Humphrey (Miss.), 84 So. 625, 626-7 (1920), Holden, J., for the court, said of an assignment by insurance agents of their claims against the company to secure the payment of a note to the assignee, where the contract provided that "no assignment of commissions accruing hereunder shall be valid unless authorized in writing by the company in advance," that:

"Prohibition in a contract against assignment is legal and valid. The right to make a personal contract or to agree for the performance of a contract by a certain party to the exclusion of all others is obviously legitimate. Such contracts are often made with a view of retaining the personal interest and action of the payee, which purpose might be defeated should the contract or the fruits of it be unconditionally assigned to some stranger. But where the assignment of the proceeds in a nonassignable contract is made merely as collateral security for the payment of a debt, and the real ownership remains in the assignor, he still retains the personal interest and obligation of performance as the real owner, and the reason urged against the validity of such assignment disappears, and the rights of the debtor are not prejudiced by the collateral assignment which inures to the benefit of the assignor.

"Restrictions against assignment of contracts are not looked upon by the courts with full favor, because they prohibit the alienation of such property rights, thus depriving the owner of the full enjoyment and control thereof; especially is this true when such deprivation results in no benefit to the debtor.

"It is held by good authority that the prohibition against assignment in a contract intends that the owner of the property right cannot voluntarily assign it, but that when the right passes to another by court sale or foreclosure against the right assigned as collateral security, it is valid, because the transfer of full title in such case is involuntary on the part of the owner in the contract. Crouse v. Michell, 130 Mich. 347, 90 N. W. 32, 79 Am. St. Rep. 479.

"However, we rest the decision in this case upon the ground that there is a clear distinction between an unconditional assignment and a collateral assignment, and that the prohibition in the contract against assignment does not contemplate a collateral assignment, but means that only a complete assignment by the owner of his whole interest in the property right shall be invalid."

Mueller v. Northwestern University, 195 Ill. 236 (1902), takes the extreme position that the parties may prohibit an assignment of the contract so that the assignee cannot succeed to any rights under it.

In In re Turcan, 40 Ch. D. 5 (1888), it was said by Cotton, L. J., for the court, that it would be a sufficient compliance with a condition in an insurance policy scription contract. The subscriptions were obtained on a contract dated Dec. 4, 1906, for the Industrial Construction Company, a Chicago corporation, to erect and equip a canning factory, according to specifications attached to the proposed contract, for $14,000, and after the factory was in operation, it was agreed that the subscribing parties should form a corporation, each subscriber to receive stock to the amount of his subscription. On December 8th, the Industrial Construction Company assigned the contract in question, without recourse, to Rasmus Johnson, Christ Johnson, and T. H. Pardoe, the plaintiffs in this action. The assignees proceeded to erect the factory. The subscribers were not advised of the alleged assignment of the contract to the plaintiffs before it is claimed that the job was accepted. Defendant declined to pay his subscription, on the ground, among others, that the contract was not assignable.

BARNES, J.⁶⁷ The disposition of this appeal necessitates the consideration of the following questions: (1) Was the contract sued on assignable? (2) Was the question of its nonassignability raised by the pleadings? (3) Was the defendant precluded from insisting upon the defense of nonassignability?

1. It is established that the Industrial Construction Company attempted to make an absolute assignment of its contract two days after its execution, and before any work was done thereunder. The assignment is unqualified in its terms and is made without recourse, and the plaintiffs are suing as assignees claiming to have performed the work and furnished the materials used in the construction of the factory by virtue of the assignment, and not as subcontractors. This contract obligated the Industrial Construction Company to build and equip a canning factory according to specifications attached to the contract that seem to be complete as to details. The performance of the work undoubtedly required skill and experience, and, upon its proper execution the success of the enterprise might well depend. The assignees were wholly inexperienced in constructing plants of this character, while the assignor apparently followed the business of so doing. This contract manifestly imposed a liability upon the assignor of the plaintiffs, and involved a relation of personal confidence which the subscribers must have intended would be exercised by the party in whom they confided. In the construction of a complex plant, subscribers having no knowledge themselves as to how such a plant should be constructed, would naturally prefer to make their contract with a party having the requisite knowlthat it "shall not be assignable in any case whatever" if the insured should execute a declaration of trust in favor of the persons to whom he wished to give the benefit of the money to come due on the policy.

On the power of parties to an assignable contract to restrict its assignability, see 88 Am. St. Rep. 812, note; Ann. Cas. 1918 D. 613 note.

edge and experience rather than with persons having neither. Good business judgment would dictate that such a course should be pursued. They had the right to select the party with whom they would deal, and, when the selection was made and the contract was executed, there could be no substitution of contractors in the case before us without the assent of the subscribers. The authorities are quite uniform in holding that such a contract is not assignable by the contractor without the consent of the other party thereto. Ark. Valley S. Co. v. Belden Mining Co., 127 U. S. 379, 387, 8 Sup. Ct. 1308, 32 L. Ed. 246; Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28, 25 Am. Rep. 9; Swarts v. Electric Lighting Co., 26 R. I. 388, 59 Atl. 77; Campbell v. Railway Co., 82 Iowa, 735, 48 N. W. 71; Craig v. Miller, 6 Ky. 440; 4 Cyc. 22, 23.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to set aside the order directing a verdict in plaintiffs' favor, and to grant the defendant's motion for a directed verdict in his favor, and for judgment dismissing the complaint.⁶⁸

CHARLES WOODLEY v. W. E. BOND, EXECUTOR OF A. W. MEBANE, DECEASED.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1872. 66 N. C. 396.)

DICK, J.⁶⁹ The plaintiff contracted to serve the testator of the defendant as an overseer on a farm for one year. Before the term of service had expired, the said testator, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, sold and delivered possession of said farm to Augustus Holley, and left the farm a few days after the sale.

The agreement between the plaintiff and testator was a personal contract, and its benefits and obligations did not in any respect pass with the land to Holley. Various considerations, besides the wages agreed upon, may have induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract. It may be that he would not serve Holley at any price. The contract consisted of mutual engagements between the parties, which established the relation of employer and overseer, and as this relation was ended by the action of the testator, the plaintiff was at liberty to regard the contract as rescinded, leave the farm, and bring suit upon a quantum meruit for services rendered at the instance and request of testator.

⁶⁸ Where a contract is so personal as to be unassignable in nature, the fact that it contains a provision that "This agreement shall bind and benefit the respective successors and assigns of the parties hereto" will not make it assignable for "The intention of parties to a contract must be ascertained, not from one provision, but from the entire instrument." Paige v. Faure (N. Y.), 127 N. E. 898, 899 (1920).

MACDONALD ET AL. v. O'SHEA ET AL.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1910. 58 Wash. 169, 108 Pac. 436, Ann. Cas. 1912 A, 417.)

Action by E. C. MacDonald, trustee, and another, against Edward O'Shea, administrator of John J. Walsh, deceased, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, certain of the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

PARKER, J.⁷⁰ This is an action to foreclose an indemnity mortgage. A trial resulted in findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and certain of the defendants have appealed.

The material facts are in substance as follows: The National Surety Company is a corporation authorized to transact the business of surety in this state. On April 27, 1905, John J. Walsh executed and delivered to E. C. MacDonald as trustee for the National Surety Company a mortgage upon real property in Spokane, which mortgage by its terms was given to secure the sum of $3,500. This mortgage was intended to indemnify the surety company against any damage or loss which it might incur upon any bond thereafter executed by it at the request or for the benefit of John J. Walsh. On May 25, 1906, at the instance and request of John J. Walsh, the surety company executed and delivered its bond as surety in his behalf in favor of the Standard Furniture House, incorporated, in the sum of $7,500, whereby the surety company guaranteed that he would well and truly perform a certain building contract for the construction of a building, entered into on that day by him with the Standard Furniture House. By the terms of the building contract he was to furnish all material and labor for the erection and completion of the building according to certain plans and specifications at an agreed compensation of $15,050.75, and was to protect the property against all claims and liens occurring by reason of the construction of the building. It was provided in the contract that "the said parties for themselves, their heirs, successors, executors, administrators and assigns, do hereby agree to the full performance of the covenants herein contained." On July 21, 1906, John J. Walsh died. At that time a comparatively small part of the contract had been performed. Soon thereafter Edward O'Shea was appointed and duly qualified as administrator of the estate of John J. Walsh. The administrator under the sanction of the court proceeded with the construction of the building under the contract made by the deceased. Thereafter the administrator defaulted in the performance of the contract, in that he suffered and permitted liens to be filed against the property, and neglected to pay certain bills for material and labor used in its construction amounting in the aggregate to $3,492.40. These claims were all lienable claims against the property, though not all of the claimants had actually filed liens. Thereupon the Standard Furniture House demanded that the surety company save it harmless from these claims. Thereupon the surety company, after investigating the claims and being satisfied of their validity, and that it was liable as surety upon the bond for their payment, complied with the demand of the Standard Furniture House and paid the claims on February 14, 1907. The appellants are heirs of John J. Walsh, and as such are interested in the mortgaged property. The court concluded that the claims paid by the surety company were valid claims against John J. Walsh, and the surety company as surety, upon the contract and bond; and that the surety company by virtue of its indemnity mortgage was entitled to have the sums so paid by it declared a lien upon the property described in the mortgage, and to have the mortgage foreclosed.

Learned counsel for appellants contend that the contract for the construction of the building constituted such a personal relation between Walsh and the Standard Furniture House that this obligation under the contract to construct the building did not survive, but died with him, and that there was no obligation cast upon his personal representative, or his estate, requiring the completion of the building; and hence the surety company was under no obligation to pay, lien claims accruing after the death of Walsh in the construction of the building. The general rule governing the survival of contractual obligations as against the personal representative and the estates of deceased persons is stated in 2 Parsons on Contracts (9th Ed.) 685, as follows: "It is a presumption of law that parties to a simple contract intended to bind not only themselves, but their personal representatives; and such parties may sue on a contract, although not named therein. Hence, as we have seen, executors, though not named in a contract are liable, so far as they have assets, for the breach of a contract which was broken in the lifetime of their testator. And, if the contract was not broken in his lifetime, they must not break it, but will be held to its performance, unless this presumption is overcome by the nature of the contract, as where the thing to be done required the personal skill of the testator himself." 18 Cyc. 239. This rule is elementary. The difficulty in applying it arises when the facts of the particular case are such as to render it doubtful as to whether or not the thing to be done requires the personal skill of the deceased himself. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Billings's Appeal, 106 Pa. 558, 560, said: "Where a party agrees to do that which does not necessarily require him to perform in person, that which he may, by assignment of his contract or otherwise, employ others to do, we may fairly infer, unless otherwise expressed, that a mere personal relation was not contemplated. It is true also, perhaps, that a contract may involve matters of such a nature as to render the performance of them so incompatible with the settlement of a decedent's estate, and so inconsistent with the general duties of an administrator or executor that, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, the parties may be presumed, as in the case of Dickinson v. Calahan's Administrator, [19 Pa.] 227, to have intended its dissolution at death. The whole question in each case is one for construction, and depends upon the intention of the parties, that intention to be found under the rules regulating the construction of contracts in general."⁷¹

⁷¹In Dickinson v. Calahan's Adm'rs, 19 Pa. St. 227 (1852), where a lumber manufacturer contracted with a lumber merchant to sell him a certain quantity of lumber to be made at his mill during five years, the lumber to be paid for as delivered, where both parties died during the five years, and where the executor of the vendee sought to set off against an action by the administrators of the vendor for the value of lumber delivered damages for breach of the contract through the refusal of the administrators of the vendor to perform it, Lowrie, J., for the court, said (p. 234):

"It would seem absurd to say that the administrator of a physician, or author, or musician could be compelled to perform their professional engagements no matter how the contract might be expressed. The idea is ludicrous. Yet it has been supposed that an administrator might take the place of his intestate in teaching an apprentice to be a surgeon, or saddler, or shoemaker, or mariner, or husbandman, or in demanding services from an ordinary laborer, but the idea was rejected by the Court. On what ground? Most certainly not that no one else could be got to take the place of the decedent, but on the ground that no such substitution was intended by the contract, together perhaps with the feeling of the incompatibility of such a substitution with the duties imposed by law upon administrators. The law trusts people to settle up estates on account of their honesty and general business capacity, and not for any peculiar scientific or artistic skill, and the State does not hold itself bound to furnish such abilities. Some people may suppose that it requires no great skill to manufacture boards if one has the material and machinery, but still we cannot suppose that the deceased was contracting for any kind of skill in his administrators. For these reasons the Court below was right in declaring in substance that the administrators were liable only for breaches committed by the intestate in his lifetime, and the same principle applies to the death of either party."

In Burch v. J. D. Bush & Co. (No. Car.), 106 S. E. 489, 490 (1921), Stacy, J., for the court, said:

"The general rule is that contracts bind the executor or administrator, though not named therein, and that death does not absolve a man from his engagements. There is an exception, however, to this general rule, equally well established, that in contracts requiring the continued existence of a given person or thing a condition is implied that the impossibility of fulfillment arising out of the death of the person or destruction of the thing shall excuse the performance. Stagg v. Land Co., 171 N. C. 583, 39 S. E. 47; Yerrington v. Greene, 7 R. I. 539, 84 Am. Dec. 578; Mendenhall v. Davis, 52 Wash. 169, 100 Pac. 336, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.), 914, 17 Ann. Cas. 179, and note.

In the case before us, there is no doubt of the intent of the parties to make this building contract binding upon the administrator of John J.

"The line of demarcation between a personal contract, which is terminated by death, and one which the personal representatives of the deceased are required to fulfill, is not very clearly defined. The reasons for this become obvious and apparent upon a moment's reflection. Two elements which enter into the making of a contract, namely, the intention and understanding of the parties, are not subject to any fixed standard of 'weights and measures.' They are invisible and intangible things, variable with time and place, and undeterminable by any constant or set formula. Hence no hard and fast rule can be established for their ascertainment. To be sure, in the broad outlines certain contracts are not difficult of classification. Those of a strictly personal nature, involving particular personal skill or taste—such as a contract of an author to write a book, an artist to paint a picture, a sculptor to carve a piece of statuary, a singer to give a concert, and a promise to marry—are personal contracts and die with the person. Death makes the performance of such contracts impossible, and, indeed, removes the main object and inducement for the agreement. Executors and administrators are unable to perform such contracts, and the estate of the deceased cannot be held liable in damages by reason of the failure to complete them. Ordinarily contracts not falling under this exception come under the general rule, and death does not excuse performance. 13 C. J. 643 et seq.

"The true question is whether the contract, properly construed, requires a continuance of the promised action beyond the lifetime of the promisor. It is the same question, and is to be answered in the same way, as if the promisor himself were alive for purposes of being sued, but dead for the purposes of performance.' Drummond v. Crane, 159 Mass. 577, 35 N. E. 90, 23 L. R. A. 707, 38 Am. St. Rep. 460.

"On the other hand, the parties, by express terms, may exclude substituted performance. But there is a twilight zone in which, by reason of the ambiguity of some contracts, the intention of the parties must become the determining factor. The facts and circumstances of each particular case should be taken into consideration in determining whether the contract is purely personal in its nature, and therefore terminated by death, or one which the personal representatives can complete as well as the deceased could have done, had he lived. As said in Siler v. Gray, 86 N. C. 566:

"The general rule unquestionably is that the personal representatives of a party are bound to perform all his contracts, whether specially named in them or not, or else make compensation for their nonperformance out of his estate. But to this there is the exception, as well established as the rule itself, of all such contracts as require something to be done by the party himself in person."

"Assuming such to be the law, whether a given case falls under the general rule, or the exception, must depend upon the intention of the parties; for, at least, it is in every case purely a question of their understanding and agreement. Steamboat Co. v. Transportation Co., 166 N. C. 582, 33 S. E. 956; Railroad v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 368, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550, 15 Ann. Cas. 363."

Walsh as his personal representative in the event of his death before the completion of the building, since the contract by its express terms so provides. Therefore the administrator was bound to complete the performance of the contract in so far as the assets of the estate would permit, unless we can say that the building contract imposed upon John J. Walsh such a personal duty as to render it practically impossible of performance by any one but himself. An exhaustive note citing many authorities relating to this subject may be found in 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 915. See, also, note in 68 Am. Dec. 760. It is clear that the obligation of deceased under this building contract was that of an independent contractor, and was not a matter of rendering personal service. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 187. There was nothing in the contractual relation existing between the deceased and the Standard Furniture House at all approaching the relation of master and servant; nor was it contemplated that the building or any part thereof when completed should be the product of his own personal labor or skill, either as laborer, mechanic, or artist. He no doubt expected to perform his contract through the labor and skill of others to a very large extent, and he had the right to so perform the whole of his contract if he so desired. We have not had our attention called to any authorities holding that the obligation of an independent contractor under an agreement to build a building does not survive him, if the contract is not performed at the time of his death, while there is eminent authority to the contrary. Judge Woerner in his American Law of Administration (2d Ed.) § 328, says: "If one agrees to build a house before a given time, and dies before that time, his executors are bound to perform the contract; and the completion by an administrator of a decedent's contract to build a house attaches to his work all the liabilities of the original contract, so that a subcontractor is entitled to his lien for materials furnished the intestate." See, also, 3 Williams on Executors (7th Am. Ed.) 224. Both of these eminent text-writers cite in support of their text among other authorities the early English case of Quick v. Ludburrow, reported in 3 Bulstrode's Reports, 30, in the year 1685, in which Coke, Chief Justice, said: "If a man be bound to build a house for another before such a time, and he which is bound dies before the time, his executors are bound to perform this." The following cases relating to building contracts support this view: Kadish v. Lyon, 229 Ill. 35, 82 N. E. 194; Janin v. Browne, 59 Cal. 37; Riblet v. Wallis, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 360, 365; Bambrick v. Webster Presbyterian Church, 53 Mo. App. 225, 238; Russell v. Buckhout, 87 Hun, 46, 34 N. Y. Supp. 271. We are of the opinion that the obligations of John J. Walsh under this contract survived him and were binding upon his estate. It follows that the surety company was as much bound to the performance of this contract after the death of Walsh as it would have been had he lived to perform the contract in person.⁷⁸ * * *

court any order or direction to carry out the contract of their intestate, as contemplated by section 126 of chapter 3, Hurd's Revised Statutes of 1905, which reads: 'All contracts made by the decedent may be performed by the executor or administrator when so directed by the county court.' We think that no case is by the bill made which authorizes the intervention of a court of equity. If an administrator elects to perform a contract entered into by his intestate for the benefit of the estate without obtaining the order or direction contemplated by section 126, supra, where the contract is not of a strictly personal nature, he may do so, taking upon himself the risk of being required to make good any loss that may ensue. If he obtains the order or direction contemplated by the statute after having fully disclosed to the court all the facts and circumstances proper for the court's consideration, and carefully and exactly carries out the order or direction he will, no doubt, be thereby relieved from personal liability. If he acts without such order or direction, but in good faith, for the purpose of complying with the contract of the deceased, his acts, so far as the living parties to the contract are concerned, are binding upon the estate." Scott, J., in Kadish v. Lyon, 229 Ill. 35, 41 (1907).

⁷³ "It is, of course, competent for parties to agree that a contract shall not survive and that all obligation under it should terminate on their death. So a contract may be of such a nature as to admit only of a personal performance, or as to imply that it is to be operative only during the continuance of personal relations, although not so expressed in terms and will be deemed dissolved by death or other disability which renders performance, according to the intention, impossible." Andrews, J., in Kernochan v. Murray, 111 N. Y. 306, 308 (1888).

CHAPTER V.

BENEFICIARIES OF CONTRACTS.¹

DUTTON AND WIFE v. POOLE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1677. 2 Levinz, 211.)

Assumpsit, and declares that the father of the plaintiff's wife being seized of a wood which he intended to sell to raise portions for younger children, the defendant being his heir, in consideration the father would forbear to sell it at his request, promised the father to pay his daughter, now the plaintiff's wife, £1000, and avers that the father at his request forbore, but the defendant had not paid the £1000. After verdict for the plaintiff upon non assumpsit, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that the action ought not to be brought by the daughter, but by the father; or if the father be dead, by his executors; for the promise was made to the father, and the daughter is neither privy nor interested in the consideration, nothing being due to her. Also the father, notwithstanding this agreement with the son, might have cut down the wood, and then there was no remedy for the son, nor could the daughter have released the promise, and therefore she cannot have an action against him for not performing the promise, and divers cases were cited for the defendant, as Yelv. Rippon v. Norton, Hawes v. Leader, Starky v. Milner, 1 Roll. 31, 32, Sty. 296, and a case lately resolved in Com. Banc. inter Norris & Pine, Intrat. Hill, 22 and 23 Car. 2, 1538, where the case was, "If you will marry me, I will pay your children so much," and the action being brought by the children, adjudged it lay not. On the other side it was said, if a man deliver goods or money to H. to deliver or pay to B., B. may have an action, because he is to have the benefit of the bailment, so here the daughter is to have the benefit of the promise. So if a man should say, "Give me a horse, I will give your son £10," the son may bring the action, because the gift was upon consideration of a profit to the son; and the father is obliged by natural affection to provide for his children, for which cause affection

¹ See Crawford D. Hening, History of Beneficiary's Action in Assumpsit, Essays in Anglo-American Legal History, III, 339. See also Henry O. Taylor, The Right of a Third Person to Sue on a Contract Made in His Favor, 15 Amer. L. Rev. 230; Samuel Williston, Contracts for the Benefit of a Third Person, 15 Harv. L. Rev. 767; Arthur L. Corbin, Contracts for the Benefit of Third Persons, 27 Yale L. J. 1008.

As to the various matters in this chapter, local statutes should be consulted. Some statutes provide for suits by sole (donee or gift) beneficiaries, some by creditor (payment or obligee) beneficiaries, some by beneficiaries of sealed contracts, etc.

to children is sufficient to raise a use to them out of the father's estate; and therefore the daughter had an interest in the consideration and in the promise, and the son had a benefit by this agreement, for by this means he had the wood and the daughter is without a portion, which otherwise in all probability the son would have been left to pay, if the wood had not been cut down, nor this agreement between him and his father, and for authorities of this side were cited 1 Roll. Ab. 31, Oldman v. Bateman, and ibid. 32; Starky v. Meade.

Upon the first argument Wylde and Jones, JJ., seemed to think that the action ought to be brought by the father and his executors, though for the benefit of the daughter, and not by the daughter, being not privy to the promise or consideration. Twysden and Rainsford seemed contra, and afterward two new judges being made, scil. Scroggs, C. J., in lieu of Rainsford, and Dolben in lieu of Twysden, the case was argued again upon the reasons aforesaid; and now Scroggs, C. J., said that there was such apparent consideration of affection from the father to his children, for whom nature obliges him to provide, that the consideration and promise to the father may well extend to the children, and he and Jones remembered the case of Norris & Pine, and that it was adjudged as aforesaid. But Scroggs said he was then and still is of opinion contrary to that judgment. Dolben, J., concurred with him that the daughter might bring the action, Jones & Wylde hesitabant. But next day they also agreed to the opinion of the Chief Justice and Dolben, and so judgment was given for the plaintiff, for the son hath the benefit by having of the wood, and the daughter hath lost her portion by this means. And now Jones said he must confess he was never well satisfied with the judgment in Norris & Pine's Case, but being it was resolved, he was loth to give his opinion so suddenly against it. And note upon this judgment error was immediately brought, and Trin. 31 Car. 2 it was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber.²

² "At the time [of Dutton v. Poole, etc.] * * * the law was not settled, as it now is, that natural love and affection is not a sufficient consideration for a promise upon which an action may be maintained; nor was it settled that the promisee cannot bring an action unless the consideration for the promise moved from him. The modern cases have, in effect, overruled the old decisions; they show that the consideration must move from the party entitled to sue upon the contract. It would be a monstrous proposition to say that a person was a party to the contract for the purpose of suing upon it for his own advantage, and not a party to it for the purpose of being sued. * * * I am prepared to overrule the old decisions, and to hold that, by reason of the principles which now govern the action of assumpsit, the present action is not maintainable." Crompton, J., in Tweddle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & Smith 393, 398 (1861).

BOURNE v. MASON AND ANOTHER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1669. 1 Ventris, 6.)

In assumpsit, the plaintiff declares, that, whereas one Parrie was indebted to the plaintiffs and defendants in two several sums of money, and that a stranger was indebted in another sum to Parrie; that there being a communication between them, the defendants, in consideration that Parrie would permit them to sue, in his name, the stranger, for the sum due to him, promised that they would pay the sum which Parrie owed to the plaintiff; and alleged that Parrie permitted them to sue, and that they recovered. After non-assumpsit pleaded, and a verdict for the plaintiff, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the plaintiff could not bring his action, for he was a stranger to the consideration.

But in maintenance thereof, a judgment was cited in 1658, between Sprat and Agar, in the King's Bench, where one promised to the father, in consideration that he would give his daughter in marriage with his son, he would settle so much land. After the marriage the son brought the action; and it was adjudged maintainable. And another case was cited of a promise to a physician, that if he did such a cure he would give such a sum of money to himself and another to his daughter; and it was resolved the daughter might bring an assumpsit. Which cases the court agreed: for in the one case the parties that brought the assumpsit did the meritorious act, though the promise was made to another; and in the other case, the nearness of the relation gives the daughter the benefit of the consideration performed by her father; but here the plaintiff did nothing of trouble to himself or benefit to the defendant, but is a mere stranger to the consideration; wherefore it was adjudged quod nil capiat per billam.³

In England and Ireland beneficiaries of contracts are occasionally treated as cestuis que trust, so as to give them a remedy when otherwise they would not have one. Moore v. Darton, 4 De G. & S. 517 (1851); Walford v. Les Affreteurs Réunis Société Anonyme, [1918] 2 K. B. 498; Kelly v. Larkin, [1910] 2 Ir. R. 550. See also *McFadden v. ³ "The question in this case is whether, upon the facts stated in the complaint, the plaintiff [as creditor beneficiary] can maintain an action at law against the defendant for its refusal to pay his debt. It is probably true that in many, perhaps in most, of the state courts he could do so; but, whatever the law in relation to this matter may be elsewhere, it must now be regarded as the settled general rule in this state that where A. simply agrees with B., upon a valid consideration, to assume and pay B.'s debts, and save B. harmless therefrom, C., a creditor of B., cannot maintain an action at law against A. for his refusal to pay the debt due from B. to C. Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn. 445; Clapp v. Lawton, 31 Conn. 95; Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 191; Baxter v. Camp, 71 Conn. 245, 41 Atl. 803; Lamkin v. Manufacturing Co., 72 Conn. 57, 43 Atl. 593, 1042, 44 L. R. A. 786. This rule is based upon the principle that A., in the case supposed, for a breach of his contract obligation, agreed to be answerable to B. alone, or B.'s assignee, and not to each and all of the creditors of B. who were

LAWRENCE v. FOX.

*(Court of Appeals of New York, 1859. 20 N. Y. 268.)

Appeal from the Superior Court of the city of Buffalo. On the trial before Masten, J., it appeared by the evidence of a bystander, that one Holly, in November, 1857, at the request of the defendant, loaned and advanced to him $300, stating at the time that he owed that sum to the plaintiff for money borrowed of him, and had agreed to pay it to him the then next day; that the defendant in consideration thereof, at the time of receiving the money, promised to pay it to the plaintiff the then next day. Upon this state of facts the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon three several grounds—viz.: That there was no proof tending to show that Holly was indebted to the plaintiff; that the agreement by the defendant with Holly to pay the plaintiff was void for want of consideration, and that there was no privity between the plaintiff and defendant. The court overruled the motion, and the counsel for the defendant excepted. The cause was then submitted to the jury, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the loan and interest, $344.66, upon which judgment was entered; from which the defendant appealed to the Superior Court, at general term, where the judgment was affirmed, and the defendant appealed to this court.

H. GRAY, J.⁴ * * * But it is claimed that notwithstanding this promise was established by competent evidence, it was void for the want of consideration. It is now more than a quarter of a century since it was settled by the Supreme Court of this state, in an able and painstaking opinion by the late Savage, C. J., in which the authorities were fully examined and carefully analyzed, that a promise in all material respects like the one under consideration was valid, and the judgment of that Court was unanimously affirmed by the Court for the Correction of Errors. Farley v. Cleaveland, 4 Cow. 432; same case in error, 9 Cow. 639. In that case one Moon owed Farley and sold to Cleaveland a quantity of hay, in consideration of which Cleaveland promised to pay Moon's debt to Farley; and the decision in favor of Farley's right to recover was placed upon the ground that the hay received by Cleaveland from Moon was a valid consideration for Cleaveland's promise to pay Farley, and that the subsisting liability of Moon to pay Farley was no objection to the recovery. The fact that the money strangers to the contract; and this court has said that "the rule is a salutary one, and should not be departed from except for good reasons." Meech v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 203. In our own state it has been departed from by express legislation in one instance, namely, where the grantee in a deed conveying real estate subject to a mortgage or lien agrees to assume and pay the incumbrance. Gen. St. § 983." Torrance, J., in Morgan v. Randolph & Clowes Co., 73 Conn. 396, 397-398 (1900). Only a few American jurisdictions agree with Connecticut.

advanced by Holly to the defendant was a loan to him for a day, and that it thereby became the property of the defendant, seemed to impress the defendant's counsel with the idea that because the defendant's promise was not a trust fund placed by the plaintiff in the defendant's hands, out of which he was to realize money as from the sale of a chattel or the collection of a debt, the promise although made for the benefit of the plaintiff could not inure to his benefit. The hay which Moon delivered to Cleaveland was not to be paid to Farley, but the debt incurred by Cleaveland for the purchase of the hay, like the debt incurred by the defendant for money borrowed, was what was to be paid. That case has been often referred to by the courts of this state, and has never been doubted as sound authority for the principle upheld by it. (Barker v. Bucklin, 2 Denio, 45; Hudson Canal Company v. The Westchester Bank, 4 Id., 97.) It puts to rest the objection that the defendant's promise was void for want of consideration. The report of that case shows that the promise was not only made to Moon, but to the plaintiff Farley. In this case the promise was made to Holly, and not expressly to the plaintiff; and this difference between the two cases presents the question, raised by the defendant's objection, as to the want of privity between the plaintiff and defendant. As early as 1806 it was announced by the Supreme Court of this state, upon what was then regarded as the settled law of England, "that where one person makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person, that third person may maintain an action upon it." Schermerhorn v. Vanderheyden, (1 John. R. 140,) has often been reasserted by our courts and never departed from. * * * This question was subsequently, and in a case quite recent, again the subject of consideration by the Supreme Court, when it was held that in declaring upon a promise, made to the debtor by a third party to pay the creditor of the debtor, founded upon a consideration advanced by the debtor, it was unnecessary to avert a promise to the creditor; for the reason that upon proof of a promise made to the debtor to pay the creditor, a promise to the creditor would be implied. And in support of this proposition, in no respect distinguishable from the one now under consideration, the case of Schermerhorn v. Vanderheyden, with many intermediate cases in our courts, were cited, in which the doctrine of that case was not only approved, but affirmed. The Delaware & Hudson Canal Company v. The Westchester County Bank, 4 Denio, 97. * * *

But it is urged that because the defendant was not in any sense a trustee of the property of Holly for the benefit of the plaintiff, the law will not imply a promise. I agree that many of the cases where a promise was implied were cases of trusts, created for the benefit of the promisor. The case of Felton v. Dickinson, 10 Mass. 189-190, and others that might be cited, are of that class, but concede them all to have been cases of trusts, and it proves nothing against the application of the rule to this case. The duty of the trustee to pay the cestuis que trust, according to the terms of the trust, implies his promise to the latter to do so. In this case the defendant, upon ample consideration received from Holly, promised Holly to pay his debt to the plaintiff; the consideration received and the promise to Holly made it as plainly his duty to pay the plaintiff as if the money had been remitted to him for that purpose, and as well implied a promise to do so as if he had been made a trustee of property to be converted into cash with which to pay. The fact that a breach of the duty imposed in the one case may be visited, and justly, with more serious consequences than in the other, by no means disproves the payment to be a duty in both. The principle illustrated by the example so frequently quoted (which concisely states the case in hand) "that a promise made to one for the benefit of another, he for whose benefit it is made may bring an action for its breach," has been applied to trust cases, not because it was exclusively applicable to those cases, but because it was a principle of law, and as such applicable to those cases.

It was also insisted that Holly could have discharged the defendant from his promise, though it was intended by both parties for the benefit of the plaintiff, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain this suit for the recovery of a demand over which he had no control. It is enough that the plaintiff [Holly] did not release the defendant from his promise, and whether he could or not is a question not now necessarily involved; but if it was, I think it would be found difficult to maintain the right of Holly to discharge a judgment recovered by the plaintiff upon confession or otherwise, for the breach of the defendant's promise; and if he could not, how could he discharge the suit before judgment, or the promise before suit, made as it was for the plaintiff's benefit and in accordance with legal presumption accepted by him (Berley v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 577-584, et seq.), until his dissent was shown? The cases cited, and especially that of Farley v. Cleaveland, establish the validity of a parol promise; it stands then upon the footing of a written one. Suppose the defendant had given his note in which for value received of Holly he had promised to pay the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had accepted the promise retaining Holly's liability. Very clearly Holly could not have discharged that promise, be the right to release the defendant as it may. No one can doubt that he owes the sum of money demanded of him, or that in accordance with his promise it was his duty to have paid it to the plaintiff; nor can it be doubted that whatever may be the diversity of opinion elsewhere, the adjudications in this state, from a very early period, approved by experience, have established the defendant's liability; if, therefore, it could be shown that a more strict and technically accurate application of the rules applied would lead to a different result (which I by no means concede), the effort should not be made in the face of manifest justice.

The judgment should be affirmed.⁵

⁵ "The guaranty agreement being made for the benefit of the bank, the question arises whether the state bank examiner may sue upon it. Under section

JOHNSON, C. J., DENIO, SELDEN, ALLEN and STRONG, JJ., concurred. JOHNSON, C. J., and DENIO, J., were of opinion that the promise was to be regarded as made to the plaintiff through the medium of his agent, whose action he could ratify when it came to his knowledge, though taken without his being privy thereto.

COMSTOCK, J. (Dissenting.) The plaintiff had nothing to do with the promise on which he brought this action. It was not made to him, nor did the consideration proceed from him. If he can maintain the suit, it is because an anomaly has found its way into the law on this subject. In general there must be privity of contract. The party who sues upon a promise must be the promisee, or he must have some legal interest in the undertaking. In this case it is plain that Holly, who loaned the money to the defendant, and to whom the promise in question was made, could at any time have claimed that it should be performed to himself personally. He had lent the money to the defendant, and at the same time directed the latter to pay the sum to the plaintiff. This direction he could countermand, and if he had done so, manifestly the defendant's promise to pay according to the direction would have ceased to exist. The plaintiff would receive a benefit by a complete execution of the arrangement, but the arrangement itself was between other parties, and was under their exclusive control. If the defendant had paid the money to Holly, his debt would have been discharged thereby. So Holly might have released the demand or assigned it to another person, or the parties might have annulled the promise now in question, and designated some other creditor of Holly as the party to whom the money should be paid. It has never been claimed, that in a case thus situated, the right of a third person to sue upon the promise rested on any sound principle of law. We are to inquire whether the rule has been so established by positive authority.

The cases which have sometimes been supposed to have a bearing on 179 of Remington's Code it is provided that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of 'the real party in interest,' except as is otherwise provided by law.

"By a long line of decisions, which will be found collected in Hart v. Bogle, 33 Wash. 125, 152 Pac. 1010, this court is committed to the doctrine that, where one person for a valuable consideration makes a promise to another to pay the debt of a third person, such third person may maintain an action in his own name upon the promise and against the promisor alone. The bank, being the direct beneficiary of the guaranty agreement, must be held to be the real party in interest. If the bank be the real party in interest, there can be no question that, after insolvency and the bank being taken over by the state bank examiner, that official may maintain an action upon the agreement. Hanson v. Soderberg, 105 Wash. 255, 177 Pac. 827; Briscoe v. Hamer, 50 Okl. 281, 150 Pac. 1101; Montgomery Bank & Trust Co. v. Walker, 181 Ala. 368, 61 South. 951." Main, J., in Moore v. Bausch (Wash.), 187 Pac. 388, 394 (1920).

The great weight of authority in the United States favors the rule of Lawrence v. Fox. See 25 L. R. A. 257, note; L. R. A. 1916 C, 161, note. See also 39 Am. St. Rep. 531, note; 71 Am. St. Rep. 176, note.

this question are quite numerous. In some of them the dicta of judges, delivered upon very slight consideration, have been referred to as the decisions of the courts. Thus in Schermerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 John. 140, the court is reported as saying: "We are of opinion that where one person makes a promise to another, for the benefit of a third person, that third person may maintain an action on such promise." This remark was made on the authority of Dutton v. Poole, Vent. 318, 332, decided in England nearly two hundred years ago. It was, however, but a mere remark, as the case was determined against the plaintiff on another ground. Yet this decision has often been referred to as authority for similar observations in later cases.

In another class of cases, which have been sometimes supposed to favor the doctrine, the promise was made to the person who brought the suit while the consideration proceeded from another, the question considered being whether the promise was void by the Statute of Frauds. Thus in Gold v. Phillips, 10 Johns. 412, one Wood was indebted to the plaintiffs for services as attorneys and counsel, and he conveyed a farm to the defendants who, as part of the consideration, were to pay that debt. Accordingly the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs, informing them that an arrangement had been made by which they were to pay the demand. The defence was that the promise was void within the statute, because, although in writing, it did not express the consideration. But the action was sustained on the ground that the undertaking was original and not collateral. So in the case of Farley v. Cleaveland, 4 Cow. 432; 9 Cow. 639, the facts proved or offered to be proved were that the plaintiff held a note against one Moon; that Moon sold hay to the defendant, who in consideration of that sale promised the plaintiff by parol to pay the note. The only question was whether the Statute of Frauds applied to the case. It was held by the Supreme Court, and afterward by the Court of Errors, that it did not. Such is also precisely the doctrine of Ellwood v. Monk, 5 Wend. 235, where it was held that a plea of the Statute of Frauds to a count upon a promise of the defendant to the plaintiff, to pay the latter a debt owing to him by another person, the promise being founded on a sale of property to the defendant by the other person was bad. * * *

The cases in which some trust was involved are also frequently referred to as authority for the doctrine now in question, but they do not sustain it. If A. delivers money or property to B., which the latter accepts upon a trust for the benefit of C., the latter can enforce the trust by an appropriate action for that purpose. Berly v. Taylor, 5 Hill, 577. If the trust be of money, I think the beneficiary may assent to it and bring the action for money had and received to his use. If it be of something else than money, the trustee must account for it according to the terms of the trust and upon principles of equity. There is some authority even for saying that an express promise founded on the possession of a trust fund may be enforced by an action at law in the name of the beneficiary, although it was made to the creator of the trust. Thus in Comyn's Digest (Action on the Case upon Assumpsit, B. 15), it is laid down that if a man promise a pig of lead to A., and his executor give lead to make a pig to B., who assumes to deliver it to A., an assumpsit lies by A. against him. The case of The Delaware & Hudson Canal Company v. The Westchester County Bank, 4 Denio, 97, involved a trust because the defendants had received from a third party a bill of exchange under an agreement that they would endeavor to collect it, and would pay over the proceeds when collected to the plaintiffs. A fund received under such an agreement does not belong to the person who receives it. He must account for it specifically; and perhaps there is no gross violation of principle in permitting the equitable owner of it to sue upon an express promise to pay it over. Having a specific interest in the thing, the undertaking to account for it may be regarded as in some sense made with him through the author of the trust. But further than this we cannot go without violating plain rules of law. In the case before us there was nothing in the nature of a trust or agency. The defendant borrowed the money of Holly and received it as his own. The plaintiff had no right in the fund, legal or equitable. The promise to repay the money created an obligation in favor of the lender to whom it was made and not in favor of any one else.

I have referred to the dictum in Schermerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 Johns. 140, as favoring the doctrine contended for. It was the earliest in this state, and was founded, as already observed, on the old English case of Dutton v. Poole, in Ventris. That case * * * belongs to a class of cases somewhat peculiar and anomalous, in which promises have been made to a parent or person standing in a near relationship to the person for whose benefit it was made, and in which, on account of that relationship, the beneficiary has been allowed to maintain the action. Regarded as standing on any other ground, they have long since ceased to be the law in England. * * *

The question was also involved in some confusion by the earlier cases in Massachusetts. Indeed, the Supreme Court of that state seems at one time to have made a nearer approach to the doctrine on which this action must rest than the courts of this state have ever done. 10 Mass. 287; 17 Mass. 400. But in the recent case of Mellen, Administratrix, v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317, the subject was carefully reviewed and the doctrine utterly overthrown. One Rollin was indebted to the plaintiff's testator, and had secured the debt by a mortgage on his land. He then conveyed the equity of redemption to the defendant by a deed which contained a clause declaring that the defendant was to assume and pay the mortgage. It was conceded that the acceptance of the deed with such a clause in it was equivalent to an express promise to pay the mortgage debt, and the question was whether the mortgagee or his representative could sue on that undertaking. It was held that the suit could not be maintained, and in the course of a very careful and discriminating opinion by Metcalf, J., it was shown that the cases which had been supposed to favor the action belonged to exceptional classes, none of which embraced the pure and simple case of an attempt by one person to enforce a promise made to another from whom the consideration wholly proceeded. I am of that opinion.

The judgment of the court below should therefore be reversed and a new trial granted.

GROVER, J., also dissented.

Judgment affirmed.

BORDEN v. BOARDMAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1892. 157 Mass. 410, 32 N. E. 469.)

Contract. Trial in the Superior Court, before Braly, J., who reported the case for the determination of this court in substance as follows:

On July 24th, 1890, Daniel J. Collins, a contractor, made a contract in writing with the defendant to build him a house in New Bedford, for the sum of $2,650, payable one half when the house was ready for plastering, the balance when finished. The defendant advanced to Collins $200 before the first payment was due, taking his receipt therefor. During the progress of the work, and before the first payment became due according to the terms of the contract, the building was blown off the foundation. Collins employed the plaintiffs, who were building movers, to put the building back, under an agreement that it should not cost more than $150; the plaintiffs put the building back, finishing the moving a month or six weeks prior to the first payment. Collins then proceeded with the work, and got the building ready to plaster. When the time for the first payment arrived the defendant told Collins he would like to have all persons who had lienable bills against the house present to see that they were paid. The plaintiffs were not present, so the defendant asked Collins how much was due them, and was told $150. The defendant thereupon, at the request and with the consent of Collins, reserved $200 for the plaintiffs, saying he would hold this money to pay them with, and would pay them himself. Collins thereupon gave the defendant a receipt for $1,125, as first payment on the house. Neither Collins nor the defendant informed the plaintiffs of the holding of this money, but in consequence of what a third person told Manchester, one of the plaintiffs, Manchester called upon the defendant, and said to him, "I understand that you are holding my money for me for moving that building back. Is that so?" Boardman replied that it was. Manchester then said, "I am glad that you have got it and will pay it." Boardman said, "I don't know as I will now, I have been advised not to." No other interview was had between the plaintiffs and the defendant.

The defendant claimed that, upon this evidence, the action could not be maintained, and offered to show, in bar of the action, that, a day or so after the time of the first payment, Collins abandoned and broke his said contract, and the defendant was obliged to finish the building at a loss. and that at the time of refusing to pay Manchester, he, Manchester, was told by the defendant that Collins had broken his contract; and that on December 9th, 1890, after refusal to pay them by the defendant, the plaintiffs commenced an action against said Collins for the recovery of the claim now in suit. The evidence was excluded. The judge directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for $150, and interest from the date of the writ. If the ruling was right, then judgment was to be entered on the verdict; otherwise, judgment for the defendant.

MORTON, J. The evidence offered in bar was rightly excluded. The subsequent failure of Collins to perform his contract would not release the defendant from the obligation, if any, which he had assumed to the plaintiffs, in the absence of any agreement, express or implied, that the money was to be paid to the plaintiffs only in case Collins fulfilled his contract. Cook v. Wolfendale, 105 Mass. 401. There was no evidence of such an agreement.

The other question is more difficult. The case does not present a question of novation, for there was no agreement among the plaintiffs, Collins, and the defendant that the defendant should pay the plaintiffs, out of the money in his hands and due to Collins, a specific sum, and that thenceforward the defendant should be released from all liability for it to Collins, and should be liable for it to the plaintiffs. Neither was there any agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant that the latter would pay the money to them. The conversation between one of the plaintiffs and the defendant cannot be construed as affording evidence of such an agreement. Coupled with the defendant's admission that he was holding money for the plaintiffs was his repudiation of any liability to the plaintiffs for it. Neither can it be claimed that there was an equitable assignment of the amount in suit from Collins to the plaintiffs. There was no order or transfer given by him to them; nor was any notice of the arrangement between him and the defendant given by him to the plaintiffs. Lazarus v. Swan, 147 Mass. 330. The case upon this branch, therefore, reduced to its simplest form, is one of an agreement between two parties, upon sufficient consideration it may be between them, that one will pay, out of funds in his hands belonging to the other, a specific sum to a third person, who is not a party to the agreement, and from whom no consideration moves. It is well settled in this State that no action lies in such a case in favor of such third party to recover the money so held of the party holding it. Exchange Bank v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, and cases cited. Rogers v. Union Stone Co., 130 Mass. 581; New England Dredging Co. v. Rockport

Granite Co., 149 Mass. 381; Marston v. Bigelow, 150 Mass. 45; Saunders v. Saunders, 154 Mass. 337. Certain exceptions which were supposed to exist have either been shown not to exist, or have been confined within narrower limits. Exchange Bank v. Rice and Marston v. Bigelow, ubi supra.

We have assumed that the sum which the defendant agreed with Collins to pay the plaintiffs was specific. But it is to be observed that the agreement between the plaintiffs and Collins was that it should not cost more than $150 to put the building back. Collins told the defendant that that sum was due to the plaintiffs. The defendant reserved $200. It may well be doubted, therefore, whether the defendant had in his hands a specific sum to be paid to the plaintiffs, or whether he agreed with Collins to hold and pay the plaintiffs a specific sum. If the sum was not specific, the plaintiffs do not claim, as we understand them, that they can recover.

Judgment for the defendant.

JENKINS v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1907. 61 W. Va. 597, 57 S. E. 48, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1168, 11 Ann. Cas. 987.)

Action by David Jenkins against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

MILLER, J.⁶ The plaintiff in December, 1903, during the prevalence of an epidemic of smallpox in Fayette county, and who had been taken with that disease, was arrested at Montgomery by the health officers near the railroad of the defendant company about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and put into a common box car and locked up, without any provision for fire or bed clothing to protect him from the severe cold weather then prevailing. This car was, about 6 o'clock in the evening of the same day, taken by the defendant, put into a freight train, and about 12 o'clock that night set out on a side track at Fire Creek, near the county pesthouse, without any notice to the defendant's agent or to the pesthouse authorities. The next morning about 10 o'clock the plaintiff was discovered, taken out of the car, and carried to the pesthouse, where it was found that both his feet were badly frozen, so that in a few days the flesh began to slough off the bones, necessitating amputation of one leg in May and the other in July following. He endured intense suffering the night of his arrest and transportation and for several weeks afterward; but finally recovered from the disease, and was released.

The plaintiff had nothing to do with the arrangements with the railroad for his transportation. In November, 1904, he instituted this suit in assumpsit in the circuit court of Fayette county. The declaration is in two counts, to recover damages as for the breach of a contract for carriage with the defendant company. The first count charges that the defendant company on the 24th day of December, 1903, accepted the plaintiff as a passenger upon one of its freight trains for hire and reward, and then and there agreed to carry, transport, and deliver him safely and securely and protect him against the cold and inclement weather while such passenger from Montgomery to Fire Creek, and then and there deliver him to the superintendent of the county pesthouse. It then charges the defendant company with breach of its contract and duty to the plaintiff as a passenger. The second count counts upon an alleged contract or arrangement with the county court of Fayette county with the defendant company, whereby, in consideration that said county court would provide and maintain a pesthouse at Fire Creek for the purpose of treating, caring for, and preventing the spread of smallpox in said county and along the defendant's railway, detrimental to its business, the defendant agreed to provide and especially equip a car with necessary heat and conveniences for smallpox patients, and deliver all persons who might be suffering from that disease to the said pesthouse, to be there taken charge of by the county authorities. It is further alleged by said second count that the plaintiff, pursuant to this agreement and by authority of one of the members of the board of health of said county, was delivered to the defendant to be transported and carried from Montgomery to said pesthouse; that the defendant accepted the plaintiff as a passenger, and agreed to provide a comfortable car for the purpose, to protect him while in its charge from undue exposure to cold, and to safely deliver him to the pesthouse authorities; the breach of which contract of the defendant and of its duties to the plaintiff is charged as resulting in the injuries he sustained, and for which he asks $25,000 damages. The court below sustained the defendant's demurrer to the second count, and overruled it as to the first. There was issue and trial only on the first count, resulting in a verdict and judgment thereon for the plaintiff for $3,000. The trial court refused a new trial, and the case is here upon a writ of error prosecuted by the defendant company. Upon the trial there was practically no conflict of evidence respecting the manner in which the plaintiff had been dealt with by the health officers and by the railroad company, nor does the evidence leave any doubt that the plaintiff lost his legs by the cruel and inhuman treatment of the health officers and agents of the railroad company; and, if we disturb the verdict and judgment, it will be because of technical rules of practice binding us and now urged for reversal of the judgment.

It is claimed by the railroad company that the plaintiff's remedy was ex delicto, and not ex contractu, and that his suit in assumpsit was not a proper substitute for one in case. The plaintiff, on the other hand, seeks to sustain the verdict and judgment, not upon an actual contract of carriage for hire and reward with the defendant, as charged in the first count and of which there is absolutely no evidence, but, first, upon the implied contract which he claims arose out of the relationship of carrier and passenger while being carried from Montgomery to Fire Creek; and, second, upon the theory that the contract for carriage made by the county court with the defendant company was for his sole benefit, or for him as one of a class of smallpox patients, which he is entitled to enforce. * * * In the case at bar the plaintiff elected to sue in assumpsit; and the count in the declaration upon which the trial was had was upon a contract of carriage for hire and reward described as entire. * * * The only proof offered of any contract for carriage related to the one alleged in the second count of the declaration. The writ of error awarded does not bring up the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to that count. We cannot look to it, therefore, to support the verdict and judgment. There was no issue on that count, no trial, and no response thereto by the verdict of the jury. Met. Life Ins. Co. v. Rutherford, 95 Va. 773, 780, 30 S. E. 383. From these authorities we are forced to the conclusion that the court below erred in refusing to give to the jury the defendant's instruction No. 1, based on the failure of the plaintiff's evidence to prove the contract as alleged, and in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury and award the defendant a new trial. * * *

The plaintiff has cross-assigned as error the ruling of the court below sustaining its demurrer to said second count. We think that count is good, and, if sustained by proof, will entitle the plaintiff to recover. The contract being there stated, however, as an entirety, the plaintiff may possibly encounter some difficulties in sustaining it in all its parts by competent evidence. This count distinctly states an agreement, we think, upon a proper consideration, made between the county court and the railroad company, to meet the emergencies of an epidemic of smallpox and to provide against the same, not only in the interest of the public, but of the railroad company. On the part of the county court, it agreed to establish and maintain a pesthouse; and, in consideration thereof, on the part of the railroad company it agreed to provide and equip a proper car and furnish transportation for patients. While the contract as alleged was in the interest of the parties thereto, it was also made in the interest of a person of that class of which the plaintiff was one; and, when the plaintiff was received, voluntarily or involuntarily, as a passenger upon the defendant's car, to be transported under the contract thus made, the obligations of carrier and passenger at once arose under the contract, as well as impliedly, for the proper, safe, convenient transportation contemplated by the contract; and for a breach of the duty of the defendant to him under the contract the plaintiff would have a proper cause of action, either upon the contract or in an action ex delicto, as he might elect. This position seems well supported by numerous authorities cited by counsel. Among them are Hutch. on Carr.

(2d Ed.) § 537 (see, also, 3d Ed. § 992, note 27); 3 Page on Cont. § 1308 and notes; Rowan v. Hull, 55 W. Va. 335, Syl., point 5, 47 S. E. 92, 104 Am. St. Rep. 998. Besides these authorities and others cited by counsel, our own Code (Code 1899, § 2, c. 71 [Code 1906, § 3021]) provides that "if a covenant or promise be made for the sole benefit of a person with whom it is not made, or with whom it is made jointly with others, such person may maintain in his own name any action thereon which he might maintain in case it had been made with him only and the consideration had moved from him to the party making such covenant or promise."⁷ See on this subject, also, Nutter v. Sydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 547, Johnson v. McClung, 26 W. Va. 659, and Ross v. Milne, 12 Leigh. (Va.) 204, 37 Am. Dec. 646. This doctrine has been extended, by persuasive authority, to one of a class of persons where the class is sufficiently designated. Burton v. Larkin, 36 Kan. 246, 13 Pac. 398, 59 Am. Rep. 541; Johannes v. Ins. Co., 66 Wis. 50, 27 N. W. 414, 57 Am. Rep. 249; Locklin v. Beckwith, 6 N. Y. St. 583.

We therefore reverse the judgment of the circuit court, overrule the demurrer to the second count of the declaration, set aside the verdict of the jury, and award the defendant a new trial; and the cause is remanded to the court below, with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to amend his declaration, and to be further proceeded with according to law.

NATIONAL BANK v. GRAND LODGE.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1878. 98 U. S. 123, 25 L. Ed. 75.)

This is an action by the Second National Bank of St. Louis, Mo., against the Grand Lodge of Missouri of Free and Accepted Ancient ⁷Local statutes should be consulted.

In Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 104 Mo. 234 (1891) a servant of a quarry owner, injured because the defendant company did not supply its cars with proper brakes, was not allowed to recover as beneficiary of the contract whereby cars were furnished by defendant to the quarry owner for the transportation of stone, which contract required the company to see that its cars were provided with proper brakes.

Whether a beneficiary is a sole beneficiary and allowed to recover, or only incidentally benefited and denied a recovery, where there is no express contract provision showing how the parties regarded the beneficiary or class of beneficiaries, is a question of what is reasonable in view of the purposes of the contracting parties and the situation of the beneficiary.

"In order that a third party may sue upon a contract made by others he must show that he was intended by them to have an enforceable right or at least that the performance of the contract must necessarily be of benefit to him and such benefit must have been within the contemplation and purpose of the contracting parties. He has no right of action where he incidentally finds a provision in some contract which makes to his advantage." Corbin's Anson on Contracts, pp. 344-345.

Masons, to compel the payment of certain coupons formerly attached to bonds issued in June, 1869, by the Masonic Hall Association, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Missouri, in relation to which bonds the Grand Lodge, October 14th, 1869, adopted the following resolution:

“Resolved, That this Grand Lodge assume the payment of the $200,000 bonds, issued by the Masonic Hall Association, provided that stock is issued to the Grand Lodge by said association to the amount of said assumption of payment by this Grand Lodge as the said bonds are paid.”

The court below instructed the jury that independently of the question of the power of the Grand Lodge to pass the resolution, it was no foundation for the present action, and directed a verdict for the defendant.

The jury returned a verdict in accordance with the direction of the court, and judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

STRONG, J. It is unnecessary to consider the several assignments of error in detail, for there is an insurmountable difficulty in the way of the plaintiff's recovery. The resolution of the Grand Lodge was but a proposition made to the Masonic Hall Association, and, when accepted, the resolution and acceptance constituted at most only an executory contract inter partes. It was a contract made for the benefit of the association and of the Grand Lodge—made that the latter might acquire the ownership of stock of the former, and that the former might obtain relief from its liabilities. The holders of the bonds were not parties to it, and there was no privity between them and the lodge. They may have had an indirect interest in the performance of the undertakings of the parties, as they would have in an agreement by which the lodge should undertake to lend money to the association, or contract to buy its stock to enable it to pay its debts; but that is a very different thing from the privity necessary to enable them to enforce the contract by suits in their own names. We do not propose to enter at large upon a consideration of the inquiry how far privity of contract between a plaintiff and defendant is necessary to maintenance of an action of assumpsit. The subject has been much debated, and the decisions are not all reconcilable. No doubt the general rule is that such a privity must exist. But there are confessedly many exceptions to it. One of them, and by far the most frequent one, is the case where, under a contract between two persons, assets have come to the promisor's hands or under his control which in equity belong to a third person. In such a case it is held that the third person may sue in his own name. But then the suit is founded rather on the implied undertaking the law raises from the possession of the assets, than on the express promise. Another exception is where the plaintiff is the beneficiary solely interested in the promise, as where one person contracts with another to pay money or deliver some valuable thing to a third. But where a debt already exists from one person to another, a promise by a third person to pay such debt being primarily for the benefit of the original debtor, and to relieve him from liability to pay it (there being no novation), he has a right of action against the promisor for his own indemnity; and if the original creditor can also sue, the promisor would be liable to two separate actions, and therefore the rule is that the original creditor cannot sue. His case is not an exception from the general rule that privity of contract is required. There are some other exceptions recognized, but they are unimportant now. The plaintiff's case is within none of them. Nor is he sole beneficiary of the contract between the association and the Grand Lodge. The contract was made, as we have said, for the benefit of the association, and if enforceable at all, is enforceable by it. That the several bondholders of the association are not in a situation to sue upon it is apparent on its face. Even as between the association and the Grand Lodge, the latter was not bound to pay anything except so far as stock of the former was delivered or tendered to it. The promise to pay and the promise to deliver the stock were not independent of each other. They were concurrent and dependent. Of this there can be no doubt. The resolution of the lodge was to assume the payment of the $200,000 bonds, issued by the association. "Provided, that stock is issued to the Grand Lodge by said association to the amount of said assumption," * * * "as said bonds are paid." Certainly the obligation of the lodge was made contingent upon the issue of the stock, and the consideration for payment of the debt to the bondholders was the receipt of the stock. But the bondholders can neither deliver it nor tender it; nor can they compel the association to deliver it. If they can sue upon the contract, and enforce payment by the Grand Lodge of the bonds, the contract is wholly changed, and the lodge is compelled to pay whether it gets the stock or not. To this it cannot be presumed the lodge would ever have agreed.⁸ It is manifest, therefore, that the bondholders of the association are not in such privity with the lodge, and have no such interest in the contract as to warrant their bringing suit in their own names.

⁸That a beneficiary takes subject to express or implied conditions affecting performance by the promisor would seem to be clear. Ellis v. Conrad Seipp Brewing Co., 207 Ill. 291 (1904); Russell v. W. U. Tel. Co., 57 Kans. 230 (1896); Gill v. Weller, 52 Md. 8 (1879); Osborn v. Cabell, 77 Va. 462 (1883). See also Supreme Council of the Royal Arcanum v. Behrend, 247 U. S. 394 (1918). But see East v. New Orleans Ins. Assoc., 76 Miss. 697 (1899).

For a discussion of Hartman v. Pistorius, 248 Ill. 568 (1911), see note 24, post, in this chapter.

So the beneficiary takes subject to the promisor's defenses of fraud (Arnold v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 117 (1876); Jenness v. Simpson, 84 Vt. 127 (1910)), mistake (Gold v. Ogden, 61 Minn. 88 (1895); Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387 (1896)), infancy, insanity, etc.

Hence the present action cannot be sustained, and the Circuit Court correctly directed a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

SEAVER v. RANSOM ET AL.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 224 N. Y. 233, 120 N. E. 639,
2 A. L. R. 1187.)

Action by Marion E. Seaver against Matt C. Ransom and another, as executors, etc., of Samuel A. Beman, deceased. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (180 App. Div. 734, 168 N. Y. Supp. 454), affirming judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

POUND, J. Judge Beman and his wife were advanced in years. Mrs. Beman was about to die. She had a small estate, consisting of a house and lot in Malone and little else. Judge Beman drew his wife's will according to her instructions. It gave $1,000 to plaintiff, $500 to one sister, plaintiff's mother, and $100 each to another sister and her son, the use of the house to her husband for life, and remainder to the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. She named her husband as residuary legatee and executor. Plaintiff was her niece, 34 years old in ill health sometimes a member of the Beman household. When the will was read to Mrs. Beman, she said that it was not as she wanted it. She wanted to leave the house to the plaintiff. She had no other objection to the will, but her strength was waning, and, although the judge offered to write another will for her, she said she was afraid she would not hold out long enough to enable her to sign it. So the judge said, if she would sign the will, he would leave plaintiff enough in his will to make up the difference. He avouched the promise by his uplifted hand with all solemnity and his wife then executed the will. When he came to die, it was found that his will made no provision for the plaintiff.

This action was brought, and plaintiff recovered judgment in the trial court, on the theory that Beman had obtained property from his wife and induced her to execute the will in the form prepared by him by his promise to give plaintiff $6,000, the value of the house, and that thereby equity impressed his property with a trust in favor of the plaintiff. Where a legatee promises the testator that he will use property given him by the will for a particular purpose, a trust arises. O'Hara v. Dudley, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53; Trustees of Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 282, 45 N. E. 876, 37 L. R. A. 305; Ahrens v. Jones, 169 N. Y. 555, 62 N. E. 666, 88 Am. St. Rep. 620. Beman received nothing under his wife's will but the use of the house in Malone for life. Equity compels the application of property thus obtained to the purpose of the testator, but equity cannot so impress a trust, except on property obtained by the promise. Beman was bound by his promise, but no property was bound by it; no trust in plaintiff's favor can be spelled out.

An action on the contract for damages, or to make the executors trustees for performance, stands on different ground. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Mortimer, 219 N. Y. 290, 294, 295, 114 N. E. 389. The Appellate Division properly passed to the consideration of the question whether the judgment could stand upon the promise made to the wife, upon a valid consideration, for the sole benefit of plaintiff. The judgment of the trial court was affirmed by a return to the general doctrine laid down in the great case of Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, which has since been limited as herein indicated.

Contracts for the benefit of third persons have been the prolific source of judicial and academic discussion. Williston, Contracts for the Benefit of a Third Person, 15 Harvard Law Review, 767; Corbin, Contracts for the Benefit of Third Persons, 27 Yale Law Review, 1008. The general rule, both in law and equity (Phalen v. United States Trust Co., 186 N. Y. 178, 186, 78 N. E. 943, 7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 734, 9 Ann. Cas. 595), was that privity between a plaintiff and a defendant is necessary to the maintenance of an action on the contract. The consideration must be furnished by the party by whom the promise was made. The contract cannot be enforced against the third party, and therefore it cannot be enforced by him. On the other hand, the right of the beneficiary to sue on a contract made expressly for his benefit has been fully recognized in many American jurisdictions, either by judicial decision or by legislation, and is said to be "the prevailing rule in this country." Hendrick v. Lindsay, 93 U. S. 143, 23 L. Ed. 855; Lehow v. Simonton, 3 Colo. 346. It has been said that "the establishment of this doctrine has been gradual, and is a victory of practical utility over theory, of equity over technical subtlety." Brantly on Contracts (2d Ed.) p. 253. The reasons for this view are that it is just and practical to permit the person for whose benefit the contract is made to enforce it against one whose duty it is to pay. Other jurisdictions still adhere to the present English rule (7 Halsbury's Laws of England, 342, 343; Jenks' Digest of English Civil Law, § 229) that a contract cannot be enforced by or against a person who is not a party (Exchange Bank v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, 9 Am. Rep. 1). But see, also, Forbes v. Thorpe, 209 Mass. 570, 95 N. E. 955; Gardner v. Denison, 217 Mass. 492, 105 N. E. 359, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1108.

In New York the right of the beneficiary to sue on contracts made for his benefit is not clearly or simply defined. It is at present confined: First. To cases where there is a pecuniary obligation running from the promisee to the beneficiary, "a legal right founded upon some obligation of the promisee in the third party to adopt and claim the promise as made for his benefit." Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 432, 15 Am. Dec. 387; Lawrence v. Fox, supra; Garnsey v. Rogers, 47 N. Y. 233, 7 Am. Rep. 440; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep.

195; Lorillard v. Clyde, 122 N. Y. 498, 25 N. E. 917, 10 L. R. A. 113; Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49; Townsend v. Rackham, 143 N. Y. 516, 38 N. E. 731; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 161 N. Y. 554, 56 N. E. 116. Secondly. To cases where the contract is made for the benefit of the wife (Buchanan v. Tilden, 158 N. Y. 109, 52 N. E. 724, 44 L. R. A. 170, 70 Am. St. Rep. 454; Benton v. Welch, 170 N. Y. 554, 63 N. E. 539), affianced wife (De Cicco v. Schweizer, 221 N. Y. 431, 117 N. E. 807, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 816), or child (Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 193, 47 Am. Rep. 20; Matter of Kidd, 188 N. Y. 274, 80 N. E. 924) of a party to the contract. The close relationship cases go back to the early King's Bench case (1677), long since repudiated in England, of Dutton v. Poole, 2 Lev. 211 (s. c., 1 Ventris, 318, 332). See Schemerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 Johns. 139, 3 Am. Dec. 304. The natural and moral duty of the husband or parent to provide for the future of wife or child sustains the action on the contract made for their benefit. "This is the furthest the cases in this state have gone," says Cullen, J., in the marriage settlement case of Borland v. Welch, 162 N. Y. 104, 110, 56 N. E. 556.⁹

The right of the third party is also upheld in, thirdly, the public contract cases (Little v. Banks, 85 N. Y. 258; Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co., 183 N. Y. 330, 76 N. E. 211, 1 L. R. A. [N. S.] 958, 5 Ann. Cas. 504; Smyth v. City of New York, 203 N. Y. 106, 96 N. E. 409; Farnsworth v. Boro Oil & Gas Co., 216 N. Y. 40, 48, 109 N. E. 860; Rigney v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. Co., 217 N. Y. 31, 111 N. E. 226; Matter of International Ry. Co. v. Rann, 224 N. Y. 83, 120 N. E. 153. Cf. German Alliance Ins. Co. v. Home Water Supply Co., 226 U. S. 220, 33 Sup. Ct. 32, 57 L. Ed. 195, 42 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1000), where the municipality seeks to protect its inhabitants by covenants for their benefit; and, fourthly, the cases where, at the request of a party to the contract, the promise runs directly to the beneficiary although he does not furnish the consideration (Rector, etc., v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583, 24 N. E. 1014; F. N. Bank of Sing Sing v. Chalmers, 144 N. Y. 432, 439, 39 N. E. 331; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 127 App. Div. 871, 875, 112 N. Y. Supp. 10). It may be safely said that a general rule sustaining recovery at the suit of the third party would include but few classes of cases not included in these groups, either categorically or in principle.¹⁰

¹⁰ New York was long unfavorable to recovery by a sole beneficiary, chiefly because of the fondness of New York judges for their statement that only a beneficiary to whom some legal or equitable duty was owing by the promisee could sue. The wide departure from that statement shown in the third class listed in the above opinion, and the liberality of the remark to which this is

The desire of the childless aunt to make provision for a beloved and favorite niece differs imperceptibly in law or in equity from the moral duty of the parent to make testamentary provision for a child. The contract was made for the plaintiff's benefit. She alone is substantially damaged by its breach. The representatives of the wife's estate have no interest in enforcing it specifically. It is said in Buchanan v. Tilden that the common law imposes moral and legal obligations upon the husband and the parent not measured by the necessities of life. It was, however, the love and affection or the moral sense of the husband and the parent that imposed such obligations in the cases cited, rather than any common-law duty of husband and parent to wife and child. If plaintiff had been a child of Mrs. Beman, legal obligation would have required no testamentary provision for her, yet the child could have enforced a covenant in her favor identical with the covenant of Judge Beman in this case. De Cicco v. Schweizer, supra. The constraining power of conscience is not regulated by the degree of relationship alone. The dependent or faithful niece may have a stronger claim than the affluent or unworthy son. No sensible theory of moral obligation denies arbitrarily to the former what would be conceded to the latter. We might consistently either refuse or allow the claim of both, but I cannot reconcile a decision in favor of the wife in Buchanan v. Tilden, based on the moral obligations arising out of near relationship, with a decision against the niece here on the ground that the relationship is too remote for equity's ken. No controlling authority depends upon so absolute a rule. In Sullivan v. Sullivan, supra, the grandniece lost in a litigation with the aunt's estate, founded on a certificate of deposit payable to the aunt "or in case of her death to her niece;" but what was said in that case of the relations of plaintiff's intestate and defendant does not control here, any more than what was said in Durnherr v. Rau, supra, on the relation of husband and wife, and the inadequacy of mere moral duty, as distinguished from legal or equitable obligation, controlled the decision in Buchanan v. Tilden. Borland v. Welch, supra, deals only with the rights of volunteers under a marriage settlement not made for the benefit of collaterals. Kellogg, P. J., writing for the court below well said:

"The doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox is progressive, not retrograde. The course of the late decisions is to enlarge, not to limit, the effect of that case."

The court in that leading case attempted to adopt the general doctrine that any third person, for whose direct benefit a contract was intended, could sue on it. The headnote thus states the rule. Finch, J., in Gifford v. Corrigan, 117 N. Y. 257, 262, 22 N. E. 756, 6 L. R. A. 610, 15 Am. St. Rep. 508, says that the case rests upon that broad proposition; Eda note disclose that in New York a sole beneficiary is at last in a fairly secure position.

ward T. Bartlett, J., in Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co., 183 N. Y. 330, 337, 76 N. E. 211, 213 (1 L. R. A. [N. S.] 958, 5 Ann. Cas. 504), calls it "the general principle;" but Vrooman v. Turner, supra, confined its application to the facts on which it was decided. "In every case in which an action has been sustained," says Allen, J., "there has been a debt or duty owing by the promisee to the party claiming to sue upon the promise," 69 N. Y. 285, 25 Am. Rep. 195. As late as Townsend v. Rackham, 143 N. Y. 516, 523, 38 N. E. 731, 733, we find Peckham, J., saying that, "to maintain the action by the third person, there must be this liability to him on the part of the promisee." Buchanan v. Tilden went further than any case since Lawrence v. Fox in a desire to do justice rather than to apply with technical accuracy strict rules calling for a legal or equitable obligation. In Embler v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co., 158 N. Y. 431, 53 N. E. 212, 44 L. R. A. 512, it may at least be said that a majority of the court did not avail themselves of the opportunity to concur with the views expressed by Gray, J., who wrote the dissenting opinion in Buchanan v. Tilden, to the effect that an employee could not maintain an action on an insurance policy issued to the employer, which covered injuries to employees.

In Wright v. Glen Telephone Co., 48 Misc. Rep. 192, 195, 95 N. Y. Supp. 101, the learned presiding justice who wrote the opinion in this case said at Trial Term:

"The right of a third person to recover upon a contract made by other parties for his benefit must rest upon the peculiar circumstances of each case rather than upon the law of some other case."

"The case at bar is decided upon its peculiar facts." Edward T. Bartlett, J., in Buchanan v. Tilden.

But, on principle, a sound conclusion may be reached. If Mrs. Beman had left her husband the house on condition that he pay the plaintiff $6,000, and he had accepted the devise, he would have become personally liable to pay the legacy, and plaintiff could have recovered in an action at law against him, whatever the value of the house. Gridley v. Gridley, 24 N. Y. 130; Brown v. Knapp, 79 N. Y. 136, 143; Dinan v. Coneys, 143 N. Y. 544, 547, 38 N. E. 715; Blackmore v. White, [1899] 1 Q. B. 293, 304. That would be because the testatrix had in substance bequeathed the promise to plaintiff, and not because close relationship or moral obligation sustained the contract. The distinction between an implied promise to a testator for the benefit of a third party to pay a legacy and an unqualified promise on a valuable consideration to make provision for the third party by will is discernible, but not obvious. The tendency of American authority is to sustain the gift in all such cases and to permit the donee beneficiary to recover on the contract. Matter of Edmundson's Estate (1918, Pa.) 103 Atl. 277, 259 Pa. 429. The equities are with the plaintiff, and they may be enforced in this action, whether it be regarded as an action for damages or an action for specific performance to convert the defendants into trustees for plaintiff's benefit under the agreement.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Action by Uriah S. Fry against L. E. Ausman and others. From a judgment for defendants plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The deed to the grantor contained the following clause: "The same are free from all incumbrances, except a first mortgage of $5,000," but contained no statement that she assumed the mortgage. The deed from the grantor to the grantee contained the following clause: "The same are free from all incumbrances, except a first mortgage of $5,000 and interest from April 26, 1908, at 6 per cent which second party agrees to assume." The mortgage was foreclosed, and, the proceeds being insufficient to satisfy it, this action was brought to recover the deficiency.

WHITING, J.¹¹ The sole question presented by this appeal is whether one holding a note secured by a mortgage upon real estate can recover upon such note against a party other than the mortgagor, where such party had taken a deed to said mortgaged premises, and in such deed had assumed such mortgage indebtedness, the grantor in such deed being in no manner bound to pay such mortgage indebtedness, and there being no evidence, other than such deed, to show an intent on the part of the grantor and grantee in such deed to contract for the benefit of the owner of the note and mortgage. The trial court held there could be no recovery.

Respondent contends that, disregarding the other question involved herein, appellant cannot recover because of a lack of privity of contract between appellant and respondent. It is true that, under what is known as the English rule and which is followed in several of the states, appellant would not be the proper party plaintiff, and it would be necessary that the action be brought in the name of the grantor in the deed; but there early arose in this country what is known as the American rule allowing the real party in interest to sue in his own name upon a contract made for his benefit. The so-called "Code" states have many or all adopted, many by statutory enactment, the American rule. This state adopted such rule by section 1193, Civil Code, which reads: "A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it.”

Pomeroy at section 1207 of the third edition of his work on Equity Jurisprudence notes that the courts, holding that there can be no liability upon the part of the grantee where there was none on the part of the grantor, also hold that the liability, when any does exist, results only from an application of the doctrine of subrogation, and that, unless there was a liability or obligation on the part of the grantor so that, as between the grantor and grantee, the grantee became the principal debtor and the grantor but a surety, there would be nothing upon which the creditor could base a right of subrogation. Pomeroy also notes that the courts holding the grantee liable where the grantor was not liable base the right of recovery solely upon the contract, taking the position that, where a contract is made for the benefit of one not a party thereto, he may treat the promise as though made to himself, and may sue in his own name thereon.

The federal Supreme Court has adopted the subrogation theory of liability as appears by the following from the case of Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 10 Sup. Ct. 494, 33 L. Ed. 667: “The doctrine of the right of a creditor to the benefit of all securities given by the principal to the surety for the payment of the debt does not rest upon any liability of the principal to the creditor, or upon any peculiar relation of the surety towards the creditor, but upon the ground that the surety, being the creditor’s debtor, and in fact occupying the relation of surety to another person, has received from that person an obligation or security for the payment of the debt, which a court of equity will therefore compel to be applied to that purpose at the suit of the creditor. Where the person ultimately held liable is himself a debtor to the creditor, the relief awarded has no reference to that fact, but is grounded wholly on the right of the creditor to avail himself of the right of the surety against the principal. If the person who is admitted to be the creditor’s debtor stands at the time of receiving the security in the relation of surety to the person from whom he receives it, it is quite immaterial whether that person is or ever has been a debtor of the principal creditor, or whether the relation of suretyship or the indemnity to the surety existed, or was known to the creditor, when the debt was contracted. In short, if one person agrees with another to be primarily liable for a debt due from that other to a third person, so that as between the parties to the agreement the first is the principal and the second the surety, the creditor of such surety is entitled in equity to be substituted in his place for the purpose of compelling such principal to pay the debt.”

For a general discussion of this question and a review of the numerous authorities bearing upon the different phases thereof, we refer to the very exhaustive notes pages 176 to 207 of 71 Am. St. Rep. These notes call particular attention to the two elements required under the

New York decisions in order that there may be a recovery: (1) There must be an intent to benefit the third party; and (2) the promisee must owe some obligation to the third party. It is very apparent that the decisions from those states which have adopted the English rule above referred to are of no authoritative value upon the question before us. Among these states seem to be Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, and Wyoming. We therefore cite cases from those states only which recognize the American rule allowing suit by real party in interest.

Among the authorities supporting the New York rule and denying a right of recovery under the facts in this case are the following: King v. Whitely, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 465; Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 25 Am. Rep. 195; Matter of Wilber v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 192, 10 N. E. 263; Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, 32 N. E. 49; Jefferson v. Asch, supra; Kramer v. Gardner, 104 Minn. 370, 116 N. W. 925, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 492; Clement v. Willett, 105 Minn. 267, 117 N. W. 491, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, 127 Am. St. Rep. 562, 15 Ann. Cas. 1053; Morris v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 474; Harts v. Emery, 184 Ill. 560, 56 N. E. 865; Birke v. Abbott, 103 Ind. 1, 1 N. E. 485, 53 Am. Rep. 474; Marble v. Mesarvey, 101 Iowa, 285, 70 N. Mauer*, 38 Ohio St. 543, 43 Am. Rep. 436; McKay v. Ward, 20 Utah, 149, 57 Pac. 1024, 46 L. R. A. 623; Enos v. Sanger, 96 Wis. 150, 70 N. W. 1069, 37 L. R. A. 864, 65 Am. St. Rep. 38; Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 116 Wis. 517, 93 N. W. 440, 61 L. R. A. 509, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1003; Fanning v. Murphy, 126 Wis. 538, 105 N. W. 1056, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 666, 110 Am. St. Rep. 946, 5 Ann. Cas. 435.

We could call particular attention to the Utah case owing to the very exhaustive dissenting opinion found therein. There are many other authorities which in principle support one or the other of the two theories mentioned herein, but we have confined our citations to those where the facts passed upon were the same as here, namely, where the grantee in a deed had assumed a mortgage debt for which his grantor was not liable.

While we think it must be conceded that, in case the second element required under the New York decisions does exist, it may, from that fact, be presumed that the first element is also present, and therefore the party for whose benefit the contract is made be entitled, under the subrogation theory, to recover of the party who has rendered himself the principal debtor; yet it seems equally clear to us that, whenever two parties enter into an agreement that appears to have been made expressly for the benefit of a third party, and such agreement has a good and sufficient consideration, the agreement itself creates all the privity there need be between the person for whose benefit the agreement was entered into and the party assuming the obligation, and an action at law should lie regardless of whether there was any obligation existing between the other party to the agreement and the third party. But, before the third party can adopt the agreement entered into and recover thereon, he must show clearly that it was entered into with the intent on the part of the parties thereto that such third party should be benefited thereby. This intent might, in a given case, sufficiently appear from the contract itself, but it must frequently be shown by other proof. While the cases sustaining a recovery have few, if any of them, expressly recognized the necessity of the existence of the first element (the intent to benefit the third party), yet an examination of the decisions will reveal the fact that such element was clearly established in nearly all such cases.

We concur heartily in the following words of Chief Justice Barch of Utah in his dissenting opinion in McKay v. Ward: "My conclusion is that the rule which exempts a grantee, who has merely in a deed of conveyance assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage in case his immediate grantor is not personally liable for the payment of the mortgage debt, from liability to the mortgagee, or owner of the mortgage, is not only founded in reason and principle, but is sustained by an overwhelming weight of authority. I do not intend to hold, however, that the grantee of mortgaged premises, whose grantor is under no personal obligation to pay the mortgage debt, cannot render himself liable to the mortgagee for a deficiency judgment upon foreclosure and sale by accepting a deed containing an assumption clause with knowledge of such contents, and which clause contains apt words showing that the grantor intended to bestow a benefit upon the mortgagee. The rule cannot be thus extended; for doubtless a grantor may direct the payment of the purchase price as he chooses, and may, if he so wishes, contract with a grantee that the latter will pay a certain sum to a stranger, or a mortgagee, or any person upon whom the grantor chooses to confer a benefit, and in such cases the beneficiary may enforce the contract. Where; however, as in the case at bar, the grantor is not personally liable, the assumption clause ought to be construed as a mere indemnity to the grantor, unless there is something to show a different intention by the contracting parties. In this case there appears to be nothing which indicates any other intention on the part of the grantor, than that of indemnity to himself. There are no words in the deed, nor any evidence of facts or circumstances, which indicate that the grantor had any interest in protecting the mortgagee, to whom he was under no personal obligation. Doubtless, in general, the greatest interest a grantor has is in effecting a sale of the premises, and it cannot be assumed that he would hazard the chances of such a sale by insisting on that which would not benefit him. The circumstances of this case disclose no intention to benefit the mortgagee, and therefore he is not entitled to a deficiency judgment against the promisor; the assumption in the deed being intended merely to indemnify the promisee. If the intention of the contracting parties had been otherwise, the respondent could easily have shown it by placing the vendor, McDonald, upon the stand, and interrogating him upon the subject. This he failed to do, although, under the great weight of authority, the burden was upon him to show that the contract was intended for his benefit, or that the vendor was under some legal obligation to him respecting the debt. The respondent not having done this, why should the appellate court assume that as a fact of which there is no proof?"

We think also that the very terms of our statute determine this question in favor of respondent. Recovery can only be had in case the contract was "made expressly for the benefit of a third person." The state of California has identically the same statute, and in Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100, the Supreme Court of that state said: "It is not necessary that the parties for whose benefit the contract has been made should be named in the contract. It must appear, however, by the direct terms of the contract, that it was made for the benefit of such parties. It cannot be implied from the fact that the contract would, if carried out between the parties to it, operate incidentally to their benefit." See, also, Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609.

From both reason and authority we conclude: That inasmuch as the provision in the deed before us merely provided that the grantee assumed the mortgage debt, and there being no other evidence of the intent of the parties to such deed, we should construe such provision as a mere agreement or contract to indemnify the grantor, and therefore insufficient as the basis of an action founded upon the doctrine of subrogation—there being no obligation on part of grantor to the third person—and also insufficient, as the basis of an action under section 1193, Civil Code, it not appearing that the said agreement or contract was entered into "expressly for the benefit of a (the) third person."

*The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.*¹²

¹² In McDonald v. Finseth, 32 No. Dak. 400 (1916), contra, Bruce, J., for the court, said of Fry v. Ausman and other cases in accord, that they "seem to totally ignore, in their conclusions at any rate, even if not in their reasoning, the well established rule of law that when one makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third person such third person can maintain an action upon the promise, even though the consideration does not run directly from him and even though at the time he knew nothing of the promise to pay him" (p. 407) and pointed out that the defendant's promise "can be and is properly supported by the consideration afforded by the transfer of land to him and by the fact that the amount of the mortgage was deducted from the

THE N. O. ST. JOSEPH'S ASSOCIATION v. A. MAGNIER.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana, 1861. 16 La. Ann. 338.)

VOORHIES, J. The defendant Magnier, and several other hatters in the city of New Orleans, entered into a contract to close their respective stores on Sundays. They stipulated, in express terms, that those who would violate this obligation would become subject, for each infraction, to a fine of one hundred dollars for the benefit of the asylum of the St. Joseph's Orphans.

A. Magnier having, on several Sundays, opened his store, the present suit was brought to recover the stipulated fine.

To the general rule that parties to a contract cannot stipulate but for themselves, there is an exception when one makes, in his own name, some advantages for a third person the condition or consideration of a commutative contract, or onerous donation. C. C. 1884, 1896. He, for whose benefit this advantage is stipulated, has an equitable action to enforce the stipulation, when he has signified his assent in the premises. C. P. 35.

The text is clear that the advantage must be the condition or consideration of the contract: hence it is that a penal obligation cannot be stipulated for the benefit of third persons. 6 Toullier, No. 846; Rolland de Villargues, 2 Dict. Not. No. 50; C. N. 1121.

A penal clause, being a secondary obligation having for its object the enforcement of a primary obligation, cannot be assimilated to a condition or consideration. C. C. 2113.

"The penal obligation," says C. C. 2115, "has this in common with a conditional obligation, that the penalty is due only on condition that the first part of the contract be not performed. But it differs from it in this, that in penal contracts there must be always a principal obligation, independent of the penalty; while in conditional contracts, there is no obligation, unless the condition happens."
